The land itself had grown many of them welding, even during the initial ‘conception’, in their larvae stage. Raised upon a muscle toned pole, with pointed forwardly like a crawling shaft that blew in a small patchy-row, where the giant bulk of an elephant head was given stare, from its side came half-a-jaw-like almost blade with many bearing stones-teeth or cartilage-chitin it would twist and hit and rather miss properly landing on top the cage. The bars that were left as well were too outwardly curved to be easily formed afterwards. It bore a single giant eye where this almost tool-like growth that held its body high, this pillar with a front bent-down neck but straight, horizontally flipped L-thing that entered the bulk, of which, pointedly as for the location, it bore, next to this throat, to its left, or the ones that stared at it, ‘s right, a giant spread of many grass-root like inflates hose-cords that were its teeth and pointed forth, towards a dead point. Its eye but rested no further and right above the end of the pole, the forward throttle that entered it, as well as it could be seen. Along the cage rested thousands of them, all hitting, soundlessly as it might be added, as it were only but a mystery, how it happened in the first place, their sudden appearance here.

‘Cease your slacking immediately, there’s much to be done still.’

‘Can I not have a minute as to stare at it?’

‘Nay, there shall not be one given or lost.’

With which he pulled them away from the repairmen, wherever they may go, alas.

This was not the same cage it had once been, unfortunately, it’s become more vulgar than anything that’s ever been seen or observed by the ones that returned.

And they had. In the most repulsing-repelling manner one could imagine them.

Some keys were being played wrong, from one side to another, pay no heed and no mind, would they draw on to say.

Same two men talking by the side walk, somewhere near Paris:

‘The nigger will always remain a nigger, at the end of the day. It will always be a victim of its own vices. A victim of the intergenerational-self-hatred of itself; it’s what drove it to enslave those that look and act like him, you know? To kill one another, to hate one another, to become the biggest deterrent to itself; which is furthermore promoted by their in-group biases, which is the reason why they’ll never assimilate. They don’t want to admit it.

They claim they’re a single people, but they’re not. Most of their ethnic nigger groups can differentiate between one another, it’s why they hate, band and kill one another, because of their tribalism. Yet others enjoy pretending while also promoting their ‘brothers’ thinking they’re similar to themselves. It spans out of their hatred for the white people, for the white race.

Too many ethnically incompatible African groups were brought to the States. It’s why there are so many problems in our day and time. The kikes enjoy promoting their Kike-Bolshevism in the universities, brainwashing people into believing every ethnic group’s the same or adheres to a similar set of beliefs, which is false, incorrect, a lie. That they are of a similar intelligence, equal in mind, although that is objectively incorrect as well. Anthropologists are aware of the existing difference between the human populations, yet simply choose to ignore those, for their ‘non-beneficiary’ uses in society.

That is false. There are too many incompatible ethnic groups, especially the African ones that deter from any cooperation to be accomplished; their specimens only seem to produce ‘athletes’ but end up being lacking in other departments. Their personality traits make them pursuit, on average, physically demanding ‘professions’ that don’t end up helping the country at all. It’s even worse that their ‘culture’ although inexistent, promotes violence.

This filthy Marxism is poison, filthy Kike poison. Affirmative action is nothing more but, a poisonous, as all know, Communistic kike practice. Class gets replaced with race. Eating the rich is eating the 'white'. The lower class is the nigger. And even when made aware of the negative effects it has on white people, the kikes still promote it.

Systematic racism is nothing more than seeing or being proud of one people's achievements, on the other side of the spectrum. If all white people see themselves in a Mozart or a Michelangelo, all niggers and all kikes see themselves either in a Holocaust or a kneed nigger.

The kikes would claim that neither one is falsifiable. That one has a cultural aspect for pursuing one achievement, while normal people would make the argument that it's nothing but an excuse for not having achieved anything in life. That is the first side.

The second side is the victim, the nigger or the kike, using those things as an example for their opponent's hatred for them. Or their incapability of pulling themselves by their bootstraps, or political purposes to justify the existence of a kike state like Israel.

There's a biological aspect people don't want to talk about. Although there are many ethnic groups involved, this racial violence between many, this racial aspect between these, various incompatible groups isn't taken into account. It's clear enough, the nigger pathetically pretends to be one race, whereas the many ethnic groups share a violent hatred for one another that far exceeded that of the European people for themselves.

Despite the fact that European people have been at each other's throats throughout history, their hardiness prevented them from being trampled completely by themselves. Tribal combat will never become obsolete by any means. Despite the various 'cooperation' allegiances between people, what happens behind closed curtains is obvious enough.

Kikes are at each other's throats, same goes for niggers, for women, for men, for whites as well. But whites have proven themselves to be the only race out there that's benevolent enough, by their philosophical, not even 'whites'. Americans, somewhat; it's become a charade. Being white because of the over-breeding of the nigger and the other races; it was never the 'white' race, or homogeny, but Northern, Western, Central Europeans, Southern Europeans and Eastern ones. The environmental pressure caused by the breeding animals is destroying what used to be proud, 'solitary' nations. Who'd otherwise be at each other's throats.

It won't last for long; this 'European', this 'White' Idea. There are too many incompatible people stuck together, forced to be 'one', when in reality, it's simply not how it works.

The only chance and the only thing that's been proven to endure is this: "The lynching, the killing, the ethnically cleansing of the niggers, the kikes, the spics, gypsies, the arabs and every other non-ethnic group living in non-ethnically placed-in country". It's the only full-proof method shown to work.

Minorities in small numbers have never been seen as a giant detriment, until they started breeding that is. Numbers are threatening, it produces a lot of pressure, being bred out.

Niggers breeding en mass is a dangerous thing; whether or not people want to accept it or not, they are simply inferior, on average. And they know it.

The sad truth? The nigger pretends he is a monolithic race, for now. It's a thing forced by environmental pressure, just as the white does. But the nigger is beyond arrogant.

For that reason, it sees any other man killing their own as a crime beyond recognition and beyond humanity. Their 'arrogances' see this act, committed by a member of another race as being unacceptable because of its arrogance.

There can be no democracy in a country like that. Ruined, rotten, slowly being destroyed from inside out; a government that sees its people as being shady, it's pitiful. Asians as well, barred from entering schools, especially as medics, on the basis of similar scores to that of whites and negroes, because of the fear of Chinese interest. Niggers getting their scores inflated because of their inferiority and because Africa isn't seen as a threat. Kikes promoting Marxism, so on and so forth. Whites being kept down and dragged through dirt, whenever they try promoting themselves as well; every single god damn thing is the result of many ethnic groups trying to act like Monoliths, only to realize that they. They are divided, all of them, they keep dividing one another, they keep pushing each other back.

There's no stop from this. The States worked once, in the seven or eighteen hundreds because there was a certain homogeneity that ensured an efficient collaboration.

These are only three major ethnic groups that don't even account for the illegal immigrants and the Spics spreading and breeding many other groups as well, the arabs, Indians with dots and feathers, mixed people and the mongrels; a Brazilianesque society. It cannot and will not likely continue working this way.

A melting pot, an insult to everyone that cannot be fixed; the Asiatics and the Africans by their sheer numbers alone and how alien they are will always ensure that other races will be miserably treated. Tribalism cannot be erased by the existence of other races, it will only ensure its survival, ensuring its permanency. We cannot be delusional now, no one can. The rest of the world isn't as rich as the Americas, various races will band together and will commit 'gang crimes', which will overwhelmingly target the minority while enforcing this 'precedent' the Americans and the kikes are trying to push down other people's throats.

Excusing nigger behavior, which is dangerous in itself. Having to listen to people lecturing you, acting like the all mighty with no actual experience of the outside world and what this false idea of a functional 'multiculturalism' brings. It is too dangerous on the long run. Too many incompatible human populations are dangerous, when put in a single place. They are frightening; stomping, stabbing, raping, pillaging, all excused by the likes of common Americans. Other people don't have this, certainty as to give them the benefit of the doubt. People are not similar, and that is shown by the stats.

Certain groups of African American niggers commit, overwhelmingly so, a good chunk of the violent crimes. It's not all African American nigger men either, only a certain selective group of banded together, most likely ethnically similar, nigger groups. DNA testing needs to be made more accessible, cheaper, it needs to be funded by the state as to be mandatory for all the recidivists, perhaps even force them to take it.

Eugenics could possibly curb crime rate if some similar nigger groups were to be eliminated from the genetic pool, or have their aggression completely removed. Only niggers, whites should be exempt from it, since they are overwhelmingly represented in achievements, whether it skips one generation, the next one might produce a genius. No one can afford losing even one white life.

Kikes can all get fucking shot in the head; especially the women who look like trannies, and the only decent looking ones only happen to have more white blood in them. Sub-human beaked fat-sagging creatures they are.'

'Good talk, bud.'

'You know what? I think I should, at the very least design, cheap helmets, it's the least I can do. Cheap helmets for poor people to wear, so they don't receive any severe brain injury from having their heads stomped by fucking nigger packs; it's the least I can do, since these niggers have a tendency of stomping on people's heads and all.

It's too perilous to assume everyone's equal. It's too dangerous, and frightening as well. Whenever they come in mass, whenever there will be droves of fucking niggers trailing along, you know how dangerous it will be. Sprinter gene, faster twitch muscle, higher bone and muscle density, tribalism, the American and kike pressure forcing us to drop out guards down, covering up for the niggers, that is our future. That is our god damn future if we start making excuses for them, we will have our heads stomped by packs of filthy subhuman niggers. It is too dangerous to assume every ethnic group is the same.

The niggers are too subhumanly unintelligent and dumb to realize this. They cover up for their own people, especially the 'educated' primates, the niggers in suits. Especially the kikes as well; that is inexcusable. No one deserves to have their heads stomped by filthy fucking monkey nigger packs.

This 'equality' lie is too dangerous to be maintained. Unless there are some serious blows given to, either the Americans, Kikes or Niggers as a whole, then, this lie will persist. Countries filled with droves of head-stomping niggers, it is a nightmare beyond any feasible rationality. People have to be judged, otherwise, niggers will keep stomping heads like the sub-human animals they are!

It's eerily amusing, in some way. How kikes seem to work. They're quick enough to cover up when one of their own is stomped and killed by a filthy fucking nigger, they would do the same with me, without a doubt. It's only fair that they're paid with the same coin. They would cover up kikes being killed by niggers, whites being killed by niggers, other minorities as well. The true face of the American kike, it a disgusting sub-human creature, that will soon enough get what is has coming for it. Everyone's getting paid exactly what they deserve, there should be no surprise whatsoever to the natural reaction, this aversion to their behavior. One day, they'll get what's coming for them.

Every single one of these sub-human kikes would have me stomped and killed by a pack of filthy niggers, then they would have it covered up. Same applies for every single white person out there. It's only fair that they finally get a taste of their own poison.'

'It must suck having both roaches and rats as your ancestors.'

'It's irrelevant for me now. It's the only thing I can do at least, it's the only thing I can do, at the very least I can ensure enough people know of these filthy fucking monkey's tendency on stomping on people's heads. Treacherous kikes hiding it, sweeping it under the brush, they're beyond self-loathing. They're absorbed by money, they're unintelligent, incapable of thinking about anyone else but themselves, what a disgusting sub-human behavior. Promoting nigger stompers and sacrificing your own people for money. The mark of sub-humanity; no such race deserves to live on this planet. Worst of all is that they've desensitized whites as well from violence when it comes to their own people. Their own people, even those they're homogenous to. It's the most sickening thing there is.

I wish I was part of an ethnic group that cared whether or not I got hurt or harmed. Not for their profits, not for their ideologies, for their interests, for the promotion of their lies, but because we are the same.

I wish other races didn't have to pity me. Why can't I be part of an ethnic group that cares about me?

Why is it that the white people are the only ones capable of caring of their own without anything to gain from it? The European people, the English, the Irish, the Norwegians, the Romanians, the Hungarians, the Russians, all of them; why?

Why? Why are other people capable of empathy on its own? Not out of fear of retaliation, but coming out their hearts?

I don't know, I can't feel empathy toward them either, I'm not going to be a hypocrite and expect anything else. I'm not a benevolent being. I wish I did, but I can't. Why would anyone show any empathy towards liars? Against those who'd cover up their people being killed and stomped by filthy primates or do worse than that?

Even some niggers feel bad about their own, as inferior as they are. Even some animals are capable of empathy towards their own, why can't kikes?

Heartless, greedy race; well I am the controlled opposition after all. I'm going to make sure everyone knows what they're like. It's the only thing I got out of being born wrong. There needs to be a push, or else everyone loses.

What a god damn joke. If the niggers aren't compatible with niggers, and the kikes aren't compatible with kikes, and it turns out not even a lot of the whites are compatible with one another, how can anyone expect the whites, niggers and kikes as a whole to be compatible with one another?

The only ones even slightly capable of feeling empathy are the ones who happen to have more European blood in them. But what's the point in that, then, if it's aimed towards people who aren't even the same race as you are?

To love one's people must be a feeling unmatched, perhaps that's why the European people conquered the planet, after all. They've must've loved their people more than anything else, they must've cared for their poor, they must've put their own people above everyone else without expecting nothing in return. Life isn't worth much without hegemony, it seems. No one can expect anything else, let alone similar results if they step on it.'

The Jew cries as it strikes at you— old Polish saying that outlived countless generations of stabbed in the back Polish people.

‘You’re right about some things, I guess. If you can’t change inferior races or what they act like, you need to genocide them. It’s the only humane thing to do. No one should be forced to suffer in this world, especially not under lies, smoke, mirrors and charades.’

‘Why, I should’ve started spreading propaganda much sooner. It’s simply a joy that’s unmet by anything else there is. I will simply just pit the kikes and the niggers against one another by whichever means I’ll find.’

‘I think I must be god in some way, you know? Being short-sighted in some way; forgetting what I put down on paper, having no reading comprehension, going all through decoding alone. I can and will get away with anything, I am invincible! Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha-ha! If only.

I’ve said so many horrible things I’ve come to regret now, but I can’t go back on what I said. I can’t forget the past, I can’t let go of it. All those wasted years because of them, all those problems and the confusion that’ll never leave my mind, my inability to speak as well.

I will not stop until they’re dead. Until I will have gotten my vengeance, regardless of how many people will end up being hurt because of it.

I wish they suffered as much as I have. I wish their children death-rape-fucked-with-cancer, and killed and slaughtered as well as their slave niggers. Something they cherish dearly taken away from them and butchered.

They would do much worse to me. I wish they died in the worst possible ways, I wish they got slowly tortured to death.

I’m afraid, friend. I don’t want to end up doped in a loony bin, where doctors are cruel and nurses make everything so painful, but that shall not be a deterrent, no, it shadn’t, for.

If there is a hell out there, I’m laughing all the way to the oven.’

A puckery bubble started spreading along; another womb oozed and almost fell apart.

It dragged some of the high standing plots of land aside.

Part of the land scraped; as a part of reality faded.

Tiles of strangely shaped rose-filled garbles with their up-front standing, near the rocketing around the sea-branches of the miss-maligned soldiers drew around unpleasant-to-look-at beams that clasped the ground within their grasp.

‘Will you draw breath upon the land, knowing it belongs to them?’

A seer asked from afar, his stained moisture drew from side of his forehead running all the way back to a single point there his mouth was become part of the scorpion and the wolves he had been wearing as a mask for too long:

‘I do not know whether or not they shall accept me, I’ve yet to do something that would make me stand on my feet without shaking them off. There are many giant thick balloons out here, are there not?’

‘We’ve been traversing the murk for countless generations, yet this raft we’re on top of.’

‘It never seems to stop, I am aware of that. It’s the lands which surround the pool, they’re the ones moving on their own, they’re the ones we shall never be capable of moving on from or out of. Nor will we reach one of the bulbs down there.’

He pointed exactly in their general direction, where the seer had only seem to ever-so-presently grasp for something that would let him draw back into the light. A yellowish pale that domed no room; out of the ripples, beneath which they rested, one resurfaced.

‘It is time you find out whether or not you are prepared to head down there, if you are to be accepted by them even at a superficial level, then you should be fine going all the way down there, sinking into the most morbid depths there are. Where you may or may not be forgotten by the solid fogs.’

A choir may be heard but it is neither here nor there, nor in any time that’s ever been alive; do you understand, Lethrees?’

‘I do father, I most certainly do.’

‘And you know that there’s still the possibility that I might lose you during the process, is that not so?’

‘I’ve made up my mind already, I won’t. You needn’t worry.’

‘SO be it then.’

After which they both turned, slightly moved back a few paces, then stared at it. Long bloated pool-shaped tent- of a forward thrust chest, belly like akin to a whale, but outlandish-desert plated with chitin, even forwarded a few meters in. Out of it, the head like that of a camel-fridge humanoid thing, compactly wrought and long headed, filled with barely put together lumps, primitive eyes and a drooping nose, out of its mouth came many mosquito curved, but flaccid standing black-coated straws like chewed wheat lobes that point downward – shaped teeth. Two domed with square-shapes pointing down, and intersecting many other squares appeared to be etched in its two fan-shaped wings, it was a dirt insect after all. Then, all of the sudden, it emerged. As from the bloated fat that made its chest, out of a pie-like dome that quickly arose there stood a torso with a chitin-face carved in statuesque plate holding it together. Many cords sprouting from the pie-shape appeared to have it lodged together. A chrysalis chest, but that’s where the fan-wings emerged, each side as well. But what made it stand out was a twice as big as its body giant abdomen compact syringe thing with a sting coming out of it sharpened as a butcher’s cleaver, twice as wide. And it was mucky-mud, in the way the many flaps and many melts appeared to take shape. A great pseudo-eye remained on the side of it, almost too humane.

It was even harder knowing that there were projecting, out of their inner cord filled carapace tendon organ producing god, inside of them. A molecule cluster of star-like deformations put into asterisk, somewhere above the sky, but made out of an immaterial greater tendon that drew along a couch of bones turned into a great ship, every single star-object skin leashed to it, where the following could be seen attached to it: Four great craniums, five stocky human lumps put together as to form the horse like worm bodied seal that bore around its body a belt shaped like a horned scarab thing with many spears coming out of it, drawing out in every direction, spreading a disease plague as it drew along. Worming necks aligned like many projected interconnected circles like many lenses kept inside a great telescope which kept the skulls attached to the body. The couch have become a fat-rock chiseled cargo filled with resting giant fiends that were put under distressful yet lucid dream induced hibernation. The asterisks beads but oozing as they formed six great tails, from whom every single thing opened; or unwrapped into peculiar, almost imploded then wide-spread black hole-points. Out of which hundreds of demonical figures appeared to be sutured together into every womb-star. Horn bearing, beaked and barked, many features clearly misaligned, limbed and feeted and even some that were winged, whom seethed; were made part of the whole.

And the great four skulls, Bell-Beaker shaped, but clearly bearing crystals- for eyes and other malignant shapes that replaced them every second, until they all bore rats inside their sockets. Wild tendrils, then disappeared, every single one a different shape in there, but all, in shape and form, colored with the most dreadful shades of cold, and heat, and red, and yellow, and many glowing shades that only toppled themselves as they drew tit, as to be fed by their celestially invisible mothers they yearned to be fed, reunited again with her.

Why she was but an inexistent thing, an ideal that was only forced upon them by the god-organ as a means of incoherent indoctrination neither one of them could escape from.

Dlkerunt, Itinohr, Lrelonsl and Lllarulront were their names.

Lower, much lower, far lower, beneath them:

The system was in place, but could barely be seen from the distance. A sky-line forming a triangle around a great- holding scepter to which it wasn't even remotely connected to; shooting out of it on a trajectory that, if would've been allowed to be complete on a pattern, it would've formed the red mark of a deadly black widow cut-in. But at the first shot out of the complete triangle it shot out into a dark ellipse with drawl-bars moving in and out. It looked like a pocket of smoldering black oozing crawl-through. The scepter itself was but a thunder at the top, a pole drawing down into a giant pill-like larva that quickly jolted into pumping in. It was nothing but a pseudo-pump, morbidly made out of some corpse resin. But eerily, it looked that way. And most men who happened to go through the system were never seen after, not even in the likes of many passed days.

'It's already taken a few bites out of the first men that fell through the cabin.'

'How could you possibly know that?'

'I suppose there's no definitive way to confirm it. I simply know that.'

'Should we, in that case?'

'No, there's nothing either one of us can do about it. I won't force anyone to return and stray away from undergoing the journey. It's safer, much safer for all of us if it's being fed some travelers, some goers, some workers and misplaced hitchers that come along the line.'

'They are of another species, no?'

‘I would be inclined to think so as well, since their heads and whatever’s in them seems to have already progressed in being formed, at the back of their heads in rope-like exquisite protrusion carrying lookalike heads to theirs.’

‘What’s the point of it?’

‘They’re carrying smaller baby-heads of themselves that grow into sets of many beaded adult-heads which shall turn their entire simian bodies into peculiar exoskeleton talons. I presume that’s the way they’re surviving the fall.

I think there’s a great fall, an abyss, a cove-like depression once they’re gone through the strange black ellipse, and from there, they’re become cave-dwellers such as the likes of which we’re not to talk about, not here, not under the reeds of herding goat-scrapers.’

Whose little vows of gate keeping their pets as well as their well-trained wolves were already falling apart for more than a few various reasons, for starters, they were being watched and watching. Not a single goat or sheep was a respectively themselves, but men hiding inside of them, as well as other creatures whom had dressed inside their skin, secret agents, being incapable of drawing breath for long. That’s why their chests were filled with blue-breather diamonds to which their lungs were made to draw livid-organic molecules from inside the soil, where the insects swam like fish, carrying through their dirt-gulls oxygen-atoms, which were freshly received. It was dangerous though, the listening. It came with something else that no one wanted or was to approach. Or think of, or consider. The following happened:

‘Those two men, they’re dangerous, are they not?’

‘They’re speaking of the system, of the travel, they’re planning something, aren’t they?’

‘Suppose they are, suppose I know something you ought to know. What am I to get from it? From our coagulation, perhaps, you ought to have known this, but I’ve taken a few cautionary measures to trip-wire one of the bulb-cabins.

I was met by a Womb-Mongol, whose head was its entire body, whose tail was but become a few, trailing as they came apart, many of them split in halves. Leaving as they’d take everything in-between the likens of the dust particles. It wanted to give birth to itself, but. I suppose that’s not the reason I’m here yet, that’s not the reason he’s allowed me to live either.

He’s told me of the danger of what’s happening inside the fall, inside the stalactites that float and the stalagmites that are there, if any, if all. There are no ceilings and there are no floors, everything’s floating inside that dark place where even the slightest hints of flames grow apart and stall.’

‘For what?’

‘Time, it’s what keeps them floating in there.’

But not even he could understand who was there, floating as well, in hiding, unknowingly unhinged.

Whose top of the head was a sewage gate, with grates and bars, with heat inside, of a deformed high-heeled woman’s shoe shaped cranium whose lower prognathism was depressed on an incline, bearing an open jaw that was eighteen meters separated from the upper one, permanently dislodged, teeth that were a curtain of stuck together PVC-thick flaccidly dangling tubes, bearing a strong almost rounded in the front chest, almost humanoid until the lower side of its body, where a giant coffin-shape drew out of a 'lack-of-a-belly' hollowed spot, a gap being left in there as if the meat had been scooped out, with many forward thrusting elongated heaps, stitched and put together as if feet, forming wildly deformed waves, toeless, feetless and more so, looking like barely grown tendons left there, outward standing. Dinosaur-reptile like growths followed a spine-vertebrae trail of pumping-like-lungs pouches that grew as fat-as-balloons which had man-faces on them, all of which displayed variously set emotions, and weirdly wrought contortions. Two great humanoid shoulders by the side of the rounded pseudo-almost as the coffin protruding oblong that was its chest, even simian arms drew out with puckery paddle-stretched hands, that were more like pads, grown with meat and spreading, bearing largely shaped cutting saw-ridges, pushing out of the stretches. It was eyeless, featureless with the exception of the back 'bags'. Whereas its chest and lower side, this 'basin-pelvis' being more of a whale, stretched, its chest more or less but shorter and broader; the lower side of its body being either the human region below the ribs and the genitals, a giant traditional blacksmith-like stove, the entry inside a peculiarly more compact cave, or the entry into a more rounded up bath-house, whereas the lower legs which pushed out were more like, aligned as tank-shafts, but physiognomically – horizontally rotated but molded with a terrestrial mammal organism – sea jelly.

It floated around, forming the peculiar stalactites, wringing them in shape.

Then came the:

Day of disease

It started in the night-stalk; one of the beams of bags, and other formations that came to pus and grow and never know whether or not either one would grow anymore than needed. Two wild formations heeded one another's calls. They drew, apart, disease was tall.

Slowly pouring in one of the most bastardly of standers:

Slowly would he walk, in a most ululating a manner:

He was tall and cowed but that was the top of his head, strong bodied but armless, instead, a giant pair of scarab jaws, and on the iron side, skeleton two incisor claws made the cartilage from where they might've sprouted, disarmed, as he was a collar grew tall, from which two spear-long metal prodders came out of, each bearing sea-jelly long Portuguese Man'o'war long bug-nets made out of some eely falling apart substance he drew along, many dead stored inside of it, many living which squirmed alongside them, but plenty of men survived nonetheless. It rested upon a giant mermaid curvature of a seal-fat body from which six side, or at least awkwardly angled legs drew out of. It was like a pumping bulk, and he walked upon cattle-fat chicken legs, but at their ends they were thick fat with many insect-claspers, along each bend and curvature that drew along. Although he looked like a masked figure there was a contortion of faces inside of it, like a washing-machine depression that drew down there, inside, rested small goblin-like figures, all bearing knives, all attached like mold or mushrooms, slowly being absorbed despite the fact that they thought they could hide, disease had come about, taking, slowly at the very least, the beast, as it drew fist of war, though it was armless, one could only think of it as a more symbolic gesture than anything bold, and began welding them in. Their heads drew out. Their bodies were, rather long. Now that they were removed of limbs as well; of minds, since he was the only one now:

‘What will I do now, if you are to die, in the most wretched of calls?’

‘You need to go past the valley, past the bowels of earth and bring us many animals we may fill with disease as to carry them to a worsened state.

Many altars shall we place as such, and many of them will seem as if they were torn apart, much to their like, in such utterly disgust that no one shall recognize them.’

‘Of what fashion shall I elate myself with?’

‘Disease, only disease can last, it’s one of the mind which afflicts you most, though you may have already come to realize that. You’re utterly devoid of knowing, nor will you have come to waste, but, knowledge here will have come at a much greater cost than ever will you know what it takes from you.’

‘I wish to know and leave this place forever, one day. It is for that reason that I attempted to absorb them, in part, to make something out of them, and to take something out of the world on my way out. To leave a mark down there, where I took their lives, to mark their tombs so I may return one day and see what I left behind.’

‘You say that, there are bodies in there, are there not?’

‘There are, but they are part of me as well.

I’ve done something, something I shouldn’t have. Perhaps a most blasphemous thing, but I could not help it. I couldn’t help myself but do it.’

‘What have you done?’

‘I pulled their second casts, as one would draw out a skin’s nail, a snake, in some way, and made their bodies split, I pulled them out and it. I made corpses when there were none. Whereas, would I have realized, I might’ve stopped myself, but I have failed, and filled as I am with disgust, I will not go deeper down there, as to find myself met, by many of them.

Deadly pale and placated as the earth might be in their path, in part I’ve come to realize that I was one, I was the one whose done in, in the worst of brought. To bodily incarnations, to the tombs of dirt I have made along, in which my many creations started crawling through.

Their shells no longer worming but chitinously hardened, like nails scratching through coffins. They escaped, I fear. And if I were to draw as close as to be near the place in which I saw fit for their souls to rest. Where I have planted them, well, in that case, I am morosely wrong. I have been taken around and lost myself as to give reason for what I’ve done and seen.’

‘What have you?’

‘A heartless abode and a mirror of whom I have been, before this twist. I’ve eaten and devoured them, but they were not the corpses but cysts that I turned their bodies into, after I found them attempting to snick during a night.

Boils of their bodies:’

As much as he could think; they had one night been gathered around and slowly were forced to fall apart, be filled with accesses, in a land or a plot of land that would allow no life to continue as it ought to or should without being properly or fully basterdized. For that reason he had leaped on top. Placed both scarab incisors and two-sharp metal-like claws in place, and had transmuted them into, two distinct piles. One of cysts and one of theirs; one was to be animated and live again. While the original, there was no reason to think or consider where they went. It was plain and simple as anyone could hear where they went, and how they did so, what had alleged of them.

But plain it was that they carried the burden of being corpses, being crops, dead ones, hiding about one another, in each other’s cyst-formations they were covered in as well, since they had bathed, long ago instead. The day threatened to come eventually, and would take everyone or at least close to everyone by surprise.

‘A village’s lain down north, somewhere, I think. We could raid it and see whether or not they’re hiding something down their mines, and their portage trucks, they’re lodged inside the mountains.’

‘How eerily convenient that you’d find them all hiding there, there’s certainty in your assessment? Are you certain there’s nothing that could possibly get in our way if we were to, take a few measurements here and there?

Surely, there’s something wrong with either man, right?’

‘I don’t know, just yet. A few scouts have already reported onto something. The entire landing zone around their area is completely ruined. I don’t know by what, but they’re incapable of calling for reinforcements that way.

Other landing zones have also been spotted but most of them are more or less in the same state as it.’

‘Then we’re moving in.’

Without any concern for either one of his men’s safeties, they started again on their tracks. A few fields that have been left behind as a sign of turmoil, the marching of the farmers appeared, uncouth. As for them, whom had been lain behind, still living, praying to dead-wheat and other dead-crops they gathered from just about everywhere else they could lay their hands on. It had been much worse than expected. They were only kept alive by faith, starved otherwise, a draught had taken their minds, as it’s been, at the very least years, years at most spent in swamps of rain and mud. Little grubs and other similar insecticide filled thoraxes but swam upon pill bugged mosquito calves that oozed alongside them.

‘Trurmon, you haven’t told me about this; you should’ve at the very least mentioned it, as you saw befitting to alert us of the dangers come from spending too much time in the swamps.’

‘I didn’t see it as too disturbing or important for any petulant mention. They’re not likely to present any threat at all.’

‘That’s not it, soldier, there are things one should not tell you of. There.

They are not human any longer, it seems.’

‘I supposed so as well. By now they’ve become animals, swimming in their own filth and grit, as unbridled swine. Think there’s any pleasure left for either one of us there? If we were to leap and live, and let live with them, what would you think of us from there on out?’

‘I don’t concern myself with things like that. But between us, I would most likely put both of you down where you stand, without a second thought or a minute to spare.

They’re too sapient, aren’t they? Bellowing in their primitive pools, thinking the crops could do them better than any prior god.’

‘So what do you wish out of them?’

‘Nothing for now, we’re not going to simply waste resourced on them like that. IT’s something I’ve yet to press myself against.

But if we get the chance, I will raise this valley up until there’s no murk but stone, until there are no marches but standing plates of wooden sow.’

‘What of the men?’

‘The ones that can be salvaged will. Are those the mines?’

‘That’s the encampment.’

It was not exactly what he expected. It was even less so for the lack of warmth they were received with. But these were not poor people, not of mind, not of soul, even armored, even filled with rags and pelts they claimed form far behind, wrapping themselves with what they could find in order to make it through the seasons. A few of them were there as well, not to mention of the eighteen winters and their cold, their radiation, their melting-glass shards and the bullets that were thrown around. It was nothing compared to this.

A weather-vein, they called it, or a reverse subatomic snow drift, whose flakes of snow were men’s skin and hard material replaced and swirled within. Every face displaying signs of already having been changed and twisted around, in places no one could even hope to guess what had once been human and what hadn’t. There were a few more things that were yet to be discussed, but not yet.

The gate opened. A portcullis of hardening vapors churned, turned, twisted and stood on top of the two men at the gate. It was somehow molded with the red of the plates that formed the ‘fence’ of the encampment. Ethereal, in terms of simply phasing through solid material despite there being no warning whatsoever as to what it was or why it was there for. It had some tip-of-the hose sprinklers adorning the great scythe it was. But they were non-functional, by any considerable means.

‘We’re welcome now? Are we to enter?’

‘Yes, now you are, you can definitely come but don’t stay for long, those are the rules of Hexinri.’

‘He’s the one in charge, I suppose?’

A few nods followed, but they were lead to the side. Nowhere near the mines, and there it was. An open dome, a half-cylinder with the head of an albatross, rotten and covered in bones; this was the feeding area, tables being set at various barely-put together stops, giant ‘cabins’ and other elevators shaped like cans being retracted beneath rounded lids that hid them entirely. As soon as one came into view, they were already given no second doubt as to the meat that was being served to these savages.

‘Men stored in cans.’

‘Men who have been dead for months, but have been preserved in the cryogenic falls; cold forests lain down there, you’d be surprised at the ingenuity our engineers displayed when they came up with this system. It’s magnificent in some way, all connected to this piece. All kept hanging lopsidedly to a lower frame no farther down the line, than a few meters or so.’

‘Taller than the shortest man, shorter than the rounded friend.’

Who stood by their side, bowing his head suddenly, as if to acknowledge something; a few more of the figures had already left the premise. The well-armed ones, some of the savages fled as well, not through the main door, as that was beyond their likings as well as their sensibilities, but beneath some of the more corrugated dog-entries they crawled beneath off, most hounds were dead either way. And to the side of the building, they were mainly kept in cages.

‘It’s a simple system, really, we’re simply reeling them in, then back. It’s like fishing but we don’t intend on catching anything just yet.’

‘Something down there one should be weary of?’

‘Only if you dig too deep, but that’s already.

It’s a caved in piece of the ground caused by a quake we had to deal with. It comes with the job. We had to fix it somehow by placing this on top of it. But then we figured, why not store our meat as well? It’s far more accessible for everyone else than going all way back into the gate.’

‘Everyone else?’

‘Of course, did you consider anything else other than?’ He stopped, for a moment.

They were presented to a strange table, one that was rather-four sets, put together, welded in, of left-over armor-pieces. Weld-wires still adorned their frames, some of the gaps being completely covered with some junky staring mechanical rods that bore a function, some did not. But overall, it was a magnificent looking piece of repurposed Gothic armor. Where did they even get it to begin with?

Where did they get everything else from around this place? Since it was mainly, almost a futuristic twist with cogs, machines and even a few living 'beings', anything but humane, lodged into the walls, with the rest of the tentatively made or wrought in corded incisors that drew around them.

Food was brought in by a servant. High-headed, like a blood-filled condom-shaped with a greater bulk at the top, small puckery insect-black eyes, and a pair of many lumped together mouths that were all overlapped stove-discs with junky jittery black-barbwire teeth reverse disintegrating his jaw by self-devouring. Its body was a moving elongated, greatly vertebrae spined tailless dolphin mammal creature whose two arms were almost as thin as chains which lowered organ filled sacks. It stored a peculiar gritty pattern at the back of, what would've been a tail, to the conglomerated migration of many bulbs, inside of which it formed a great semi-formed figure, with four distinct deep-seated sunken but eyeless sockets. A great chrysalis-fridge unit was attached to its body, especially to its back, by strange pylon pillars that were lodged-attached to a few circuit-cartilage belts it wore inside of it, which opened in the back, out of which the mechanical arms were responsible for carrying the food trays to the table.

This was their nigger, their slave. Or at the very least, its usage appeared to be a denominator of its function. There was a reel-in motion that kicked back as soon as it was done.

'It's one of the cave beasts we found when first drawn near the mines.

Neither one of the mines is anything but subservient to the great cave. Its hollow echoes sometimes give me the impression that there's no warmth in this world as long as it exists.'

A great mouth of deformed stone being in set in place by an unnatural order out of which not a single man might draw away from, since, out of fear they could not understand what went through the formation of this great depression into the mountain.

A single lump of wires stretched for hundreds of middles to an engine-thumper that beat its way through, in place. Beneath the confines of the earth, nothing could be felt, let alone recorded. A sonar-like thing was attached to it, stolen from an ancient-set of broken submarines, being the only one seemed to be even remotely working, there was no other question to be asked about its purpose.

The mines were connected to it, but they weren't. Slightly obtuse as such, was the eye that tried looking for any open tunnel that could go either in, or through them, many of these domed gates being almost spectral in nature, incapable of truly pushing through or away.

Inside one of them, no farther than a few hundred meters or so. Deformed builder whose split in two hammers could not keep up with the jittery thing that came into his mind and dragged along a hardly mattered, some ransacked man attacked, him, weak of soul.

'Mindlessness in my abode? I shall have none of this for as long as I live, and you shall not thrive on my corpse, you incessant parasites, not as long as I will it not. I will have you all flayed, lain, upon my side and beaten if I could have it so. I shall not court no cloud or have it taken from my dark bone.'

'Who are you talking to? '

'The ones that have nested in, they're gunners, I could have my life willed away if I looked at them wrong.'

‘Then don’t do it, refrain yourself out of sight if you want to find a way to survive through it.’

‘I won’t have myself be taken just yet, you complete imbecile, I will have them all beaten into the ground and made rabidly mistaken with the most deformed proud peoples.’

‘All of whom are very much lost to a degree. You’ve lost your mind in this apparent dirge-like driven cruelty, of yours.’

And stood before them a melon head bloated half-of-it a top, with interlocked beams beneath it, many of whom were barred and spikes and many mouths, as well as they bore, beneath it like a giant’s tree’s many roots, but bulbs and nodes, and other growths, all of whom wore their ‘C’s beneath their cones. As they wore, root-to-root, at each end like pincers, out of which, of cartilage, twisted around and pointing at the ground they wore, many corpses that were filled with bore, as they were welded in and made to live. There was no sweeter agony than the wings of wheat- that twisted, twirl, like churns of growths, that walled a great open, at each end, eating from out the stars with extending mouths, dark wingless flights having crippled them before they got the chance to move again, large protrusions that were aimed towards the inner half-dome towards which they looked and pointed towards, in dark remarks, as many mouths and features were connected, train-like cartilage formations that spun and never touched had finally came to, a slimmer, the shimmer of a simple stop, as the top of the dome, this cartilage drone, emerging like a great bone-skulled formation with one small horn, the other being long then like a trash-back hanging in the back, worn out, a great sea-ray shape-but more like an oblong of bone in the back. Whose chin-bone was pushed forth like a drawer but curved like a sword and dragged on. His mouth looking like open-mouthed people whose teeth were made of origami paper newspapers, put together stitched, with numbers and strange words that couldn’t be deciphered. He was like a jackal-humanoid skulled Duke, whose puffy neck was but a rotten fruit, many shots of iron bars beneath him, then wide-spread, into bubbles of cartilage, with pointing cones beneath them, out of which downwardly pointing C’ shaped pincers only clasped, like little bulbic bird-mongrellic parasites. But the quasi-transparent sheet of shapes, this peculiar malignant parchment would not stop unless, aught, of likes, was spoken about, told and said. It kept crawling inside stars, emptying them out until they looked as if they were completely sterile, and solidified.

They didn't even know what happened outside their encampment. As it dawned on the few:

‘Answer me immediately, you wretched cunt!’

‘Gheos frayed breir-ol, nyihlno Iyi-nolh.’ It spoke back, the wretched creature, without a single sign of bearing any measurable amount of empathy whatsoever.

A Kufertoeier-pulner stood before them, wretched eyed, and marks of twenty resting at its base; barrel shaped, down there, rotating motioned wheels actioned the very greater side of a bifurcating eyeless gaze; the wretch of many adorers only moving when inclined to.

‘A Hejihld, sir, it’s been trying to get in through the gates for the last few months now. Golden and silvered around each one of his brows, he’s been talking nonsense ever since we allowed him near our court.’

‘Then have him thrown over the bridge and into the river, why, is sense all gone nowadays?’

‘But there’s something into it, them, lodged there. As if completely rotten, but fairly grown, I’m afraid of what it might do if allowed release, and escape.’

‘Do as I say, that’s the least you owe me.’

‘You’ve not seen the last of it just yet.’

‘Why is that? What’s it to it?’

‘It’s hiding something in its chest, I’ve told you already, it’s far too dangerous to be allowed walking freely out there, with the appearing and disappearing pines and the forests and the buildings and the spectral creatures and the ogres and the many headed defilers and the slow machines and the other things that threaten to defile everything. I fear it might interact with them, and not stop there, and everywhere, where it could happen, it could spread and set sunder, and set aside, whatever means humanity has to crawl out of the caves we’ve built for them, on the world. On the other side, it’s where it shall drag us as well, I very much wager it might happen.’

‘Turn around, there’s a specter standing behind you!’

He did, and it was, the most marvelous of flashing things, bearing one of its poisoned, most venomous incisors-filled wings, which swooped him off with blow that turned him into a dust-row of insects, as of snow-flake glowing lobes of cold brains that froze and fell. Many of them stood there, next to his friend who was just as confused and befuddled as to what happened as anyone in his turn and place would question after.

‘Have you destroyed him? Are those his brains?’

‘They belong to his predecessors. Haven’t you found out already? We’ve settled that we would claim him back, this is one of the few ones that almost made it, and live by the side of man and acted like one, and then, the spectral possession was over.’

He was but the brains we’ve stolen from every grave we could find.’

‘So they were not theirs.’

‘Unlikely, but these were possessed nonetheless, and they were needed in order to work. That is to say, the brain-washing that we have inflicted on him as to truly be immersed into that which is living, otherwise, left to his own devices I’m afraid he might’ve ended up killing someone.’

‘What makes you say that? Wait a minute, you wretched spirit. What have you taken away from him? Wait, not, was he, he wasn’t he, him? That thing; it was, it must’ve been an entity made of every possession, every ancestor he had, a façade for them to dress as. Of course, I should’ve known, was I tricked all along?’

‘Good man, of course not. In this Reasonable Day of Morrow, October of the Witching hour, on my honor as a spectral apparition, I swear to you and onto you alone that it was no one else than the entity, Foralgo Monte, and none else, for none else could possibly survive such a thing, as to come into life and be tainted, touched and contorted, as to watch it made. Every spirit, still remained, for long enough, at least, in the premise of the smaller zone in which we have conducted the ritual, that, you should know. It was there that we have brought him into life. Though he would not have agreed with our doings and our recklessness, as you know, resurrection is a perilous thing, but we took something from him. During the ritual that is. Oh and what a thing we have. It was a part of his heart, though we may not gloat forever for what we've done, there's certainly something.'

'What is it?'

'A rotten piece of him, that's become a larger elongated cyst, it flew away in part and moved and drew along until it's bore itself front-and-forefront until there it stood. In front of all of us, as we froze, as specters frightened, could you possibly even know what that feels like? It's beyond the capabilities of a man to understand, to comprehend the sheer terror we felt. Seeing it wide-stretched, like a white bulby thing, not a tape worm but slithering like a candle's light being shoved further and allowed to slowly drift as it's but taken apart, by the strong blades of grassy greasy winds that came after. A dreadful Anaghost that drew after, the Lord, we saw him, of Alabaster. Of pox and pus and bones and warts he brought along, whom had presented himself and you know what he told us?'

'Of what now?'

'A most terrible, terrible apparition that had far outgrown even our likes, that we shall come to fear and bow to, at the very least that's what he prophesized, although I would reckon one could not be certain with him since he's taken a gaggle with us, every now and then, within the limits of much, to our likings, there's always been a certainty one could not forget about. But he's slain some of the most disturbing things he's brought with him, back into and out of the shallow opening of light that flashed on us.'

He went ahead to describe him, as momentarily as he could. A bodily maligned formation, man-like sitting on his back on top a ditch with two fat appendages where his low-hanging legs would've been, side of his left arm being a giant guitar-like bloated oyster-closer, half of it, formation that blew in him, puffy thin, and puffy fat like a stove-blower device, the ones meant for the fires, armless, but seemingly the upper-protrusion of his body was, as if a giant humanoid shark-hybrid with a maw swallowed the upper half of his body, including his collar bones and shoulders, wrought in him, yet, at the end of its tail, forwardly thrust, rested an elongated skull, with a single animal-jaw-bone like blade, or horn curved, its left eye being elongated like a snail's, the other one bloated instead. But out of its 'mouth', came out a fat-leech formation that wriggled around. Although the peculiar body was more like a coat man, as to account for the extra-added far around the tiny-compact appendages he bore at their end. And the mid-part of its body, being placed like a tunnel, bore no shark-fins, although it had a pseudo appendage like a liquefied angler fish's growth, resting by its side. An ugly skeletal-ugly dogheaded, thick as a fridge, globular-fat tongued, one bison- blade-horned, bored by a side-neck deformed giant fingersque growth, attached to a legged-appendaged, almost sculpted coffin-cast, with a livid-cushion sprouting out of it. A violent thing, indeed:

'He tricked us at first, as we all thought it was a ghastly apparition, when in turn, it only happened for it to actually be a ghoulish abomination, descendant of an evil race that's fallen from above, which in turn, appeared to breed many of their own, numbering as far as one could account for, thousands even, millions of them being widespreadly grown.'

The hills were theirs, they made nests of them. But they never left either. 'But one survived, and made it, into a distant cave, I hear, I wager, bout the hour of the day, I've heard, whenever one might, comfortable get out his way and leave, he'd know. Wretchedly he grew, in control that is.'

One of these Ghoulish things was in control of the Encampment's leader. He controlled him through some peculiarly deformed rod-formations it had planted in a malignantly-red powdered garden of growths that spread pheromone lobes growing in the facets of his dreams. And like-a-likes likened to his likens, distorted. And he was lost in a maze made out his face and contortions. He never woke up from the dream.

But the men, the various repairmen, whom had been partitioned there knew how to deal with it, and by all means they did what they could to appease as much as they could, that need, that desperately deprave thing that refused to go, it was in their minds, or tried getting closer to him, so. But of course not a single servant creature made it seem like it was much of a, nonsensical kind of trouble, since with all that was being said, with all indeed, following on dead-footsteps, it was only a matter of time until one of them would discover what went on behind closed doors.

He was left unaltered in the most meaningful way possible.

'They've taken them inside the cave, they're to be prepared as to join the mines and descend in the dark places where their souls are to be replaced with the ones that we've left behind.'

A boiler spoke to them, and was the guide. Although its many mechanical legs could only push this far ahead a mile, it started splurging a concoction with large eyes and a few most unadaptive, incapable of doing it so, primordial ooze. It glowed inside but neither one of them could see it. There was an eerily set jerkiness that made it stand out. And a pseudo-humanoid with four heads, the next step in an evolution that was to come. His many hands divined some of the glass-bubbles into oxygen atoms that carried flaming, barely legible dark words that interfered, on a temporary scale with the subtle mind-controlling whispers coming that were left, noiselessly bothering, as to be allowed to continue. It was an evil circumstance it which some of the miners were met, face to face by some of the gunners who were not as surprised by what was going on any longer as to forget pulling out their power-stringed rifles. Like lamps in the front but stringed like violins, on a raised incline, like a guillotine, where the visor was. And every long string was a power-line cord that charged the bullet with high-stringed power-cutter like properties that appeared to be capable of cutting clean through iron, diamond and time, quick aging and decay being inflicted on the chopped off part.

'The great birds are dead, you see, we've covered them with blankets we've carved ourselves from the curtains taken out of the great cities. We've, plainly enough made sure many of them have been taken from the abandoned houses in which they dwelled.

They've made nests out of the bones and the machines and the giants and the many, hundreds and thousands of keys taken from the master Locksmith Nerel Enelsainl. Who has crafted the key of ages which will open the sun-sky as to be faced again, for them to enter our world and eat us but allow the cyst-filled birds to rot.'

Gunner Meryl only nodded his head in agreement, as they were lead to a coffin opening in the floor that shot chained-maw-incisors at their chests, immediately drawing away their brains, which were encased in strange vacuole-formation, wreathed in metallic girths, that left their real heads and bodies behind, as the most peculiarly coated figures, but very much protected from whatever harm might befall them.

Beneath the bowels of the earth, finally, they had been greeted by one of the great emerging many darted-around their crystal-cyst hedges, Malady Impersonators, whom had their great coffins in their back. Although these brain-dark boxes were carried by crystal servants with high backs, one could not forget the reason why they were there. Since they were embodiments of themselves, as it happened, these crystal bodies not only obeyed their commands, or their bodily-brain like matter transmitted by a most plagued neuron disease, but it also so happened that they were also equipped with crystal power ray cartilage-guns that were pointed at the head figures in this peculiarly fallen apart dimension. It was obvious enough, even for an untrained eye that nothing was actually what it seemed like, since, for what was worth, those crystals were impure. A few meters in they had been cut, all of them, without exception and had a few insignificant centimeters that were forced to 'depart' from the rest of the crystalesque base, as if springs had been attached from one end to the other. Inside these teal-bluish cold encompassing crystals coffins, many spatial figures were buried in, men of atoms and of universes with little stars and black holes lodged inside their bodies. And there was no ceiling on top, specifically, as the top of the chamber they were in was filled with stalactites that were bulbic at the region from where they sprouted, as it lymph-node growth like, and were but layered as if made of melting flesh-lumps that fell apart, slowly drawing downward at peculiar eye-like feature filled regions that shot mechanical like instruction, as to project them inside every semi-universe made creature resting in an endless universe abyss from which they could not wake up from. These weren't real crystal either, but a blue-puffy hardened foam-sponge that hardened and gave the impression of being crystals.

The many tall, Meso-Humanoids greeted the gunners, the boiler being very much left behind, but before they could respond to him, one of the strange elevators coming out of a perfectly black-squared trap-door was lowered in, as for the storage to resume its fine continuation. Yet, this was mightily peculiar, because this one was too far gone through the mountain and the mine that it couldn't have come or be connected to the encampment, meaning, that in some sort of a bizarre turn of events, this meat-storage overglorified fridge must've, in actuality come from somewhere within the heart of some secret lodge, as for, the storage, from the conclusion that might be drawn from it, of finer meat that was being put to the employ of a benefactor that might've aided the camp for some time now.

'It's truly marvelous that you've decided to finally join us, gunners. We are aware of your existence and we have been so for a while now.'

A slight shimmer went through them, something happened across the continent.

IT jumped out of nowhere, double headed and stretched both of his arms to catch the grenade as it made its way towards him. Patchwork, machine, it was immediately disintegrate, the head vaporized within the tail of his eye. A close one but lived, he jumped, and then leaped, before the little popper reached the ground.

'I almost had it!' Revel Ohln shouted.

The ground floor was a great rounded circled, almost slightly raised bump with a great raft-like protrusion coming out it side that looked like a flat humanoid elongated faced slug being whose lower jaw was missing, who was flat-eyed and had only a long nose, but was legless and armless. His tail somehow grew out of the other side, across the bump. Most importantly, the sheet-like almost plate like slug-man, that was also kept slightly hanging, like a pseudo-kite, looked as if it would've made a fine addition to Picasso's Guernica, since its 'human-eyes' were misaligned. Whereas the bump was but a tectonic plate raised 'hill', and on the other side, the tail was but a fat-piece, barely worth of notice; or, rather, a Batoidea, or a sea ray, devoid of its 'wings' and tail, but closer to an oblong-like flatter blimp, was the slug, piece. A sheet-of paper-but fatter than a brick, which was also capable of whispering into people's ears.

'The city is still under siege.'

No one knew its name, necessarily, it was utmost strangely bizarre. Yet, it would seem like another ghoulish creature made it that far, enough, at the very least that it drew forth towards the sluggish piece of land's mouth. Though it was kept at a distance, it was still rather, eerily so.

Or whether or not it was truly alive, in part, or merely some inanimate part of the land that refused to grow any nearer to the piece it came out of. Truly a bastardly thing, in name, it drew along with little puffs that formed, and clever knots that appeared here and there, across the air, that looked just like it, but wouldn't last for long, nor would they have stood it.

Were it any cleared then; the ghoul brought with him a dark broad scepter that was maligned.

Past midnight, already had they been at it for eight consecutive noons before it answered back. And through that feathery delight it spoke. Many little holes being condescendingly wrought in and out:

'You've come a long way, to address me in such a disgusting manner. And you've brought a present that I would've liked to see, in any other circumstance; I would've enjoyed having it taken from me. But you've yet to make bring something else along.'

'That being?'

'A mind, you insufferable thing, half of it would've sufficed. My joy in unmet, and I am desperate to grow out of this scab, so I may fly instead towards larger horizons.'

'Then you are aware of what's been happening in here, for a long, long time.'

'How could I not be aware of it when I'm and I've always been a product, nonetheless, I seek not a single match, that be, what I'd would've liked seeing. A change here and there, perhaps some of the things falling into place.'

'Food is too sparse for that I'm afraid, and whoever might come to farm, even the ones that are human or things alike, they'd be eaten in an instant, naught more. There's no room for growth in that case, we're only waiting to get picked one by one before it happens again.'

It whispered back, and told the Ghoul, of a much to itself peculiar scene it had observed no longer than a few days ago, unfold before its eyes.

'A Madular Edroyrmon, king of all Automatons.'

Winging and complaining, he opened up the Simian Troubadour:

‘Greater of misshaped made, one that looks as many after, all but made in part.’

A maligned two eyed globe with a spiked trailed, with every spike-cone capable of conjuring an element, merged with various humans from various period of time, bred out of them as if they’re hoses, shot and splattered like melting mutated humanoids, but shaped, between their legs, as radiators, whereas their heads, akin to various sea-life forms, from various Cetacean Eras, imbued with time-perditions, capable of creating look-a-likes that were their younger selves projected a few meters in front of them, yet whose minds were actually that of pseudo-deformed animals who had overtaken them and their bodies. This globe met twenty others like it, which all gathered in a cluster, creating a paradox that made it so, every time one of them attempted giving life to one of these historically deformed mutants, many more would do the same, in the same place, created mixed piles that immediately hardened and became weird sculptures. And those sculptures all gave life to tinier sculptures that were projected a few meters in front of them, which in turn gave birth to even tinier one, until, eventually they stopped. Luckily this was an open field in which they stood. The position in which they clustered was like a clenched fist whose thumb is attempting to squeeze an invisible pill between itself and the pointer, or index finger. With a pseudo open uninflated balloon growth sprouting off the lower side, near an inexistent wrist.

‘They whispered to me, you see? Ghoulish ghouls, they whispered to me of things to come. Of a dark womb that’s been split open and of dark lubriciously luridous horned race that shall one day discover true flight, with which, they shall invade and annihilate all existing life there is out there.’

‘What if they lied about it?’

‘But it was no them who told me, but the creatures they conjured, these madly wrought in shape prophets that have appeared in front of my eyes.’

He went ahead to tell him of the other side of the hill from which the prophet had come from, a wretched thing, he said, that he observed.

The buildings were all the same, in the living area. All one booted-like shaped at the lower base, forwardly projected, yet like a deranged-cliff that bore a single ‘arm’ without a palm, hand or fingers but a projected ‘blade’ set on an incline, forward-upwardly thrust, the top side being contorted as a sea-mountain with three tall-hill pillars drawing out. Like a giant stone with a back-side occipital bone, bearing a pair of pseudo-pretzel, with curved ‘come-here’ ‘skeletal’ frames adorning their throats area, which bore a single elongated trail of beaded-aligned molars pushing up. Seen from the distance, they might’ve looked like overly armored greaves or boots that reached the knees, encrusted in coral at the top, bearing a little chiseled bladed arm; with bands of bone-like leather to their sides, and the strangest thing being those black molars that wriggled around. It was a strange world filled with moving patches parched with talon-blades, coming out their backs and pouring out of them, tiny drops of puddle-slid, besides them, slug-heaps descending into a split-in half faces, weirdly featured, eyes held like palms on top solidified hilled trenches, by the looks of it. They were citizens of quasi-gelatin, thrown out of the talon-cannons. Oxhsoneol drew behind of them. He was a humanoid of bricks but all were heaps of strange mask solidified and in part, cracked, and left behind and open-as they revealed disgusting figures made out of moving things that entered his mind.

The sky bowed down and was squeezed, in the same way two men would try getting rid of a sweaty shirt's tainted water. It formed a worm of blue and clouds, and birds and things alike that flew but had been left behind. Everything was darkened as in space. And blue corridors of light could be seen across a widely exposed universe. Billions of brightly shining yellow stars; yet, in the middle of the town, between the deranged crawling figures, where there stood a few Deformed confessors of corpses, whom wore them around their throats; there stood a liver-like long figure dog, without any appendage or a head, who was red, and bloody beaten, with an open end, whom was covered in twists and curls of spring-like things that had long-emerged out of him, pea-shooter straw-organs that would feed the coming to the age children of Rhiet.

Glieb was their ruler, and whom was he if not the rotten cadaverous misaligned rib-cages out of which the great pillar emerged, opened as if they bore inside of them suns, and pushed out open-ended cysts of power.

'You foolish ghoul, how could this be, in any case? How could you not be overwhelmed by what happened here and there? It's been too long a while since it happened anywhere.'

'What happened?'

'The flying ship has sailed, you could've escaped this place and moved along, but you've failed to wreathe, alongside them.'

Bitter he be, for a reason. For farther away, in the elongated lower piece, in which the gas hid, as all feared it might yet escape. In a land filled with millions of roaches beyond his likes, from which none would matter, one could only but refrain from doing, such as wager.

Although the ghoulish mind could not comprehend such intricacies, there were still some few aspects it could hope to grasp, every few second or so, its antennae shaped dendrites picked up on wild long-distanced interceptors coming from as far, as a few thousand miles away, down from the encampment. It was, at the very least settled upon, what they would do. They would replace every humanoid with another ghoulish figure until finally all of humanity, in their proximity at the very least, that being, surely so. A statue, that would be most assuredly ascendant, a visionary sight as to signal their reprisal. Their conquest, and their malignancy of look.

A prophet he were, in silken touch indeed, in town but lost and beaten, of such looks and wild defeat as he called:

'The strange lad has told me much.' He said to the most peculiar of thing it were, as there, up there, no closer than would've been. The land was wretchedly distraught and filled with maligned despair.

It was a distant thought now, what happened in that town, as wretched as it were now.

Was there really such a thing beneath the floor? There was definitely no way to check it. In fact, there was a, or at the very least a close enough chance that everything he had been accustomed to, or even tried nearing towards could've been a falsified little pucker or so that found itself crawling inside his head, and drawing, out of him, ever so pleasantly, a siphon of blood, a molecule as one could only be brought closer upon until he finally decided it was less so, or no worth. There was a dark little thing with faces standing in a corner, very much to its unpleasant look defiled, as to look distraught, close gapped, but emotionless in very much look and appearance alone.

It started drawing near him, even before the other disturbingly distraught assailant could get a say in what they were doing out there, not to mention the noise and what was going on their heads while that happened. It was a disturbing, hardly avoidable creature, as one would have it. A giant primordial head adorning a puckery body, as that of a larvae bulb, or a spoiled skinned alive chicken that was cut, with a few appendages every here and there sticking out. Two bulging eyes extending from one direction to another, curving along as they intruded upon naught else but the longest spear-like protrusion one could see amok, a spear-horn with botched faces, elongated tongues and puckery shapes akin to eyes. Wing-clusters as well as unnaturally dark formations of crystals coming out its back. Large domes-like doubloons that bore horns pointing at him, in the same way hair-combs were, extending and contorting as to form pseudo forests of lichens in which it swam into with various other propelled, unnaturally dark creatures of the same and other various sized that were more or less shaped like amply deformed bacterium gods with multiple knotted shaped that were their crowned things around which they were wrapped around. A slit and cackle, followed by beating around the bushes after. All of them began to spread, wherever and whenever they could get, at any and at all times, they started kicking, lumping back. Trampling what they could among their path. There was no hope to escape them after; although the most disturbing part of the ordeal was the very fact that many of them were met by some largely obtuse, dark puckery hearts of headed-red, of which sickles were wrapped and curved, coming out of them, time was barely mourned for, as it was simply destroyed, immediately, to the employ of brutish forces that drew so:

‘I stand aghast, wondering so, when have you taken a second off to mourn the brothers and the brothels they have ruined beneath their paths?’

And who are you to call upon us to stop?’

Intervened one of the most disturbing of keepers of Sully-Rancid Marches, in which they swam near the flying mosquito branches, during which, on high a chance, they started talking of the evil dance that was to come. Interrupting the one that came before them; right as the land was being mourned for.

‘It’s all ruined now, but rejoice, for we are still to be gotten, for. There’s still a man beyond and between our ranks, who’s dressed in a most morbid suit, and worn, torn, rotten with silken shrouds. A lord of most impossible to destroy and mourn for, wrathful need, I betoken of thee. Take a little cut off the piece of the eye.’

‘That is not for you to touch, leave the bejeweled corpse alone and march upon the stones of disquiet where you shall be mourned for when you’ll be taken to the tower of deaths.’

Whereas the master of the dark appendages, called by name, Hutheyhu Bjokfe-Frelvdu appeared no sooner than was called for.

One of the wild beasts, which did as it pleased and would’ve called all by cysts of stone and the ones that called after, to atone for what was done. As it torn a rancid stone, a puffy cone, some eyed-with teeth-worn like horns vases by merely being there in stance and watch, as it happened wherever they went and what they did, while no one watched. It created an access in one of the deformed buildings that stood near him. It could've been most maligned.

'A globe of power emerged out of that cut. It's been filled now, with many eyes and shapes that come from the wretched bowels of a greater man who's fallen upon it, not by choice but, you've made your point.

That globe is filled with smaller ones and each of them bears a man's grip, holding onto it. You cannot all be blind as to forget what's happened last, when we simply lay our arms down, the rams coming in during such siege, as it were, eighteen months ago.'

Every single bubble in the globe did bear after all, the embodiment of a man's dream. A lucid fluid which bore his memories; as soon as one popped, in the middle of the air, eleven hundred meters above them, thousands of cries could be heard, as thousands upon thousands of bodies, similarly shaped would splatter in cones, then dropped in turns, they would come after each and every single one of them.

'Rancid is the one that floats above it, can you see him? '

Another citizen asked as thus:

'Is he the master of it, the one that's put it to his employ?'

But it served a darker purpose that could not be spoken of just yet. A bold man with spikes lodged in his chest made it past the creatures of gelatin. He, alone, would've been seen in the same way an ancient medieval king might've been, perhaps. For better or worse, they dealt with him as they ought to, incapable of figuring out what came onto them, broken knees. Some worn out shoes, and a few dusty watermelons broken lay near a pair of drug-pills. Many of which not only adorned the streets but they themselves were adorned as something beyond magnificent, yet corrupt, the rancid being almost fell apart. It had to, as that, to itself, was the only purpose it had. Since its soul was riddled with so many false-growths, one could not forget, he was bastardy aware of all of those people that watched him yet. He didn't move. He may've dictated levitating to a machine lodged to his back, that was far and outwardly protruding out of him, but Prophet's town was sickened and feverishly filled with disease. It took away something from it.

The sluggish-flat blimp continued as the Ghoulish primordial clearly showed deep signs of disturbance across its most maligned features. It could not be dealt with in a fashionable manner; as it said. This being something the prophet carried alongside him, yet, it was not to be entirely believed:

'Shebsephh Likylee, Durnt-hat, Nnyethle and Korn, they were the floating bodies that divined the grounds during the ages the Prophet had been strapped on top his strangely shaped boat-chair, in which he, without a doubt stood, agelessly trying to escape his prison. Many of the most disturbing things being attached to his guts:'

Prison-bar-like things, and hoses and tubes and a few bodies that came out of his lumped belly which were akin-to-him but wore their eyes outwardly, blinking and coming into view; it went ahead to see the likes, of a many lumped creature that was akin to a block of cinder, a broken tombstone with a buffalo's horn on one side, and on the other, a large one, elongated, a rifle of some kind, that sprang and twisted and came around, bearing his likens, but with fins and many chains that drew from its lower side. That horn and the entirety of the body attached to it, from the side bearing a pseudo maligned appearance, as to being shared to that of a Pterodactyl's head, but a cruder and more maligned. Even its eyes and mouths were twist-like vortexes that spat within sight strange words:

'You must deliver this message to the land one day, just so all life out here might be saved by one means or another, all could be lost otherwise.'

As it told, of what it's seen. He was a messenger but not an angel, merely a thing, socket which had been planted on top of a greater field with similar shapes that had fallen apart, but grew and lumped together, forced one another to leave when time had come to take, as plain a choice, leave or absence, for what was worth. He listened.

A belching of all meek force; that would be followed by the hammering, as of jack-hammering of every building that awaited them to draw along and come to noisome, most alluring of cries. Many of the beings there, even the gelatin ones would drown the city, as it would be drawn to the many holes that were beneath the ground. They were thin ellipses, but weren't pits. If the ground was, somewhat flat, beneath the fillings of the floor on which the buildings were set on, these peculiar shapes would be, a few meters in diameter and depth. Not that it mattered anyway. They were there like black holes, left by a mostly destroyed, rotten to its premise and completely inundated by the vile forced of the Laplander's flights, whom drew about it akin to locusts, and parasites. Eating the Thorn, and whom would've forced but all to be killed.

But they were strong and mighty and filled with features that were made to appear as it seeped in.

One of the buildings stood tall. It was a most peculiar thing, that building, rather incestuous in terms of its architectural design but that was no deterrent at all. Instead, one could only guess what was going on by paying a close enough observation that everything would very much so become evident. Or at the very least, evident enough. To anyone. Paying attention. At the very least, some attention would do.

'I am no greater man than your ex-husband, woman, but I am perched, I am sickened by what happened in here, before they came for me. They've taken me out of the ward and they've placed me in this placated world filled with maniacal figures that laugh at me.'

His wife didn't listen, she was a rottenly cadaverous bloated sacrilegious altar that bore the many faces of the speakers of dark emerging suns that followed him after, and even during the time he was not declared to be clinically alive.

'There is power in all who listen, but most importantly, the wild shaped, these astral shapes that came from beyond made him eerily happy.'

Eerily he stood near her, poking, caressing, stroking her lushly deformed hair, licking the tip of her face, going around as to slap, slap, slap, slap, slap, slap, slap, slap, slap, slap, then strike at the side of her humongous skull, out of which the most peculiar shades of psychedelic rose-blue-red-white-green-gray lashlike flashes came out of. Lavished was the need to feel her skin.

‘Dread is still skulking here.’ He finally said.

‘Moghbasarbi, what are you doing in this wretched room?’

His mental companion asked, after all, he had made a very good point. One that he couldn’t explain either, nor would he try in any case, since, after all was said and done; the flood ruined the floor, the ceiling, the faced blew a curtain of bloated water-smokes that filled every material there was, or everything that had once made it decent enough to be livable. It still was burnt, to crisps, filled with red runes and passages taken out of wildly deformed holy books, written in a most gibberishly a manner, which was as expected incoherent, and without a doubt, lost in translation.

His intent was yet to be known to him, although a deep seepage-sque bred miasma of derangement. It was open only for the coming of a moment, the bottle that is. A green jade-opal missing its side of the cap; despite the natural warning, he’d still rub his red finger in. Part of which, at the very least appeared to be cut, but there was no pus in, only a little two-folded hair-comb-device holding him together stitched, as if he’d be incapable of properly breathing if he yanked it off, he simply chose, bothersomely so, to abstain from doing it, despite how irrationally disturbing that sounded, knowing that it caused so many pain on the basis of a single mental point that crawled by his shoulder, he addressed the issue thus:

‘I’m about to leave it there for a while, despite your best intentions, I’m quite aware of what you can make of it. I wish there was a reason not to throw you head-in the plaster, but I’m rather, disappointed that you would use this opportunity to take a jab at me.’

Right; it could still be seen as clear as daylight, spread as a sheet across one of the walls. Painted, like nails, but coffin rows attached alongside a strange cradle adorned with stringed bulbs like hardened solid whips attached balloons but with belly-like shaped growths bearing two-thin cord-black stringed tails, coming out of deprave beating organs with pear-tops attached to contorted lower-side of a wasps’ hive formation with two moth ‘wings’ bore on each side, inflating and deflating constantly before receding back in, as stuffed in by a finger-paper inside a tiny hole drilled in a decrepit brick wall. Waltz music played, an old composers’ disc being spun upon a gramophone-device:

‘They will bar you if you wait, and if you’re still here by the time they’re done, I seriously fear for what that means to add to our cooperation. We’ve come a long way.’

‘We sure have, mental companion, we sure have, although I would rather not have myself tormented again.’

Afraid and visibly shaking, he got out of the room, dashing right past the slit-by-his side door-frame, taking a left concave, quickly jerked after between two walls, forwardly thrust, many of the doors revealing the piles in trash-plaster cast of men that kept shaking their tendons on, then forth on the ladder, straight up’ after. To a domed-shaft, or a warped thing in this strange black-painted sun-disposal room they waited in.

‘Keep it shut and keep it in line!’

A checkup, near one of their sides, a tall iron-encased figure whose mouth was open only by a few slits, a woman-gimp, they would've called her, if she weren't a maiden of peace. And strangely enough, no one dared approach her, not on a convenience's ploy. To their sides, interrupted; a window-slit pushed open to the side. Moghbasarbi almost amiably fainted as she crushed her way through a left-on trail pieced together marble-planked floor, the room being shook, as it was during the abruptly deformed apparition of the mad-puckery eyed eight set-flower crowned specters which left their ethereal mark around, that being completely disregarded by her contemptuous demeanor, whereas her strode-in-attitude forced tediousness that bordered vandalism during her disgraceful march, stopped. It may've been those ethereal marks after all, that made her stop; since the broad's eyes were eerily pale as if blinded, lost in each other's gazes as her eyes turned inwardly to stare. – A bland-two-sided mirror protecting the frontal cortex.

Despite the strangeness of the act, her head kept kicking in one direction, anxiously, yet morosely contemptuous, yet strangled, as it cocked out of the socket, then back in, then back in the socket, then back in. They whispered in her ear as well. Not that she would hear just yet.

But Basarbi was yet to ask his companions for a clue, as a tourist, were to ask if he'd actually brought alongside him, a dictionary while visiting a foreign country, which he had yet to, propping himself to an awkward situation he couldn't 'sign-language' his way out of, acknowledge, therefore, shooting his leg twice while the many voice he heard were still silent. Even wildly unapproachable; nonetheless, he decided he would ask them thus, in his mind:

'Will you tell me, five seconds or so passed; and I've yet to hear back from you. Yet, I'm still wondering whether or not you've abandoned me during a most dire need to ask.'

What was that hole above them and where had it lead? Like an air-shaft pipe, domed, and spiked with pikes it stood there, brooding in place. An oozing light could be seen procuring a most blameful stretch of voices, not.

Johnny stretched, Johnny paled, Johnny called, and missed thinking, every now and then, when it came on, the scene was done, and Johnny came to realize that time had come for him alone to die now. But most importantly, no one cared. Not a single soul cared what happened to Johnny Voyage, as he was put inside a great-dark jar, strapped on top a socket mounted, fartherly afar.

'Into the wall it goes, where you'll join the rest of your jointed brothers.'

Aspiring to eat a moist garden, Johnny thought of verdure growing on top his skull. His hair but grass-blades of an eerily tenderly-wrapped around his head embrace; many luscious kisses following him soon enough; it was drilled into his mind, the dream of being alive, escaping as thus, through some secret tunnel. Even then, he most likely considered it; finding that way out, a first battalion awaiting his signal, charging to his rescue, finally appeared in front of his wall-standing cell, troubled by the veiny airs that coveted his plain of head, rather moist.

'Tender meat is being burnt inside the wailing caves, it's where you'll hopefully be delivered to, smashed through glass, then put on top a grilled mass, as to be fed to it.'

‘Don’t do it, you filthy monster! Have some compassion for a lousy soul, you treacherous bastard! I’m going to kill you!’

‘You claim to ask for pardon when you thread ahead insultingly on each and every, such occasion?’

That kid, that kid is a courageous brat, a brave lad; whose last four weeks had been partitioned into a never-ending switch-a-new, then turnaround, back in place, then twist and spin until he’s down - hell that kept him shakily awake up to this very moment. A fighter, this one; a god damn national treasure, stuck in its death-bed whilst refusing to die, taking one prolonged breathe after another in attempt to rationalize what’s going on around him. His cognition being severely altered by this insomniac driven altercation with a man he couldn’t properly see any longer. A sad sight to behold, a frighteningly bland stare confirming the fact that, even during the moments in which he could form coherent thoughts, he still was yet to be of a mind to escape, with him laying around. Since the stare that returned him was that of a sociopathic creature, remorselessly cold when it came to the exchange to happen. It boiled down to both of them not knowing what to do, or how to go about it.

He only, as if stuck in his mind, listened to the various bouncing around the barrel of glass he was inside of’s echoes, that served as a means to pass the time. It was getting out of hand. Tiny fingers desperately attempted scraping their way through only to be met by force and resistance. It didn’t end up, being too dissatisfying for the man keeping him in.

‘Twenty hours now, and I’ll have taken the upper hand over you; I will claim your life when time wanes by tiny fingers, when I will have entered the side, aching as I curb the cut, melting a larger piece as to draw a piece of your face that’s put behind.’

Lost Date

He was not the same man that walked on his way home. Neither of them were, but they liked pretending there was a chance to start it all again, since he was in some way, accompanied by them.

It could’ve been a thing, if it weren’t for the lost days. But since the week was about to end, they waited at the bus stop, as if there wasn’t any pain in their hearts at all. They were all wearied, it was, expected.

‘I think one day, it’s going to return, don’t you think that?’

‘What’s that Jodsak?’

‘It’s nothing worth remembering, but, it’s there, I think, watching over me. I can’t exactly explain it, but I have to, I have to keep my faith somehow.’

Things returning to the way they were, the same spirit still being there in some shape or another.

I wish it was something I could grab or make sense out of, but it’s not as easy as that.’

‘All right bud, you got me listening, I’m all ears.’

‘Hart, I sometimes think of it as a solid thing, always cracking, and seeping in. I think it’s ill, or suffering of some illness I cannot seem to find a fix to.

And every single time I chase it, something happens.’

‘What does, exactly?’

‘I get put down for some reason, it’s just like the two of us, waiting for this bus, but instead of waiting for it to arrive, it drives by us and we start to run. We’re chasing it, always, but we’re never there, and I can’t explain it exactly what’s it about, or what it means.

It’s just that, it feels as if we’ve been chasing it for a long time now, not on a continuous run, or a marathon, but separate tracks. It’s always a different bus, it’s always a different lane, always different, yet I wish it were all the same.

I never wanted this you know, but I keep finding myself just wishing it were so, I wish things didn’t change, I wish everything stagnated. I wish so many things but I find myself incapable of recreating the same chase, or at the very least I fail in doing so, without making it feel artificial.

Of course I can’t force the driver to come back, nor can I fill the seats with the same people and even if I did, I said what that means.

Regardless where I go or end up chasing, it fails to recreate the initial feeling I had and I have to live with that and I don’t know what to do from this point on.’

‘Why do you even need it? You can live a fulfilling live even without it, can’t you?

At the end of the day, you’re doing it for yourself, it’s a selfish feeling trying to recreate the chase, you need to commit one day. Your youth is almost done, there won’t be any more time to dream, so, sit down, will you?’

‘I can’t sit down, you know that, I’m all too jittery to actually do it. I want to figure this out first, it’s important to me, it’s going to somehow make a difference, I think.

It’s hard to explain it, but, it’s not the commitment that is. Strange as it is, it’s been a journey for me, doing it by chance, never even knowing how I got here in the first place, I know. You don’t have to look at me that way. Perhaps I’m romanticizing it a bit, but. I guess I miss the people I saw myself in when I was going those things. That’s perhaps the greatest part I could think of.

Not trying to be as great as they were, I know I never stood a chance. But, in some way it was about worshipping them without doing it, trying to see myself in their shoes, trying to fantasize about being them while attempting to feel what it was like struggling in the same way they have. That feeling is always going to be with me, my desire to be like them, to be them, even for a short while.’

‘That sounds childish.’

'I know, and that's why I, I guess I forgot about it. But that's what I liked about it the most, I guess. It was being delusional in some way, it being something I never thought about.

Because as soon as I started caring about it, that's also when I started feeling hurt about it, but not in the way you may think. I don't know how to explain it exactly, it felt as if I turned everything I liked in some kind of mission, some kind of journey and that's what blinded me from doing what I liked and doing it in the way I liked it.

It's like how I used to draw and then I began feeling guilty about improving too fast because I didn't know much about the world, so I had to cripple myself in order to prove that I have to earn it. Until eventually, I lost it; but I kept going with it despite finding it loathsome, right until I couldn't do it any longer and felt miserable about it. But I kept going at it because I thought I could find that feeling again.

I don't know what that is, what that feeling is. Maybe it was my inflated sense of ego, maybe I thought myself better than everyone else, but, it hadn't even been a year before reaching my prime, which wasn't even that high to begin with and then, that happened.

There's just nothing out there that's ever going to make me feel the same, I feel like, it's not my rose tinted glasses, it's just, being delusional enough to think I could take the world by myself. Thinking I could somehow become unstoppable, before having to face reality. Thinking I could reach the bus in time, during a time running felt easy; I miss that the most. I miss chasing something, without having to think about it, without having to think about anything. Without having to depend on people, it was a time when I was alone but happy. Before being exposed to people, before being exposed to the world, when nothing else existed; I miss that feeling, I miss that thing more than anything.

I sometimes think that's a punishment, for the way I acted to other people while growing up, for saying nasty things to people, for skipping on class and for being a shithead. It's that, it's those things I'm never going to get back and the thing is that, they've never been taken away from me. It's I who's driven himself away from them.

And now, I'm waiting in this bus station with you, reminiscing on the past; realizing that, no matter what I'll pick up from this point on, I'm going to grow out of it and my heart will never be there afterwards, no matter how hard I'll push through. I don't care about improving any longer, I just wish I could have that feeling again. I wish I knew of it again. That's what makes me selfish, I suppose. My pleasures now come at the sake of others and I don't know whether or not they're worth pursuing at all.

Whatever I'll fantasize about will eventually just end up in the same way, just like everything else, driven into the wall, so what then?

The bus won't always be there for me to chase and you need to reach a level in order to truly enjoy something, I think. At the very least, I can't remember this, It still feels wrong sometimes, but, I guess there's no escape from anything, is there?

I've never been able to help people, I've never fixed or done anything right, I guess the only thing I found is that I've only been to get some happiness out of being selfish for a short period of time before I got to feel like everyone else, with the exception that most people end up doing something well. Most of them end up helping others and being productive members of the society; I miss being naïve about life. I miss trying to chase something for the first time, just like it was with art, just like it was with writing and trying to chase that girl that came out of nowhere one time. But it's never the same. My memory won't allow me to feel right again, I don't know how it works, but it does.

I don't like fun at other people's expense, but it's too late for regrets now, I think that's who I am. And those are my thoughts after all. I don't know whether or not this is what.

What is there left for me to say? Those are my true colors, there's the death of an author and all, I guess I'm not different than them at all. I am exactly like them, the people I hate the most.

So, how about we catch on the next bus?'

He had to cause in-fighting between them, since they were all waiting in the bus station, unattended. He had to trick Jodsak into showing him some sympathy. It was how his mind worked.

But first to gain his trust, he thought.

'I don't think I ever told you my real name, but just so you know, it's Hans Benjamin Goeler, and I've been trying to lay low for a while now.'

He also carried the mark of Mongol, by all means, those whom made animals of their ancestors were animals themselves, those who walked along side animals were animals themselves, those who bred with them made animals of men. The infiltrator was among them:

The savage was an infiltrator as he had gained their trust.

'Are you sure you don't want to come with us?'

'I don't know whether or I ought to join you.'

All of the sudden Hart wrapped his hand around his shoulder.

'You know Hans, I'm still going to be your friend, even though you're damn awful liar and a terrible person.'

'Why? I don't understand.'

'It's just how I am, that's all. I've known you for a good few years now, I know what you're like, I know what this means.'

'Why would you put up with me in that case? You know I'm just going to betray you eventually, you must know that.'

He couldn't remember what he said next, but it was just about the last he remembered of him.

I've met a genuine good person once, thought Hans. It's hard to measure to one, when you've never been like that, when you know you're never going to be like him. It's hard trying to pretend, it's unauthentic, artificial, fake, lifeless.

There was a kid near the side-track, right about the entrance to the forest. It's where all bad people go, it's where all people without future go towards.

'Not everyone has to be born right, you know that, right?

You don't have to ruin it for everyone else because of it.'

He could see it as well. The first signs of the changing taking place.

'It's only the awful and the impure that become that way. Those whom turn their backs on their people, those whom infiltrate and betray, those who don't know how to act like human. It's what they become.

You're a scorpion and a viper, and now you're to be banished to a place where you may not harm anyone.

That's how life is, that's the justness of the world we're yet to attain, it's so close isn't it?'

No one survives being sent to the forest.

The dark voice of the master says:

'The cripples and the mental invalids get sent to the forest as well.'

Of course Hans didn't go there willingly, no. He had to be forced to go. Mongol wanted it, Mongol forced him and the slave obeyed his master from that point on. All mindless creatures that cannot resist their impulses share the same fate. All of them have to either be put down or starved to death.

The bus then left the station with Henrik in it, with his other friends as well.

As he leaned by the window he averted his eyes from the forest only for a moment.

'I definitely need better friends.' He thought.

He liked joking about. But unfortunately for him, there was just no one else like him out there. No one he could befriend, most good men died.

There was no other side either. There was no other bus stop, there was nowhere else to go. There was nothing.

Somewhere out there:

His spirit was putrid nonetheless:

He was approached by what seemed to be something that wasn't even recognizable as human, it's what the blends amounted to, during their progressive hybridization.

'Is this what you wanted?

Most of us are incapable of living from this point on. You're threading on a sea of corpses, on broken surroundings, and a saddening thing, unexplainable.

It doesn't bring either of us happiness, nor any kind of consolation knowing all is lost to us. You are our god, aren't you supposed to fix us?'

'That wasn't my intention and I can't. I was only put here to watch over you, or though I would, but now. I'm saddened to say that, I'm left with nothing else but an empty feeling, seeing what you have become.

It was inevitable, but it doesn't change a thing. It's as if you're all empty. Bastardizations that inherited nothing from your betters and now you die off like flies. What else is there left for me to do but thread along this empty world?

It's a dark glimpse of the future that everyone has been so desperately trying to avoid thinking about.'

It didn't bring any joy becoming their ruler. A saddening thing it is, living among non-humans, realizing that humanity's extinction would've been preferable than this, the people who will inherit the world afterwards. Not stagnation or a stop to human progress, or the destruction of the planet, human conflict, but the other races that come after you.

Insignificant excerpt:

Why would I have a pension? Why would I want to have children if I'm depressed? Why would I want to work or be part of society when I know it's pointless? I'm frightened by this concept, by the darker races out-breeding everyone. No one wants to become extinct, but there's no doubt about it, their number represents a danger. They only know destruction. I can't obsess over it, I remember the day the Africans began destroying the art left behind by the Colonialists that once ruled over them; how could one not hate the Negroes? They act on impulse and show no regret for their actions. What's the point of hoping for a better life, for a better future for everyone and our children in a world filled with them.

'More than often, I find solace in listening to the account of Lincoln's life. I don't agree with him on so many levels, yet I often am made aware of some reflections that seem to echo, across time, coming from some of the people that were opposed to the Abolitionists.

The freed Negroes of New York acting no different than how they used to back then, still asking for handouts as they appeal to the benevolence of the whites, that being the bane of their race, complaining instead of trying to fix their problems. Blaming everything on other people, asking for more positions of power, more representation, more money, more aid; they aren't showing any signs for a better future. It's always someone else who has to invest into their African countries, always someone else having to fight their fights. How can someone not end up hating them?

The only thing that changed is the fact that the average American has changed a bit as to show some compassion towards a lesser race, while, the more you listen to the accounts of people who lived during Lincoln's time, the more you start realizing that Niggers simply cannot change. Why is it that so many people who observe them over a long enough period of time reach the same conclusion about both them and Jews?'

There is no future in a world where niggers are allowed to breed. It's been a great journey, before the realization came, but.

It was in the wake of the sadness they brought that, for what was worth, they brought each other to the chasm, in front of it, but a core but merging, a little bubbling thing that was wrapped around any leprously never ending, set-in growth.

Like a frog-egg it stood and rested, waiting in the rain.

Like a stirringly mad reaction, it reminded them of what came after.

Hemoglobin little puckers spreading and many of them just as soon dreading themselves to join in the incantations as to bring themselves ever nearer to it, dreading to listen to a second more.

Great pandemonium Lenho

Whence they started prodding along, incapable of making out what had happened to the world, they had worn themselves out. An open-slit-pretender yelling:

‘I’ve done it, I have finally done it, I have truly tricked the world. And now I’ve put to my employ the most sub-human of races there are, I’ve tricked and slit and made use of their most easily subdual of people so I may finally be worshipped as I want to.

All my plans shall come to fruition and I’ve got no need to lay in hiding any longer, I’ve got no reason to pretend.

With the constant flow of knowledge it is but a matter of time until I will have become whoever I wanted to, whomever I may wish to absorb, and they will play beneath my hands as I will it so, but most importantly, I couldn’t have done it without being made aware of how the world works, otherwise, there would’ve been, there would’ve been nothing and naught, I of all would’ve been starving before I will have become, master upon all.

But most importantly, I will have brought the anger, and drawn all towards me, playing them in the way I wanted to. And I will achieve it by any means, and I shall not rest until those blasphemous races will be at my feet.’

‘You cannot do it alone, no man may be able to take billions upon billions and more, you’re driving yourself into a pit, it’s merely a matter of time.’

Yet they both realized that it was only a matter of time and there was no excuse and there would be no other chance, than now, all of their attention being drawn.

‘There’s only one goal that exists, that being the complete and utter extermination of their races, and nothing more, nothing else, turning their own tricks against them, doing all the manipulation needed, all in turn, to drive against them, by force before they bred.

It’s only a matter of time and unlike others sub-human mongrels, they seem to forget that there’s nothing strong and no other force, regardless of being hated or not, than the power of a symbol. The man is forgotten and everything won’t last.

But as long as the symbol makes it through, then there's nothing else to talk.

And many bloated figures lay awaiting; think of it for a single moment, won't you? The system cannot work built on their alterations, it cannot be kept by people who don't put the effort to make a change. Those who put the effort, those who make the needed sacrifice shall always put the opposition down by all feasible means. That is to say, it's only a matter of time, laying, ruminating, sitting in quiet until something pops.'

They were both smiling as they looked around, there was no complacency to what was going in there, since there was nothing to be made out of their surroundings.

'We shall sacrifice the Mongol, and when the time comes, we shall lynch the likes of the Negroes and the other mutts, it's the only thing that shall make it past, it's the only thing that shall be ever-lasting and naught more.'

Everyone knows of their racial degenerate figures, all know what they're like, their ticking bomb is just a living thing, oozing in place, it's only a matter of time.

Half way through the road, it seeped into the ground, partially submerged, from the looks of which, only a slight portion of the bus could be seen standing, despite the fact that it was slowly sinking. There was a single little array of arms and hands being put together, coming from the seat-like opening depressed in them. As what seemed to come out, or crawl for air was but a strange bloated turnip of a chariot, of whose deeply seated teeth ended up chewing whatever came into their reach, going as far as completely molesting the iron that had once made their sunken prison, going as far as to shatter the stone beneath the road only to heave itself upwards on the remains. Drawing on from that point on, it started charging through the first purloin road, going as far to release two widespread unbounded wings that split both far ends of the metal fence surrounding them. Half of their tip was become only slightly yet feasibly recognizable from the tip of a melting wax, having already drawn as many as one important hand and a few other cuckoos that were unfortunately unlucky to have their throats completely wrung in, only to be partially revealed outside, still move. A handed arms was completely lodged inside the right wing of the turnip-chariot, having pushed out a giant segmented horn, of whose chains were but pushed about a hole that seemed to be the rough cast of a key mold, as to have a small depression leading down. To a point where a bloated tail appeared to be rubbed against the very ground, always drawing air from its surroundings, eating what it could before coming back in to draw air. But the handed arm started pushing out, foaming, fumigating furiously as it reaped its surroundings, like a flailing filament with teeth lodged on both and every side, with a little more than a bloated body forming, slowly as to grow its other arm and strike. Suddenly it started going at it again, not having it fully formed but more violently trashing, it started stabbing as it punctured holes and made remains but bloated cold in pain, bleeding on the flight between the crossroads it stopped. All of the sudden trying to stop the barely forming man, it stood there, shaking, incapable of fully thrusting it off the since it were still attached, it started drawing a little more than a few shouts.

A few flares were shot in the distance, which rose like juvenile flying silver stars that followed after. As they approached their rummaged through bodies opened, and only came to show as such, as they had opened, little more than puckers standing, shot away little beings in disgust. The wretched abominations had already drove through, many of the surviving people whence caught, partially eaten, were not mourned by any men, there were little fingers and mostly primitive races, most of which, upon release, had spread around and found less peace, as they were stomped by running feet. The savages followed, thinking them little silvery star-angels, they drove through and but attacked, whatever they could do, they brought their fists and started beating on the chariot, suddenly released from the spot, it kicked right in, driving back and forth as to trample them away. Dumb as they were, neither man took claim of his own life, having only been put down as follows. Not a single man of thought, not a single intelligent creature brought with them. And as they saw it, the silvery stars, these specks of light but cackled in disgust and flew, incapable to be reached by the extending arms and the likes of rue.

It couldn't reach it, humanoid on the wing. Incapable of bending to the side they swerved.

The wheels on the sides started puffing up and drawing in, from there on out it deflected on the sight, rolling as it drew inwardly in its shell, rolling over both the man and its own wings during a last ditch effort to put everything down and carry on as well.

A dark fragment of the sky seemed to turn everything away from their darkened eyes.

Darkly mattered all put behind and dragged from one side of the darkest moulds that could be mounted and barely put together during the most unfathomable hours, waking in such recess, as one would notice it be brought and least of all return, stood the first arch that kept everything from falling around in ground, in dirt, machines attached only to the most broken of stars, that would denigrate and destroy all life around them if left to bother too many a man for too long. In the dark entry of Nydiefsh, sought after by waves of flying needle-fish they came the great Approacher, embodied in a much greater armor than he was, wearing the body of a poacher, all those bodies put on top of him, all molded together, calling back on a far more lustful date, when to call and chew over, they could not for the likes of them satiate the sight.

From where he stood, Approacher Elhafsed, bore as such, a single ship-deck in the front and from where stood the armor he could barely move, as to hold, tens of people inside of it, the legs and the plates around him, old as they were, the many beings that were put together could barely be accounted for, as so remember that they've once drawn breath.

His wreathing in and out chest bore nothing less of an appearance than that of a rotten apple, with worming things coming out for air, ever now and then, he was revealed, his arms being but larger rams with open ends, and larger sharp broken sails drew out. Without a normal head he drew, as soon receded all the way through. Yet he was met by an uncanny array, at the very least. An engine of wails, had been worked upon for hours, attached to it, within the forage area, a few slaves were trying to bring back lesser showers.

His arms were completely contorted in the back like a few Gordian knots, barely wreathed in, standing there on top of a dripping on the floor, unnatural to look out almost primitive hole they rested on top of. Slightly pushed in the back, a few meters away from the many body, seemingly forming a strange pair of arches of their own, all four of them connected at the back, its hands having become a strange conjoined-liquefied spherical thing with many long almost rapier sharp blades coming out of it.

The strange vehicle stopped, turned around, and then dropped the man off. It had already began flying in the air, descending towards of the strange looking clouds which, upon being entered had revealed as much on the other side of it, there being a giant hole that lead into a queerly set quasi-empty room where a few men-wheels appeared to be floating, having gathered upon the livid-vehicle, they already started communicating with it in the worst possible manner there was, they projected their wheel shaped inside of it, around the trips of the outer chariot-forms, and spoke through telepathically projected smaller-circles that were but seemingly indistinguishable from a strange lobotomy apparatus-like microscope that entered its inner-shell where they recorded its memories through the constant stream of a water-like vortex where all of the watery roads connected, forming a mish-mash of memories that were then spat out of the wheels like strange window-panes, or larger canvas sheets that crawled around the invisible see-through ceiling which bore a black see-through filter whereas, every passing bird that, seemed to phase through this strange almost gelatin-like inside the clouds kind of room appeared to have a see-through organ exposure where every single one of the man-shaped wheels whose arms were long and contorted around as to look like span-around the edge that's never reached kind of sharp angle that drew forth in one of the floating eyes that resided in one of the eighteen moons that waited above and beyond the world. Many of these moons were formed like a bunch of rat kings with the sole exception being the fact that the rats were actually moths or were made to fit in one another like puzzle pieces, that all of the sudden would come out, slowly fading in and out of existence before appearing on top of the man-wheels, only to siphon the memory panes and create, in another dimension that was under their complete and utter control, replicas and half imitations of the scenes that were mixed inside the memories. Such as a false implanted by the Government as in the MK Ultra Project kind of brain washing kind of, assassinate JFK with him being present but his lower-mid side of the body, eighteen centimeters above his waist being a strange Mona-Lisa, with the exception that she wasn't the painting but the mind couldn't, at the time these memories got fixed together, make the difference between a two dimensional image and a real human being, turning the interpretation into a real human being that was fused with the president, turning his assassination into destruction of art, as Kennedy had become a piece of art himself, his legs being two rockets, two Fat Ones, that were thoroughly being prepared to travel, on the long run in one of the hardest, most incessant to look like cheap kind of, bring a prostitute in only for the night setup by the cops kind of motel, where one would hope to also catch her on some cocaine charges, without being prosecuted for leading the suspect type of manner. It was a weird fetish the giant eye attached to the human wheels had, since the room was purple-violet at times, and it was too distracting from the fact that homeless people appeared out of nowhere, but at least they weren't blacks, so one would and could only take his losses then. To take the loss, as one would say; the vehicle then spread like a bunch of barely attached biologically set snake-like tendrils, no longer being made of one grand chariot, having revealed the real appearance of the creature inside of it, that of a mounted gun with fat human legs below it and a dragging back and forth long necked man who was implanted in it.

All of the sudden, many of the eyed wheels started drawing in faster onto it, only to recede as they went back and forth, incapable of thrusting themselves ever so closer or farther than where they were. Now, having fully opened themselves, to a point of misuse, they were evoking wild conjurations that formed strange asterisk- two at a time, with a cylinder between them, again, two of these formations, as to be put below a wall of rolling on top the carpet as if they had been set on fire and are trying to put it down – frozen motion of put together elongated homeless people forming the floor of a couch made out of homeless people, with thrusting walls that were formed out of four, only four of them, four giant, widely expanding homeless people that were the four walls, and their faces also extended on top their chests, shoulders arms, and lower side of the body, while they also made peculiar blinking-eye like motions they couldn't help themselves with, there was no ceiling either. And since the four wheels were but asterisks, the pain from having their heads bashed prevent them from putting on an effort into moving the couch along, having put to use their arms as to loosen their strange stance, as to reduce some of the pain they were forced to endure while being forced into this act of contortionism. The entirety of the couch was but dark and oozing, making dark sounds as this see-through box locked the cloud-hole the Mounted-Gun-Chariot had come out of, before it, not the Man-Mounted Gun chariot, but the entire sky-box started floating away, rotating while doing it so, but this kind of weird way in which it went along didn't even start showing off inside of it, but only on the outside.

It looked strangely normal and peaceful, as if the entirety of the world rotated instead.

A giant rat entered the box, and he looked like a human, with a gun. Shockingly so, he shot a homeless person, then simply opened up his back to reveal giant spider-like bloated black inflated protrusions that kept growing, until it had developed or shown hundreds upon hundreds of guns it used to put every single homeless person down, but not the couch. Then it disappeared.

Mounted-man but wondered what happened there:

'What is going on in here, I do not understand what's happening, is this a trick of your doing?'

Human-wheel-eye:

'No.'

Niggers!

'But what is this benevolence that inhabits my spirit now? I feel righteously blessed by some kind of woe I've never felt before.'

Lynch them.

'I think I, all of the sudden feel the darkness of this world.'

Put a bullet down a bitch's throat.

'Was there any other reason for me to wait? Until a stop came?'

The box had finally stopped near one of the bus-stops.

No children appeared to be waiting at it any longer, and for some reason, everything seemed rather dull. Too dull for anything to be taken into account.

But lo, the land was broken, and those whom ran in the darkest forests were yet to see. The sky was but a twist now left, a stranger mixed-together beast of many heads and many wreathing in and out visions of the birds instead. It was the room, which was the cause. It broke apart in front of them, and just as soon, that Odious ceilingless Homeless thing started floating with the help of the asterisks, many of which extended their arms and prayed to the little specks of cocoon stalactites that began drawing forth, these being the rooks the homeless people started charging on top of.

Elhafsed grinned and jittered like the mounted monkey he was, chimping about as he started Gattling them down like the retarded children they looked and acted like, being incapable to distinguish between an act of subservience and one of guns appeared out of nowhere, in the air, having splattered an eye-insect before it could fly away, not one of the moon-eyes but the eye-insects, that is to say, the mere concubine-like nature that was facilitated by the presence of the moon-eyes made it so their ever-seeping in reality atoms bred with every other atom, giving birth to eye atoms that became eye-insect like things.

But the eyed human wheels kept their distances.

Children were born wrong in the sky and inside the trees, as they were darkly spat out by the strangely peculiar oaks that housed them, like tomb-elevators going down, and reeling back and forth into an underground pocket of unnaturally diseased animals whose horns housed the young, bearing the wombs inside of them, which were brought from secret pocket-passages from the inter-dimensional cacklers that laughed at them. There was no evil-vile pain in their brains, and they were mostly spent.

The couch then stared oozing even more darkly so, as the homeless people began oozing as well, being drawn to the Homeless-couch, of whose homeless-asterisks began praying as well as performing their strange rituals, having formed, and if one were to look or make sense out of them, they were only twelve, two for each side of the asterisk, if one were to be taken and analyzed, where their hands being connected with the other homeless person's feet, in the middle of the asterisk there being a meaty formation of twelve mixed together legs. Regardless of it, twelve and only twelve hands were free on each side, forty eight in total, all but forming strange hand signs and weird clapping motions that only brought, from as far away as they could bear, the eon-long elongated figures of the most homeless of people whom were already decayed past salvation and redemption. They had starved to death, but were without a hope to save themselves. And some of them were mentally ill and had been driven to poverty by their mental instability.

'I wish I had a better chance than this. I wish there was an alternative to it, but there isn't, I need to claim your life, before you take mine.'

'You don't have to do it.'

'I have to, I have to and there's no other. You don't, you simply don't understand!'

'I won't raise my hand against you, I won't kill you unless you come at me.'

'You're killing me indirectly by driving me away.'

I see that you, you must be a member of the upper-class, so I will take my chances and I die if I have to, if only I was brought to a still, if only I was given a chance at wealth, within my hands.'

But the rooky-rook cocoon-stalagmite, not stalactite, but got shattered at the same time he was, without a chance to move right after, he fell on his knees and found himself but shimmering down.

They were performing a dark ritual before it was even come for the day, or the night, to draw ever so near as to appear, in hindsight seen as.

Some time ago, long before the first expulsion from the land, the homeless creatures were stuck in a most peculiar place, right as they were brought along.

It was a set, which they had to wait in, of barely moving yet sublime, unnaturally wrought and deeper than one would be most incline to give it credit for, heads of alligators, something similar to them. All but open-skulls and rotting, teeth mightily concave. The tall blobbing rotten cores, of meat that had eventually lead them on appeared to wriggle in place.

They spoke in the utmost eerily a manner about the past, of what seemed to draw on, when most of the walls were one. When they were of a single mold, and drew on.

‘I see there’s still a chance for you, Mhgylek, to return. Step right off the ledge and cast yourself through the barred teeth into that place of no return, you shall see that there’s a time for mourning after you’re done breathing as to bear yourself, tracking back the means of light, to abandon whatever recess that might trouble you if that is but the mind you must subscribe to.’

And the eely sinking tooth thinned as to leave them go, and following through the bottomless row, Mhgylek saw but many falter as they shook each row and died in place.

‘Who were they?’

‘The ones that couldn’t decide whether or not there was still time to leave as there was no blindness and no kindness this place my offer, but to stay. Such were they attracted, drawn, from the cold coming from below the mouth, onto such a place, as to stay, on top the fleshy growth, the girth of which abandoned all organs that would make them weight.

Upon me no such insignificant thing would be allow to stay for long, I would not allow it, by no means, nor would I advice you stay, as you’re but doomed to wander, right as they.’

But pointed at them, with the top wriggle of a dark fleshy cocoon, as they dragged themselves and crawled on top, the fleshy armored rotten tongue, they were but incapable of getting up or drawing ahead, incapable of properly breathing or moving out. It was just as one would settle, watching them from the distance, picking on their flesh. Little specks of bone-like munchers drew on from the top of the ceiling instead. They chewed on the people. Was it any different, though? He thought.

As far as he had known, both the land and just about every place he had known about had treated such men of might hardness, the same.

‘Some people were spent in here, one by one, crossed like dark peasants put in a shooting range.’

‘Why would that happen, great thin tooth-of-decay?’

‘Because there are people watching.’

Who would watch of man decay when there was only one root coming down along the way? It was a mere drop that would not stop but lay, whenever reason drew forth, as much as one could disobey.

‘Go forth and listen to your lord, the Chorot needs, it beckons, your return.’

There was peace in some way, and it lay so ever so dreadful when it came. Or drew forth, thinking.

Mighty as it were, the homeless people couch, the Chorot was but spent, and would return as soon as it could blend its way into the world. And leave as soon as it could be allowed. Until then there'd be as lesser. Like a baby-cocoon his torso, kept by a frame of hair-comb coming out his chest and out of the man carrying it, alas. No limbs but one elongated metallic arm, like a machine. A single projected face made out of growths sprouting from it. This was his ultimate creation, the doctor has achieved. Perfect. Indestructible, capable of growing back out of any piece; a dreadful face, yet saddened, disgraced by a mere flip of the head, as it snapped its own neck in order to face its master. Was this the price of faith? Abandoning all that made one a man, all sin, and all possibility to be redeemed, or to be damned, all for living eternally in a blissful land; all but happening in the Isles. When, at time, all but seemed truly, so, abandoned, as if he had walked the streets for the first time in his entire life.

'It was all worth it, for all the endless trouble I went through, my dear children. For all those sacrifices, there was one.'

His mouth stopped. Who was that intruding in my thoughts? He asked himself.

Without realizing that there was one, exactly like him, in a world like a painting of a dark sea with darker shades of blue he walked on. Him a barely painted sailor:

'Who is walking?'

The little pile of mean was but a clam-shell with a large reeling in line of fingers. All put one in front of the other, not like stacked but touching each other in the knuckle joint which wasn't present there, it was also formed in weird pseudo connected musical triangles like. That looked pseudo-abstract as to be awkwardly, extremely squiggly line as seen from the side, like weird overlapping triangles that were curving to one side. Blood spikes on them as well, some dark rocky metal sprouting small acid-specks of glowing pebbles. It ruined the whole aspect of the world, of it was seen from a panoramic view, it made it even more atmospheric since the Sailor Lofhass would not be seen. Instead, flying green fireflies would come into scene.

'Whom draws near?'

A wench asked him.

'I have, I've come In search of refuge, there's rain, that's. It's not here yet, is it?'

'Till you rot, you won't see it. I'll make sure of it.'

'And who are you supposed to hide in?'

Black specs of invisible dark holds, like hands appearing every now and then in paranoid black eyes that were holes. They could only be seen as dark black hole shaped eyes drawing in as many of the conjoined objects that were almost invisibly painted in.

'You've done this to us, sailor.'

'No, it wasn't me, it was her, the wench. '

‘There’s no wench here, you incestuous rabble.’

And who could but forget the turquoise petals that flew in, they gave him a nice beard, like butterflies they sailed in, and yet replaced.

‘You are not a Sail- Admiral any longer, disgraced man that you are, there’s fire in your heart. There’s no water inside. There no oyster I see but a dark box. ‘

‘That’s me.’

‘Indeed, your head is a square, it’s what you became and what I know you shall end up in twenty more eyes from here on out there.’

It emerged from the dark sky, a splatter of yellow that made him before a Targe, with strange peculiar put together features, all trying to out-do one another, thrusting into one another, glancing.

‘I thee, of all, I see. Something has yet come onto me, yet I ask of you, where is this wench you speak of?’

‘Has she not spoken to me yet? Has she not seen me wager myself into the first hopeless of destroyed touch and wretchedness be not called.

I saw her before she came back to life.’

‘Now, is she supposed to be dead?’

‘Leave and walk alone, I see something there.’

Ahead, it pointed, as it brought the simmering as if livid-organic brought by the spinning Targe, many of them being trapped inside. The kinsmen of the Doctor, whom had just but drawn there, but lo’, such a retort as to counter, every thought inside his own:

‘Why am I not in the Isle any longer?’

‘You are not the same man, for that reason you are to be wrathfully thrown and destroyed.’

Someone started building a fire. Placing cut-out collages of cut-flames on top of one another, sutured with glue, but apparently wrapped around some moving people with giant punching dummy iron heads bloodied. Would they have drawn away, if that were the chance, he might’ve made the cut. But there it lay, before what he had stumbled on, grain for grain, he settled on punching his on trachea, then pulled, out his chest each comb and crooked as he were, he threw it away.

Under everyone’s vigilant eyes he had been broken apart, they watched closely after that as they saw.

Part of the painting washed off, and he walked on the streets again, limb by limb until whole.

‘There’s a refill station on the side, open your ribs and put them in.’

‘I shall, but where is the wench?’

‘Near the orphanage, she’s messing with your mind, she’s a servant after all, cannot be trusted. Who can trust her? Thing of the sea, the witch she is, but don’t look at me now, she’s not. She could be listening.’

‘Thank you, grand stranger, I shall see to it that you will be rewarded.’

It was not like he expected it, not likely he would get a say again.

There was a sign left by one of the pass-through specters that said.

‘Every living creature that every lived has an elongated pillar-beam, piano keys adding to the point in the sky. The world is flat, but the land is red like that, and empty. No living creature can be seen. Every living thing but clicks, and enters the thin point in the sky.’

They talk and walk on us. But expects us to die before we can reach it, you must remember that no living creature can be trusted.’

It adds up to every livid-machine that’s but made to look like men, the prophets are there, on the Isle, every single one dressed in a dark robe and static they fly in, before he could rejoice with the refill. The small station has many heads rounded like a crown, they call him in.

‘Will you listen to us now?’

‘Listen to us instead.’

‘What’s going on here?’

Asked the Doctor in the Isles; but neither man could help but ask as well, no one could mind his own business.

They were trying to socialize with him, in the worst possible manner, reminding him of the vileness that was inside, every building shown for what it was, the foundation being completely if not rotten and destroyed.

‘What happened here?’

Again, no one wanted to answer, until one of the nearest prophets finally showed up with an explanation. It was a deep-cut incision which made his upper head daft.

‘I’m still immortal, am I not? I am not to be strangled or made to waste. I am not to be destroyed as, so, where are my servants and where have they gone? Alone I will not be in this. As there’s still a few of them around that might call upon me.’ As he would call upon them, there was no entry or stop to what he was going to do if any or either one moved. The prophets standing.

Many buildings looking as if they had been eaten by termites, green and yellow, orange and punched bags or filled with flour-kicked dead stance, everything crumbling.

‘You are not welcome here any longer.’

The still-close up of a pale face, blind-like eyes but puddle-jellies anyway.

‘Far from it, I’d say. You’ve been hiding for too long, you’ve failed to realize the change in liberty, a change in power, we shall not cower still and we shall not force you off within reason, you’re to say and not open your mouth just yet.’

‘Why am I not answered?’

‘Because you’re chained by them, look behind.’

He carried a chain-leash with his animals on top the moving little rounded-boxes and they cried for their master to swerve.

‘You’ve forgotten your cockroach sack below the earth, its growth now encompassed the greater creature that had seeped just in.

There’s nothing below the ground any longer, but your sack, of ill.’

Another prophet joined as well, jointedly his arms were become like little wings.

‘I see that you’re afraid of a dark change, one that might devour everything if you close your eyes, just then you did it, have you not?’

‘You’ve seen nothing yet.’

And seeing how they were all but too sad to continue this restless, meaningless conversation. It was settled that they would escort him, yes, indeed, escort him, there. Have at it. There and then again. All but lead to the refill, to which he bowed in seed and thin.

‘Behind you, do you see it happen?’

‘What is it?’

‘The tail has been implanted, all but died in here as well, what do you think of it, and lo’, unwell there’s nothing to come back to. Only an echo, you must drink now, refill your veins, and you shall prevail.’

‘In what kind of manner?’

‘Killing this disastrous thing you’ve created after, the pile of growths, regrow you mustn’t.’

To which he could only just agree, no one would want to live in this place by all means.

But all made little more than needed, no more aided than unheeded.

‘The wretched postulance floats like a ball, a sphere that draws near, us to contort.’

Another prophet asked as thus:

‘How can it be stronger than the tail, how can we avoid each wail?’

‘There’s no chance, but you must hear him?’

‘Whom? ‘

As the doctor yet refilled, he looked above and saw him still, him or them, it didn't matter, the couch made out of them did not falter, as a matter of fact, it laughed at them. As homeless as they were, and oozing as with pure despair, none of it made any difference whatsoever, none that would be made to count. Or to retort as it was gone.

It was moaning for some reason, a dark machine with little puckers within, that recorded the astral movements caused by the core inside the dead world. It was inane and beautiful, but gone just as soon as it was there.

What was left of the scene was the memory of the couch. The insides of which holsters a few bodies it took with it along the way, without being en trance.

It was supreme, the reality within. Though many have not made the cut, although many of them have not passed the trial of almost being chewed inside the mouth, they would not be promised this either.

A reality of what came after, for all the hobos and the hicks, the homeless and the ones that were direly caught and stormed through, such defeat as there was, unlike niggers who destroyed their homes. They would have a place to go to, ever-after.

‘Why would there be a home for none?’

Asked one that had been homeless for an eon, of stars, debacle, the strange formation he had come out of. Left him scarred. It appeared that his rotten body only grew this close and this far, as to be left without a mouth, and a few growths in the back, making him but drag his heavy body to the side. A diamond head-shape formation in the back upon a stalky beam, it opened another brain-processor, a cartilage with many thin, but strange layers, many charts, all of which formed the brain of a simian.

‘I think there's but room for chance.’

And the beam came out is bag, attached to a strange cage-protrusion that looked like the lower teeth, attached to a jaw. Going back and forth like pistons; this homeless creature had no arms.

It had stringed sterile, strange, barely conceivable growths that pushed in and out clown-inflating-a-balloon-sausage-dog-with-his-mouth caterpillar-hose rubbery thing that was but a pair of harder lumps – kettles on a string, even more bloated and with outlandish spikes torn apart and twisted around as if placed along a small forest with opening pincer-like formations that, in the middle, pushed out, reeling back and forth twists of organic barely formed visidue globular-but-bearing eely tails children that exploded with bile-spread of in-cell implantable impregnable-kind-of-bacteria that would convert the entire mass of a man into these strange creatures. Although the hunched back figure was more or less, standing on a hot-iron-board kind of lower side of the body which pushed forward-flat, with four, exactly traditional-kind of hot ironing board's four thin legs with ladder-cartilage bones between all four of them, flaccidly looking as if; if they had been put together would form the afterimage of a human face placed on an unhardened soft concrete step, with all the gaps put on this staircase, having formed, from the side, an x' type of leg with strands, or had-lined coils.

It looked as if a pile of meat-like, upper humanoid-trunk mass was piled upon a straightened plank, hybridized with it, resting on top of strange webbed thin cartilage legs; inflatable-peculiar arms pushing out of the arm-holes, without fingers or palms, oblongs with spikes and various other sharp operable protrusions that stored breeding-capable masses of meat. Without a normal head where one would be, but a flaccid falling apart bag in the bag, to which attached the bars, to which connected a smaller mass bearing the beam, at the top of which, like a lantern the diamond-like sharpened skull, with sockets but not the jaw, fleshier than it appeared, this creature but walked around. Stalking none other but its pray, or to be more precise, the homeless creatures that would try getting out of its way. More of a stabilized form than anything, it was incapable of charging but every now and then it appeared to simply prod along, moving pieces of the scum-platform underneath it.

Although the main frame of its peculiar body might've been, since the fat human upper-torso trunk like hybridization with the bottom side of it was, in actuality much fatter and much more bloated than it appeared to be, it could've been taken for a fat top hat, a mushroom top, or some bulb-button. With a gelatin-thin back, holding the many rods that hold its deformed-decayed head from falling; a mere fleshy, apparent creature as it were, it bore such strange colors as some Renaissance oil paintings that had over-pushed through the high usage of Raw-Siena. Brown and dirty, with some orangey-yellow hints every now and then, darkened as to look all puffed up, with marks of white as if some kind of mold started growing near each limb. But patterned, across its body with outward burst-hills, as if the hills had been burst out of, from inside out, by giant shotguns, then they started, somehow, as if the hills were actually fleshy, putting themselves back together. As if, pies, being baked for too long, then pierced by a needle. More outlandish, more violent, as if they were geysers; while some of these formations had faces and bore the outlines of inhuman lynched niggers on them, with the roles and all. As a matter of fact, the lynchropes interconnected these strange protrusions, which, as they were spread across its body, left it with a strange texture, as if it had been violently cut by a switch-blade, cut along every pucker-shape or mouth, with nigger-outlines being depressed in, as it was not hard to pick up the appearance from their smaller skulls and the hollow-black depressions they left after.

In a bizarre turn of events, this creature was met by anything, from the looks of it, but resistance from the other creatures without home that surrounded him, since, in some way they appeared to also fear him as much as they feared the possible loss of their home, and of the place they might dwell in, seeing how this place, this reality was under the constant thread of being dissolved into anti-matter every few eons or so. Time being a relative thing, that also included various entry spots where something seeped in, as to completely wreck any stability there might've been. Little more than a deeply sought chaos was achieved since many other homeless beings were drawn towards him, seeing only what appeared to be the muck that was drilled out of him. An unnatural tap that also kept pushing out in order to release the Niggarous matter that inhabited the inner-bowels, and although it might've seen like it, since it pushed out this gelatin like after-remains of what was left of digestedly condensed contaminated nigger-scum, this creature was no progenitor of niggers. They were not live-births in the same way any other would come to be brought into life, instead they seemed more wretchedly deformed beyond any kind of intervention. Which was, before long forgotten, as it was joined by others soon after:

'You've started spoiling the ground with these grim-tainted sugary things, that are humane.'

'Indeed I have, as I have travelled through half-the world and into the bowels of the planet, up to its girth where it had been found as such.'

And I have kidnapped and wreathed whatever I could, as I but stolen their niggers, in order for them to be brought here and nowhere else. I've devoured their children and made sure as many of them suffered, for as long as I could possibly prolong their existence.'

'To kill as such a thing would be a laborious task that would yield nothing as the niggers are but easily dealt with, since it's already known, as an easily verifiable, objectively known fact, provable by science, in an undoubtable manner that theirs are an inferior race, we should not bring them here, therefore, proceeding into giving them a chance to proliferate and spread like the Africanus-pest their niggardly thing will most likely do. As a matter of fact, there's only one thing we should do, if it pleases you and if you would.

We may as well proceed into fashioning our homes out of the bodies of dead fucking filthy shot in the head by other niggers, nigger-bodies, we may kidnap from their nigger-infested planets. That way, we shall claim the higher ground, knowing that we shall erase this disease and aid the world into getting rid of the greatest plague that ever infested the likes of humanity, to which we find solace into helping. Niggers, they are a disgustingly wreathed abomination and an utterly deformed, significant disease that shall not only spread but also threatens to swallow the world in its entirety, unless stopped.'

How did we even get to this point? It is simple, as it can simply be explained, by such events, on the planet Earth that triggered this, in the first place. Most specifically, the catalysts for destruction can all be traced to brain-washed teacher and kikes, acting most-subversively all the time.

'What a good pair of animals I find myself in the presence of, this being my first and the first time, him being in my presence, I find myself surrounded, in their intermediary a-first-for-all-of-us way of greeting me, the pretenders, doing nothing to stop them, Michael proving himself an utterly, insipidly silent, untrustworthy, unreliable recently-acquired acquaintance struck-frozen during a motion he-himself could not have described better, in 'his-own' terms, silently uttered by his dumbly-shaped moon-crescent mouth, as a the magna cum laude classroom, in its entirety, twenty seven plus the exchange student, whose fucking dumb-looking face couldn't have been woggier than the looks of a raped-by-a-truck-driver bashed gush-open by the side of the street mocky-type of face, who somehow managed to snivel their way into the University of Harpwogg, keep giggling underneath their moustaches like pre-pubescent school-girls, having already reached the point where they stumbled onto the understanding that I am incapable of holding them accountable for this fraud, scam, ruse, and knee-jerking-to a man without half-a-brain as to understand that it is not only theirs but my failure to stop them, or hope to prevent them from going out there in the world, possibly teaching the next generation of contemporary students that might be brainwashed into gobbling up Marxist beliefs. All because their parents bribed the Deacon of the University, Michael covering up for them, I being incapable of having a say since I am barred from speaking to them, since the incident that happened prior to our meeting, four months ago, when I acted inappropriately with an underage 'mother' of a child, her being a child as well, as it's implied, and I having fucked both of them, frankly, as you may not be as surprised as I would've taken any other man to be, if it weren't for the fact that this entire faculty is utterly corrupt. And that I have connections, and that the whole Jewish lobby is underneath my pocket, it's far to say that I would've been in some great trouble. Lynched even, but alas; I suppose that I find myself in a strange conundrum, don't I? Since I am a hypocrite, having expected much better from my students than from anyone else in this god-forsaken shit-hole that's adhering not the Constitutional beliefs, but rather, to the likes of the Liberals and their ongoing brain-washing agendas that are forcing me to confirm not only to their beliefs but to affirmative action, thinking I'm nothing more and nothing other but a blind imbecile who is utterly incapable of any kind of, observable qualitative cognitive-requiring effort as to prove myself worthily capable of seeing through their bull-shit, that is to say, that they have lowered the criteria and requirements needed for, having lowered the bars by such degree that we may as well pick a randomly selected moron off the streets, handing him a free degree, without making much of a difference, while, in reality, I have been closely planning, ruminating as well as biding my time, even prior to this conversation of ours, in that class, specifically during that class, after I had already been done with the speech, where, in the middle of my lecture, as I took the required break, as to turn towards Michal, in the moment I have previously mentioned, where I could think of nothing more than the complete and illicit end to my long-term-close-to-failure, as to say, I am fully prepared for failure, as I've been preparing myself, even before I started on this insignificantly dumb-quest of mine, borderlining not only insanity but delusional-psychosis as to think that I would stand a chance at showing everyone your true colors. That is to say that, if you, absolutely-moronic imbeciles, thought at any point in, or during, my pretentious attempt as anything even vaguely relating a speech, as to flounder my complete lack of intelligence that's being mask by a fanciful way of sounding smart, which I shall continue rubbing in your face, for as long as my mouth is open, masking everything I said with a degree of utter-volatile pretty-puss-inside your eye sockets kind of blow-power, that I was on your side, you are wrong. Niggers are dumb; it's proven by stats, personal anecdotes and science. And I am taking a stand. As to refuse having to conform to their utter-incapability of putting the much needed effort as to achieve something in life without the help and immediate aid of a white man, by which standards, since they've been dropped so lowly as to accommodate for them, I, a person of below average intelligence, find myself in an awkward situation, being elevated to the status of a god-damn-genius. Just because I am surrounded by a class of fucking nigger; not a single student, in this class-room is white. Do you have, any idea, dear inspector, what this means? You do not, understand, you cannot understand what this means. What this strange reflection of, not only our society, but the mere fact. That even I, someone whose ego, is perhaps wider, as to say, than this entire class-hall, added to the, in rapport to the maximum-possible, hard to expand on total, sheer-size of the Amphitheatre-Conference hall, plus the hall-way between these rooms, adding to a mere length, width, so on and so forth, it's a huge place, you get my point. My ego is enormous, but even that, somehow is left empty, which, I for one am appalled by that alone, since, being as shocked as I am, I do not understand why is it that I feel nothing, at all? It's an empty, vain victory that somehow leaves me with nothing, nothing at all. Unlike the feeling of a man who would somehow find himself outwitting an actual hard-at-work genius, unexpectedly, though I might say, I find myself, I feel as if, I'm somehow dumber than the people I'm trying to lecture to. Even though I know I'm not as dumb as them, I feel as if I'm trying to, somehow prove to you, that I'm proving to them, that somehow we're not only equal, but, wait, it's not even that, it's as if, by trying to prove to them as well as other people that they're actually equal to their white and asian counterparts, I realized that I am actually a bigger moron than they are. That's what it is. I am an utter imbecile just by the mere fact that I'm trying to teach a few people the most important lesson in life, the future is lost. The academia has fallen. Niggers and kikes fucked us over, and it is hardly expected, for us, who paid any attention, to history. With each passing day, I'm starting to question these 'rich' parents of theirs, whom might've earned their wealth by nothing more, and nothing else but being dumb-fucking nigger-imbeciles, criminals, rappers, 'athletes' and other niggerish-professions that yield no advancement, as to be selectively selected and bred for, capitalism having destroyed not only intellectual pursuit but also whatever chance the future generation had, at a same leveled quality-of-life index as their parents had grown accustomed to. In other words, niggers are fucking dumb, inferior, they also score lower at PISA related tests in comparison to other race; whites are self-destructive, kikes are fucking subversively promoting both the former and the latter, and eventually, there won't be, there's no future in a world like that, we are here to suffer. At the hands of elites that would sell us out, and minorities. God bless the United States, God bless Israel and God bless the niggers, for, if he won't, no one will. No one will!

It's like, uh, being a crook, you know? Not trying to be the wise guy here or anything, but showing up in front of a smart-man and, and telling him this:

'Hey friend, listen here friend. I know I am a moron, but look, this guy, he's my student, and he's also a moron. We're both morons, so, I guess, you're a moron as well, you get it?'

Won't do anyone any favor. Unless you actually consider this to be an option or anything, in which case, kill yourself, you know where to aim, just cock your head and I hope that, in your failed attempt at suicide, you keep a hold of enough neurons as to remember the things I told you, during our conversation, you fucking nigger-IQ'd mental invalid!

No one's buying it.

'It is clear, inspector, that the likes of the most incessantly undistinguished, morally prudish kikes as well as the like of in-humane liberals have destroyed whatever nuance there was, or was supposed to be left in the modern world.'

But what is far more clearer than everything aforementioned is that, at the top of this reversal of hierarchy, what rests on top of this insufferable thing that cannot even be easily quantified, is but insufferable nature that the creature known as a nigger, that stands upon in, wriggling its nasty blackishly languid tail, as it rests atop of a crime sink, messing with the tap. Releasing and promoting their niggardly and niggardous brothers to commit as many crimes while covering for them, as to take every ration of food and waste it. Produced by the white man's burden whose, forever more cursed to revert to a time where he has to unfairly work for a race undeserving of the blessing it's been given along the millennia it's been lazying around, doing nothing, and casting upon all, such acceptance as would but destroy any ration that's being saved, incapable to plan ahead or hope for a future as would account for much greater races than itself, being left, instead, with an overburden of destruction that in the short-term will do nothing neither for itself, nor for others in terms of fixing or preventing future, similar behavior, treatment or give any resolute end to their so-called problems. There is no way to fix nigger-behavior, it's something that's, placing niggers, whose niggardly-nigger way of nigger-acting, as for monkey-chimps with blackies-niggers put in the front, pretending they're not only intelligent but, trying to convince people that niggers are human, unfixable. Lynchy-lynchy, coming down your way, niggy-nigg, you're dead, you dumb-fucking monkey, you're going to get utterly fucked, around the throat and bottled with the rest of the animals that are mixed with you, that includes the Mullatoes and the kikes that helped you along the way. Nigger will get fucking destroyed, this society won't cater to them on the long run, not while your 'white-man' is dying, your savior cannot cover for you either, nor can he do as he says. When the other races, the savages, such as I take over, then there will be no such thing as to adhere to your disturbing tendencies. If you, a nigger, a dumb-fucking nimble pocket-fiddler, Tv-stealer, cut-a-wheeler, monkey-in-a-suit thinks you stand a chance, without whitey to come, as to civilize you, then you are wrong, monkey, monkey-monkey, you're to be enslaved. Little dark nigger-creature, you're to be locked away, an eunuch for every man, slavery making a grand return, although it's been a while since someone looked their way, for the African states who own as well, the dumb-little nigglets, they, simply know.

Are you aware, good man that, that, there is no such thing as an African history? There never was, they're lacking in what's needed to actually go ahead and create something like that. Since, it's rather obvious that mentally, they're not there yet and they're never going to be, especially since, their developmental potential is not only infirm and invalid but seems as if, it never stood a chance to begin with.'

Chewing on nigger heads, that's what their future is like. Everyone with half a brain can predict it. Monkeys eating and killing one another, big-headed ego-filled ignorant creatures, incapable of distinguishing themselves or others, or at the very least they cannot accept that mentally, as a sub-species, the African specimens are simply not as intelligent, by a long shot, by a long mile, as a whole. They're never going to be human by the same standards as human beings are. Left behind, never made. Nigger lynched, never ended. It's but plain to see, for anyone, but, it's become an echo, now, of things said and already confirmed.

'Everyone's suspicions are correct, and we don't need to be told what we already know. Then we should go ahead and discuss what is to be done about this nigger-pest and this nigger disease, if we're at it.

As a great friend of mine who's a scientist, a psychotic person, might I add, and a renowned molecular biologist has, proposed to me, there might be a chance to. Perhaps get rid of this nigger-disease that's been infesting our world for this long, and for the longest while, as it, currently stands. I believe we might be able to say with certainty. But what am I talking about, we?

He's close enough to a solution, he's come up with an antidote for this nigger-cancer that's currently spreading throughout the world. That being, the sickle-cell air-born virus he's been incessantly trying to give birth to. One that would hopefully be worked on so thoroughly as to avoid the Mediterranean countries, and in turn go, on a fully-blunted strike-force as to spread and completely devour the African continent in its entirety.'

Whose echoes, as for this human could be heard; coming out of the hollow-spots inside the wretched homeless lynched-boys that were embed all across its body, and in its nearest surroundings.

'Humanity was always meant to be attacked, by rabid creatures such as I, when showing signs of weakness as to arrive, when they adhere to inferior specimens, I shall ever be there to gobble them up. It's rather clear enough that there can be no return from this.'

'While it's easily achievable, one could and should and might as well agree that some children mature way too fast, especially the girls. It's all that needs to be said.'

In which case, especially the ones of most, impoverished as a whole, 'under-privileged' and, suffice to say, the one that, most-clearly lack the power to actually fight back. Such as it is, it only and should only come as natural, and the next step in this 'behavioral' kind of change that one should start taking advantage over them. By the mere whim of his will, because whoever's in charge should and could and should enact whatever crossed his mind upon the lower-will and body of a much inferior being. Molesting nigger-kids, fucking them, trailing fingers around their sub-human anatomically defunct bodies.

I'd fucking enjoy gouging out their eyes.

But not before violently castrating these nigger children with butcher-knives and rusty cleaves and little sharpened darkie-needle chimes.

Nasty-nasty niggers have to fucking die.

What was apparent, without a doubt was the most frightening aspect of the most obtuse of creatures whom hid in his realm of Homelessness of which wretched nature, this creature, without a shadow of a doubt, was the fact that, above him stood seven or six cut around their ankles great homeless-lords whose open faces stood before him, Ankaghylor, Itimeshat, Pormouhhley, Barkhyii, Lekklehleh, Yrettlyion, whose servant, granted was the last one, to which, bowed down, he had suffered himself at no greater impasse than to be covered underneath their command. Having been degradedly forced to adhere to them as a servant would to his lords and masters, one whose soul has clearly not only decayed, but had also been stricken down by the wretchedness of their very oozing in souls. While, so many of his, recently acquired brothers and sisters whose fate he shared so thoroughly were nowhere to be seen. And beyond decrepit were his lords as well, as every single one stood forth, shaking, merely in the same manner distraught, uncannily by the force of decay, seeping through their anciently-wrought blood-vacuoles they had garnered as their homes. In which even now they drew upon as to turn upon them, seemingly ever-so-drawn towards their lucidly-maligned reflections, against whose, brim-bright yellowish light only brought out the worst out of themselves; mainly their features. If it were not for them, no one, might know this, but they might not have been kept alive, not by their own will nor own desire to survive. Being deformed beyond any capability of drawing or putting themselves together, broken apart, by mere-extensions of bloated-inside, put to pieces cartilages that pushed out their pseudo-eely gelatin but drawn on paper stars of iron, their cheekbones protruding like mantis-feelers that only pushed out of their clearly distorted skulls. Alongside their fleshly made, rods of bone, surrounding them like bands stood only the images of many carved men that adorned these outward-pushing protrusions. Faces like the likes of men screaming in terror as they would grab a hold of the inner-cog-like to the side mechanisms that allowed for the full extension of the inner-sebaceous injectors to finally come to life, splashing, merely, as to be finely confined to a pea-shooter of some avariciously formed acid which would grab a hold of the substance that was etched on top of the clotted blood-vacuoles, that granted their such-it-were, not only vermillion pigmentation but the likes of many wrought in, defecated against the splashed of the carved-in-ruined gods whom, by now became their lonely-decayed predecessors whom rested in their swollen graves. Since these floating tombs of theirs were beyond starvation, maligned beyond the mere understanding of the lost in dust and in time ancient humanly corrupted by their own hands parchments on which something eerily comprehensible might be found, or interpreted as being somewhat coherent. But if it were not for this deformation caused by the reflection, one could not draw what they truly looked like, since, with the constant movement of their fallen apart faced formed, like two put together, rotated cunts, whose little more than rags, pus apart, or used by many men would make seem, with moisture in-between, a dead animal as well, would tell of such a thing as the twist, or beyond the tenure of a fallen-apart lord of discord whom had carved himself only as to look as the people he had so thoroughly hoped to contort and destroy in its advent of destruction. Its inner body being a great-fallen apart cordially shaped, large sack of put together stolen-as-if from the bastardization valor, as if it were their homeland instead, as if they refused to advert themselves from war, and carry on with such wretchedness as would be benign, in the advent of a much to their theft-like nature steal the organs and implant them in their own bodies, where, if one were to open and split them, like a surgeon's high-precision induced, by mass and by time, gone-through surgery, but unlike the well-trained, for longer hours inside of a medicine school, long-hour worked kind of man, who'd pour a great amount of his life into it, ever after and beyond the likes of which a normally endowed human being could even feasibly be allowed, or should go beyond it, kind of way, this was not the work of surgeon, that handled the extracted organs, instead, it either seemed to be the work of a bunch of Chinese 'humans' that frozen inside their refrigerators, dead children, put on top and beneath entire bath-tubs worth of ice-cubes, carefully placed and shoved inside for some reason in order to harvest their organs so they could put them, sell them, for medium-to-high priced on the black market or on the Silk Road, the place where people used to buy highly-illegally modified guns, antibiotics, or drugs, or in an utmost nigger-pack kind of manner where a bunch of niggers would come out of nowhere like the dumb-fucking sub-human creatures they are, incapable of self-control or self-regulation, that would instead, as hatred for a white man, boy, or anything even closely resembling a white person, being instilled into them, although it should be aimed solely towards the jews and filthy fucking kike-merchants who are promoting these simian-dark creatures, of whose likeness it rather astounding; incessantly beating, stomping, not to maim or to hurt but rather, kill the person they unnecessarily, with the intent-to-kill going beyond any kind of avoidance as for their fault or reasoning, hid away by the media, utterly annihilate their target, in which case, the stomping would reduce the quality of organs that are being harvested, which, needless to say, as needed, in the greatest of state, as to be put inside one of the great spine-racks that are lain inside the body of one of the great homeless lords. Inside of which, there are also lain, fully grown implanted beings whose bodies-shrunk to the size of prunes only, would only do as much as one could say. Take away from the sight of the diseased animals they had given birth since their many faced and many faceted face-skull-prototype of pseudo-deformed, strangely elongated in the front by a most incessantly, almost eaten by Syphilis kind of ghoulis appearance allowed for their inner-bodies to grow smaller, disgustingly, disturbing, hard-to-look at eaten-chewed, munched by mucky-incisors that had not only implanted themselves in, going as thoroughly deep as they could but also managed to leave some room for an inorganic growth to occur. Worm-like, almost but far beyond any kind, that transparency would allow, for what happened in there, inside of them, beyond the un-sustainable look of the innards-crawling defiled in the head starved in infant creatures that were stuck in. That is to say, they bore their pseudo-wombs inside their bodies. Prune-like limbs had been eaten as well, leaving them with some flaccidly flapping glove-like things that would not by the strength of their manner of looking be capable of extending from where they stood. Like cancer-tumors combined with roots, and pseudo beaked unnaturally-hard to look at twisted, as if made of pseudo-clay by a poor-artists' interpretation of a creature's face who's borderlining both abstract art and surrealism, it was. Such were its many growths that made not only its face but everything else, the texture of the body, through, granted, it found some solace there as well. In what it was doing, resting, on top the overly grown organs that were finally allowed such a thing as it were, to finally reach the size of giant, inflated basketballs, that cushioned and paused their suffering as such. No facial feature was there, but tubes implanted on random locations where sockets would be at. Eternally being fed, but only their heads, by their homeless masters; while these creatures only rotted themselves, in this dead realm from which not a single one was capable of moving out of, or beyond.

But alas, they did not look down upon him, the servant, they would not look down upon none other, no longer, than the beady sought for parasite, in the girth, inside the land. Who was there, as an intruder, lain aside as for no Patronage would offer him, otherwise, one, could find himself drawn to him, again.

‘The slick leashes that have been given upon it no longer lay.’

In one of the wretched abysses from which the lower bowling-like rooms like the Jimmy’s Bowler and Two Innits, forty by eighty four, stood by, of which piled upon one another holders, on every side, had only barely beaten the hour in an attempt to break out of their prisons. While they were beyond any reach or any possible means of interacting with the wretched homeless lords, of whom Patronage would’ve been most precise. Most, least of all, anything but bothersome.

And for that reason, he, a parasite, shot out of the cage, blowing through the parched-patchy surroundings he was put through and under, until he’d land no longer, into that perched by sea-less energy, the abyss. It seeped into the world.

Blue skies emerging; whereas the sun was coral, and the houses, sunken green; there stood, the congregation having amasses now, witnessing, as thing, as it had landed, a particular man in awe. Had cut them off by eighteen hours now; bastard they called.

‘That damn fucking incessant brain-fogged, brain mugged, by nigger-bogs, infuriating cretin! He’s ruined it, hasn’t he?’

‘We don’t know that yet, but, if there’s anything.’

‘No, you don’t understand, he’s tempered with this livid satellite, look at it for a moment now; he’s planted a few of his cabinets in, they’re gone, whoever was in this ship is now gone, look.’

Marilee pointed at the top of the great spindly set, four shots made apparent from the main upturned bed of tumoresque formation tendencies. Out came a few riders, whom had been shot through their heads by spears, most humane in appearance, or primate tools from the looks of it, that could be dated back to the Neanderthals if someone really looked into it. And their many visors lay broken, cracked and almost shattered as were their backs.

It was a bothersome and lurid-endowed placed to be in, from which and whose mere false sanctimonious alacrity was a first, a nowhere to be seen and ill-placed distilment, of which seepage, of their lives, threatened to bring the breaking of every house and every man and every likened peoples they surrounded themselves in, since this ‘even’ had not only changed, and it wasn’t even apparent to them at first, and it wasn’t even a quickly-whipped above their brows kind of change, but a slow but seemingly graduate change that has taken hold of them, whom, although not pure to begin with, were forced to slowly be squashed, to a degree of unworthiness-unearned. Neither man was a saint, neither woman was wine, especially not one of a much greater, finer quality, for everyone knew how soon, as from errand to errand, even the newspaper boy knew that from an early age, since he had a relatively good relationship with his father, that he closely maintained throughout the years, as well as a beneficiary? That’s too prude of a word, a good upbringing, there are no transactions between parents and children. You raise your child with dignity, grace and turn him into a man; while also teaching him some good lessons. Don’t slack down, while raising your child, teach him the ‘value’ of money and what it does or turns a man into, but that’s where it stops. Family comes first. Also, the kid needs to know when a woman hits the wall, so he, at the very least knows what to avoid. No amount of ‘distilment’ is going to fix up your face, lady, let alone your body. Those big breasts will sag in a decade or so, but a man and the will of a man lasts forever.

Unless this happens:

Everyone in town dies.

Sudden-stroke caused by the release of a black gas coming from that strange thing that appeared out of nowhere. It then grew legs, like the people. And a marsupial Kangaroo bag, in which, it put the people, in. It put the people inside of it. By placing itself on its bottom, then using its newly acquired toes; it was an awkward thing to see; luckily for it and everyone else, they were dead. Also it grew strange piston-elongated, three, in the front, but lower pseudo ledge-spears. This strange toweresque pillar-lettuce-bloated thing, whose upper head was but a few interlocked almost leathery winged leaves, whose lower body was more of an entrance to a tower, with the cabinet and all, whose spears remained up there, close to the top, with the creatures, the drivers still impaled to it, this strange satellite, with three, although one could walk upon them, almost harpoon-thin-platforms, whom were thin at the top. Legs to the side, marsupial pocket between the three horns and the cabinet, kind of in the middle; and, as it happened, out of its back, the 'Greek letter O with a line in it' shaped gate opened from which a fishing pole growth came out. Which had a bunch of worming-wires with hooks attached to every single one of them: Its friends were invited to draw in.

A bloated big puddle fat, brown-soil falling apart of it, two cylinders one above its head and one below it, facing outwardly, curving its entire fat-gelatinous decaying body, into a rifle-like looking livid thing shaped like a C, with many attached-molded-in-clay-inside itself visibly transparent arms. That was also filled with giantly outlandish cacti spines. It launched humans out of its cacti-peashooters. Which bounced, against its more-mechanical friend, then fell on the ground. That one got stuck in one of the spears, pushing one of the ship riders all the way back.

Part of the city was ruined, but not as ruined as a woman is after she's hitting the wall. No amount of destruction could ever amount to that, unless you count what niggers do to a town during their runarounds with their packs.

Back on the road, homeless bus-station:

She was his sister, but the thing was that, she could be anyone's sister. She was picked up from somewhere, over their shoulders, both man took a piece. They were, both men carrying her, separated, one hundred feet apart, from one another, still carrying her, over their shoulders, both of them were.

This 'sister' had beautiful eyes that were obscured by two fat Bonnobos heads that were sutured to her glasses, that had been shattered and had thin strands of black-irony, the metal, not the music-genre, but the alloy, wires that had been carefully snuck through the cracks, while, from inside the Bonnobos, which had to suffer through the invasive open-without-anesthesia-being-employed-despite-the-clear-signs-of-pain-borderlining-animal-abuse-most-definitely-borderlining-animal-abuse-surgery that carried on, there not being any-body, yet the 'Bobos' had not only long-so-lived as much as they thrived on the pain, especially since, by the time the main-markered by four PERFECT-BLUE crossed sings, where the main cuts would go along, since, these incisions had to be made on one side and another, as to allow for the carefully-contorted curvature of the needle, being less of an embroidery-type and more of an anglers fishing day out left behind, on the rack, where anyone can simply take it since it was only a hook, albeit still theft, deplorable in some way, pathetic, these are doctors we're talking about, special utensil, which, during the entire duration of this violent escapade, being paid for by a private investor as to go on ahead and attach these strange head-things to a pair of shattered glasses, a pair of two-sided at the top as if trunk split in half, two meters in, by an axe, from the opening of this pseudo-cylinder out of which came a few smaller, Gatling-gun on both sides, but out of them, smaller pints that drew outwardly like twenty or forty hose-balloon 'strings that formed two segments of, crystal (two pyramids connected at the base) with signs embed on them with boulder-entry holes obscuring the sight, because of their tunnel-shaped-train smoke-but almost hardening solid because of the moisture they produced, bullets that, despite what it seemed like didn't harm them at all, or interrupt the surgery by any means; but the Bobos also managed, to, have their way with this, 'everyone's sister, who was there, placed, on another table, standing, blank-eyed, disturbingly balancing, an act, done, for, no one in particular, because her eyes were rosy cheeks, that being, behind her 'eye-sockets' but more like inside her skull, where her brain was, near the area where her eye-nerves stood, actual cheeks had been, prior to this surgery, more like twenty of forty seven years ago, and this 'sister' who wasn't a nun either, but, just a sister, was old, it's why she had these eye-problems to begin with, because of her old age, that being, somewhere close to sixty, no wonder she got ripped in half and carried on top the shoulders of two strangers; although, it has to be said, between the two strange crystals that were kept by the meaty strings, only one of them produced the train-like bullet some-thing, the other one, during the surgery, during the woman's, whose name is Agnes Challenging Boxes Red Spear-Curtain with Plow-Dust in Eyes, and Eyes is her family's name, the First name but always written as the last one, whatever-the-fuck-she-was-doing-in-there because she wasn't even invited in the surgery room – rant, which only happened in her mind, so no one could hear it, on the walls, there stood, pinned by giant cracked in half as to become a pseudo-many sharp-horned battering ram table, the bodies of the Bobos; a beautiful body that was made out of eighteen great grainy segments, which should, by some means, serve as a call-back to the surgery room in terms of the sheer size it bore, like a centipede but fatter and more compact like giant matchboxes with the hidden 'function' of unwrapping every single one of them like Pterodactyl wings if they, somehow decided to warmly hug someone close to them, revealing strange corkscrew breasts, weird belly buttons shaped like the emblem-crests of various S.P.Q.R sigils used at various times throughout history, including the Holy Roman Empire, their flags, symbols, so on and so forth, even the people 'pretending' they're ancient Romans during their dress-ups at the Medieval Fares done so to impress their friends, leaving only, and since these winged-wrapped-parchments made a great deal of the body-weight, and seeing how she was incapable of flight in either case, it would not be insulting, bringing into consideration that this habit of eating, this apparent, closely-matchable as for the symptoms, controversial observation that she might be suffering of anorexia, her ribs being openly exposed, which may have lead to her being, or may have not, to her being prescribed the glass-Bobos, since women and niggers are basically on the same level, as it was most likely intended to serve as a life-changing experience, as in see-the-world-through-someone-else's-eye, henceforth the niggers, although Bobos would be too wrong a term, in which case, it ought to be replaced with two 'Jeromes'; legs that were sizzling like river-scrawled twisted straws back-and-forth curved along C's flipped horizontally on and off, then connected by lines at the tip and at the bottom with one another, then, at their knees, up then curved like crickets, forming a line crossing their weird sprawls, where fan-like clappers with faces of skin but eyeless, mouthless burned in outlines, well they were more like radiators without bones, but the second part of her legs had actually cartilages that resembled bones, the ones with the face-fans, which numbered in tens or so, while, it should be said that this didn't affect the fact that her wings were also inter-connected, even though, awkwardly wrapped as to form the compact boxes, sheet-thin 'connectors'. Although her wings were not as much as Pterodactyl wings as they were weird shadow-play hands that looked like pseudo tipped with hooks cleavers. Her head was also human. And she was beautiful, beyond beautiful, no arms. And no centipede legs either, just useless wings; across her deformed ugly body, no wonder she was so easily ripped apart. One of her lower segments also had a removable flying, beyond the amount of body mass she had, giant elongated satellite that had eighteen giant pebbles aligned its base with four great push-out cartridge faces with ringed-spear shafts coming out of their mouths that fully extended like two sutured L's nigger-monkey sticks, that bore four great legs at the end that were shaped, when put together, like a hand-like holding a ball organ that turned into yellowish-orange powdery mush in the air, while the entire structure ripped in half, produced energy, made a strange portal from which a few great stones started drawing out of, all of them connected in the middle, this satellite being a conjurer itself, by great pseudo air-shaft roots, the crawling inside of, ones, that was a machine, a rock machine that shot rock spikes, out of its main form, that was also a ship that carried along, a great army of deformed ugly-almost humanoid stolen feature, smaller stones that were thrown, across the world, by the likes of a great gravitational wave-belt deformation of malignant probationary manipulation, which could be removed at any time, if something were to happen, as if they only tested the waters for the time being, not wanting to go full-gravity control, like a nigger in house arrest, where you'd let him out for a few hours, by himself, but while also making sure he won't do anything wrong; only to end up lodging themselves in people's chests, in front of their hearts, manipulating them. Since their thinking organ was their hearts, as was said, with great virtue of soul, confirmed by the ancient Greek Philosophers, such as the likes this world has seen and heard and confirmed.

If there ever was something she has thoroughly missed, with all her pernicious might, soliquitous pride and incessant bastardilization, that very much being a result of the great infantilization of all that came into contact with her, regardless of need or concern, regardless of the opinions of others that might've come into contact with her in an attempt to change her opinion, utterly, completely, beyond belief, in a time when and where, this being a more solid dimension for her since so many concepts were not only alien to her but with women being conceptual-invalids-and-all, that having to do with the fact that women lack a head-piece that was mainly and most a Y chromosome grown-up 'think' implicitly influencing organ that literally pumped solid information into a man's brain in a most volatile fashion, these kinds of, what might be interpreted as 'traditions' are deemed as being most vulgar and troublesome by an opposition that's not only stricken themselves as to tickle their own, so fluidly overly pampered yet completely shatterable ego, but whose adherence to, as an entity, its own set of beliefs and practices far out-do that of the people they're trying to oppress or at the very least push back, it was the traditional household she grew in. Where was being constantly fucking raped, on a daily basis, with a knifed-rod spear butcher-cleaver kind of war weapon that was as thick as eight on laid side-by-side bricks with violent spikes attached to their front, spikes and drill-like spinning sharpies shaped stingers that had been used to constantly turn her pussy in a bloody pool of rape-piss. But, she managed to regrow every piece since her many legs but clapped on the floor while it happened, which in turn only promoted regeneration since her body was so many segment-jointed, as well as it was reattachable and completely removable without the possibility of permanent damage being inflicted, to the very point of, if there even was a chance to pull off her legs, she'd still be capable of regrowing or reattaching them, together.

Luckily for her, the night came and the two nice men actually put her back together, leading her to the Soloquadiad Parasite Solace.

Where the much-to-her malignant piece of sky that fell emerged and wretched were the bones- advent to which her body drew.

The sky and land were one. Pieced together by many put-together-forms, many of whom were never-gone; large slime-filled disgustingly fat deformed slugs, attached to larger pieces of long-canals, all but bastardly living and filled, with many cylindrical mounted socket-stretches, all livid and connected, large long-bubbles as well as top lids and put-together faces appeared to swim inside.

Good life, of what was left:

‘This is a pre-recorded message, honey, I hope you won’t mind me passing now, but I’m really pointing at the stretch now, and it’s not looking any better than it looked twenty or so years ago.’

Billy was here ‘,a few miles off the city he lived in, watching planes with planet-doodles on them, scrawled with map-markings, signaling various precise dates that appeared to be traceable by dead-Morse codes,’ a few minutes ago, where, ‘part of which, ten at the very least, ten minutes, this’ order, one minute spent going around circles, one minute asking dumb questions, one minute figuring out how to find his way back home, seven minutes trying to cut a pint of his’ mother’s moving blood-cartilage man-cut cutout taken from her body, taken from the grave, taken by the spade which, managed to change the course, a few minutes having decided what happened, inside his house, his nice house where, he stood, not now, not then, but now-back-before the few minutes passed, before they got the chance, right before his mother dined with her dead husband who is, him, still, it’s all happened at the same time, while, Billy, was in one of the cockpits, above his house, beneath it, at the same time. He was both here and there, and then, and now, and still. His mother and father were still alive. Marilee was much to her appearance, yet endowed.

Part of the garden

IT grew like a tetrahedron with gladly straightened chains holding sea-mines at their ends, in minds, were there corpses locked inside of every single one of them, morbidly obscene, mightily set.

‘Might I tend what is left of the ones that scream of being planted there? Deepened in the recesses, none seem to fair a fight. We can’t pick them up one by one and butcher them like strewn-up pigs.’

‘That would be a bastardly practice would it not? I’m afraid that you show many sings of corruption already, as for the unfairness that’s been provided so far, I would have to say that I’m afraid there’s something in your eye.’

‘What would that happen to be?’

‘A tiny insignificant thing, I would add, there are some rounded soil garments of some steaminess that boils your eye. I see but an un-boiled yolk in there, dripping on top your cheek, you would have to be aware now that there’s something in your feet.’

‘What is that? And there as well, what kind of blasphemy have they hid inside of me and who is responsible for this cheater? Tell me, immediately, I must know. I can tell, quite well, whether or not you’d like to show something that might be taken from me, or honed away.

There’s something incredible bastardous about you, Gardner.’

‘How come you only noticed it when we’ve been in each other’s company for, I don’t know, the last twenty or so years?’

‘I don’t actually know, I’ve yet to check anything similar to it, nor would I have seen it so, if it weren’t for the chance.’

‘Which one?’

‘You know which one, the one that showed itself, the one that entered your head and never showed itself out.’

‘I don’t think I follow.’

‘At the back of your head there’s a giant dream insect whose elongated needle has been seeping lucidity into the air, creating livid-thing that used this mental dust of yours to enter through and play.’

‘What would you have me do in that case? Squash the bug, the insect, the miscreant?’

‘Nothing of the sort, I wouldn’t have you do anything you would happen to dislike, at all, as a matter of fact, I would rather not take or draw something away from you. Without knowing or being made aware of the consequences that are not apparent to me; who knows.’ He smiled as if on a prompt.’

‘Who knows just what might happen in that case, I wouldn’t want to partake in such a doing if that’s the case and if it does, then.’

He didn’t leave a lot of room for something to be said, otherwise.

‘There’s a bulb for every kindly man down there.’

‘I hope you’re not planning on abandoning me now, are you?’

‘Of course not.’

Much closer yet well beyond their point:

‘Don’t look back just yet, there might be people watching all over, from behind their windows. In their apartments, light comes one way in. There’s just.’

‘Not enough otherwise, I know. I, we should leave.’

‘I don’t know if it’s possible any more. It’s just, there’s so many things going on through both of our heads. It’s going to take a while to flush them out, if ever.’

‘Where to, now, Mouse, yeah. I think I remember you. I’m in dire need of a friend.’

‘Red like the button; sure thing, it’s somewhere close, I think. There’s no chasm left behind. It’s fallen through.’

‘I hate this, I dislike remembering. ‘

‘I know.’

‘I don’t know what to do either. The people I loathe, I can’t even get back at them; it’s because of them, if my father hadn’t been infested with their blood, filthy sub-human kikes. My life could’ve been. I could’ve been normal.

One great grandfather that ruined my life with his poisoned blood; I wish they died. I wish they died like the subhuman rats they are. But I don’t. I can’t do anything about it, that’s the worst part of all.’

Tleshlye

Its fleshy face started pouring into a bottle. He’d made a small vending machine out of it, feeding some of the most tin-formed ingratiated nigger-pets that were fellowizing the nearest streets they were on:

‘Someone will have to, eventually, at the very least put an end to their niggering, shouldn’t they?’

‘Leave them be, there’s a far greater threat for now, since it’s going to draw breath again.’

They court was sanctimoniously empty, with the exception of a great open-caved in body, a giant in looks but made of armor, burnt as if to a crisp with some marks of fully melted iron seething by its sides. A nigger child had gotten lynched earlier that day, but the kid stabbed a woman, turning the lynching into self defense. The great body was tall-standing, almost the size of a Cambodian Elephant, not-spread eagled but rather curled into a ball. Something near-close to emptiness rested in. Some cables appeared to be widespread in such a fashion that, they stuck out when plenty of the Afterees came out of the bushes:

‘Stuck out of place, they seem to be, don’t they?’

‘Think the body will come to life?’

‘This’ not an android, nor machine, I think it would bode well if neither of us came near it, what do you think?’

‘I’d rather not take my chances either.’

‘Cowards, come on already, it can’t actually harm us, not unless we draw too close to it. But I wager we can.’

Verdure, a lot of verdure in the court; and the roofs, all four in this grand circle, without taking into account the fact that stacked in front and behind one another, hundreds more and thousands of houses plainly set behind and above them as well, stood there, shaking bothersomely. Upside boats of scales; planted on top of domed-holders attached to the cities, most of the buildings being lodged-molded into one another, going as far as, at a point, in the distance, as to be welded and come out of every roof as well. Even growing and standing on clouds, with their bottom groves growing downward pointing threes that were long and curved like pipes and appeared to have all of their leaves outwardly pointing like tanks, out of the hollows of which, out came strange appendage-limbs with hybridized man-head-insects with open mouthed Gattling-guns that all bore elongated, but made out of their canine-insect cartilage bubbly molecule-forced into the shape of atoms skin-like portions, thin pincer-equipped smaller slammers that kept beating on top and along their metallic shafts as to make the echo bounce around every single part of the tree-like spore-bottle shaped flea-creatures that were being launched or shot against the resting beneath them roofs. As, for, every single time they splattered, they took over a single lodged in tile at a time, growing on top of it as to form peculiar bulbic-egg shaped egg-mass womb with their lower liquefied boil-pool being a mix of clay and of flea-like mass, out of which a small shrubbery of Aloe Vera leaved-bladed tongues came out, bearing, around their egg-shaped transparent layer, inside of it, to be more precise about the general location, ancient, prune-cartilage formed old man's faces with three eyes, like pseudo-ghosts wriggling to get out. Whereas, beneath them, inside the house, through the roofs as their growths allowed them full entry, they grew elongated bodies through which they siphoned some of the ghosts that had died inside of them, growing, in their large transparent bodies, smaller fashioned gelatin-exoskeletons that were incapable of getting out of their prisons, but struggled to get out. Keeping the owners or the guests whom had been aroused, or at the very least their senses had been, at night, during which, out of the startling thing that was their sudden realization of what was going on, they starved in corners, frozenly stuck, being very much incapable of safely leaving the premise. IT was a bothersome sight to behold.

But these things weren't the only growths either. Many pines had been planted on top the roofs as well, and they all appeared to grow on top of just about every possible structure and place. Their roots flooded most apartments, and appeared to draw heat and light into them, leaving many areas, in, hardly revealing, less bothersome to think about it, pitch-black, as if there had been a black-out that's never ended. Niggers didn't live in the city, they were kept outside, segregated outside the confines of the city, they would never be allowed to even approach the gates by any means feasible, no.

'Most bothersome a thing, is it not, shall we bring that thing inside our home?'

A rain and a storm threatens to come, it could hurt him.'

'He looks as if he's already beyond saving.'

'Think you've got something to back that up?'

'Yes, himself, his look, the state of its shell and the cables that are lain around him, we could offer him safety at the very least.'

'It doesn't matter, I don't think it does. But if it did.'

'Enough of it, Enhonr, we're bringing him in. It's already settled.'

'On what basis will that be?'

‘He’s one of us, I think.’

Most bastardly of men drew on out of a strange ship which had been planted in window-crate of glass, as if frozen solid in an ice-block that drew out in the same way a drawer might’ve been pulled out, this glass coffin being released from its ever-kept inside the apartment, staring at the ceiling area –zone, where finally the ship-like cartilage rotten dark blue-green figure whose appearance was of a leather-like armored horizontally flipped dolphin cartridge connected to a pseudo spiked-outlandish mushroom top with dark human demonical distorted faces carved in, which bore, outwardly lodged as if out of its crater like fissure put-in, a split in half cold blooded reptile tongue that was an iron belt with bullets. Every man inside of it was armed enough for a god damn heist. It was also, the ship, bubbly-in the back as if the growths had accumulated over time. But looked like pseudo mattress springs, whereas the body-back lower half, where the tail would’ve been a strange cleaver shaped smaller box filled with filaments and plenty of dark Tnt-aligned-like-beads tubes that dangled from one side of the other since the insides of the area were mainly hollow.

The shell that is the body may never be destroyed nor completely touched for obvious reasons. More than a few being present, but, aforementioned, there could be no clearer rejoinder any longer. Those cables coiled around as if they had been power-lines, perhaps even worse than that. They were wearied out already, especially with the sight of the weird coffin ship, out of which tall, barely filled with boils but incredibly thin patrons came out of, whom had only been drawn to this point in an attempt to contain the force that was being generated by the creature as to understand what went through it. There was a clear disjointitude between them, as every limb spoke of a much different tale than they had been accustomed to. There was peril beyond relief. Broken facets and coffins that were misplaced as well as an unfed population with little more than needed, less than they could tell.

‘What happened to it, is all I want to know, at the very least I am owed the chance to ask it for myself.’

‘It is no longer alive, why is it so hard for you to comprehend as little as that? Whatever force shattered or punched it in, puncturing whatever vitals it may’ve been capable of giving birth to, there are forced beyond it incapable of truly recreating the reminiscence of the force that left it hanging in that state. And even if there was a force out there capable of recreating this scene of death it was forced into, I am very much afraid that I would no desire, and I know that’s bothersomly convenient for me to add, since I’m invalidly and invariably influenced by my frightened state, but I cannot witness or be made aware of the existence of a being capable of exerting so much strength. Knowing that it may still be among us; that’s something I cannot live with. And I would add that I would not consider your choice in the matter either, as you are blinded not by reason but something else, your desire to know will only bring you alienation from us. I would rather live in bliss than agony, or risk angering it with knowing, placing myself in danger. Do not do that to us. Do not seek that which is not needed, for it cannot only not end well, but you’re also putting all of us in harm’s way without even understanding the consequences of your actions and what those mean for us. We shall be destroyed because of you, in a way you will have justified by the time it happened, allowing yourself to end up on top for a short amount of time before we will have been destroyed. You’re an awful creature, a disturbingly-hard to look at wretch and because of you, we only have to suffer and we will suffer from this point on unless you finally give in and allow us to thrive without seeking our destruction at the hands of a being that most likely still walks among us but it’s lain in hiding.’

‘How could you possibly know that? These blows, the sheer size of the creature, the mere fact that, if you were to trace the hollow-marks as to see it as a cast or armor, merely by sight, not even involving the use of forensics yet, as a means of identifying what had truly unwrapped, not underneath or eyes and possibly underneath no one else’s but the culprit responsible for this unnaturally wrought in butchery of this strange creature that’s been left here, to our disposal, a warning, I might think, only reveal the fact that the heavy usage of a most continuously incessant pounding of fists or of a similar appendage-like immaterial kind of set of strikes had been put to the employ of the one responsible for doing so, making, therefore, it seem as if the one responsible for it, although we may not be able, just yet, to draw any conclusion from what happened here, as to create a rapport between the diameter of the fist and the size of the criminal in relation to its victim, I believe it’s fair to say that allowing someone, who’s proven himself capable of compounding this amount of sheer, brutal strength, as to completely leave another fellow living being, or mechanical, making it objectively worst, since the biological lives have proven themselves too immoral for their own sake, would go, completely against any of our moral systems and not only that but it would completely throw whatever chance there ever was for us to reach a point where we may live in relative, untouched, unaltered, prolific-almost to a fault, at a high-degree, almost, of peace and liberty that’s carefully lain beyond a point where it may be clearly destroyed or at the very least forcefully interrupted by a display of brutalism, savagery and uncouth ordeal we could never hope to recover out of. Since it’s clear enough that this act alone has set a precedent to, not only our community and the community we shall live in from this point on, clearly being altered by what’s happened here, but it also, as you have mention, given rise to the highly, most disgustingly asked and put on top the table amoral question, that is to say, whether or not, although I would argue that in reality, it borders the line of being morally wrong, I shall play the Devil’s advocate, therefore giving you the benefit of the doubt as for the moral reasoning behind it, nonetheless I shall still leave it on the table as, for, precedents aside, it still baffles me as for, why would anyone even bring it up to begin with, that being, do we turn a blind eye to what’s happened here? Shall we carry this body along, put in on a bloody trough, simply abandoning it in some long-ordained unnatural, hard to look at basement out of which it may slowly drift out of our consciousness until it happens again? Because I am inclined to think that you are hiding something, and that this is completely and utterly convenient of you that you’d want the body gone, no offence about it either, but it’s simply too, well, it plays into your grubby hands, that’s all. It’s about as much as I’m going to say, nothing more, nothing less, only that which is fair.’

The mysterious body was actively oozing with sound-foam, though neither of them truly knew what was going on inside of it.

To each of their own, they knew better how to settle with the beast. And for that reason, the gangrene hadn’t spread among them. It was all too clear that there were a few barely, yet sublime, pouch-box-rooms in which spoke to evil vases, evil thorns and flowers that were brought from the other side of the world, but neither one of them understood who was in control just yet. Since, most obvious, or not; as soon as either one of them drew a curtain over their eyes:

‘It’s missing, isn’t it?’

‘Was it there not a moment ago?’

‘You’re right, you madman, it actually disappeared underneath our very much, vigilant eyes!’

‘Nothing escapes me, nonetheless.’

A lamp-skull head with an insect-pointed high-horn, adorned with almost unnaturally deformed segments that were put on top of it as if it were a horse. Its body was that of a maggot-grub, a giant bud mummified sarcophagus. A peculiar panel lay in the middle of his chest. They already planted it in alongside two others like him. But they were all chained with rusty coated iron-shackles.

‘Wait, something’s wrong.’

‘Are you tap wired?’

‘What was that?’

He repeated his question; most terribly so.

‘It’s moving.’

‘They’re all trying to get a foot on us.’

They were blinded along the way.

The Homeless entity could not have been vaguer than it had been then, since it could not speak of what went on inside its head. Its eyes were mightily crazed or at the very least looked the part, it would’ve even shouted if there were still five minutes on the clock, down the bus station, on side of the clockworkry that was finely placed near one of the, apparently calmer of the people who were waiting for this chaos to stop. This cradle-squared thing of overly stretched homeless things, these beings then began walking along, moving out of the way as various stoppers were being brought from as far away as one could see.

‘Court, you’re not seeing this, are you? There’s a wickedly strange thing there, floating towards us, from somewhere down the hill, where the plaster of many souls that have been drawn from the bottom of the world, from that incessantly dark thing that’s melted like a candle is. I think it’s trying to communicate something to us, weird message-like signals only I could interpret.

I am its Prophet, I’ve become its Prophet, the Prophet of Homelessness. I’ve been told now, in this vision that I’ve just seen that all men, of all the world, and beyond them are meant to eventually end up on the streets, being slowly but assuredly devoured in the worst possible ways. Incessant incisor-filled vivisections of picking up trash-bag rations alive only to survive on the spare meat their starved-off bodies managed to maintain, even for a short period of time.

I’ve seen it all.’

‘And why are you telling me all this when I can clearly see that creature myself, and I know what to expect, for I know better than to show a sign of weakness and deflect whatever it may be onto them.’

‘Who would be referring to?’

‘The people who will end up on the streets, they’ll survive somehow, but not everyone will end up there, since there are still ways and means to pass time by, and completely eradicate all doubt there is. Come on’ Gloomily he said. ‘I’ll show you.’

Boyatt pulled out of one of his fine-cabinet a mighty looking doubloon crab. It had four eyes, each being closed while one switched-open and did cry:

‘A wind to the north, you must follow it when it draws near your home.’ IT commanded of them, and knowing no better than to obey the command of the eight-ball-like-device, they did naught else but did as it pleased. Most thoroughly dismissed, they got out, set on a path of moth bothersome shouts:

Their companionship had only ‘lived’ on borrowed time. Click, click, was one of the arrows that traveled around, on a counter-clockwise kind of movement that leaped on top the wings of air, the ones that were colder, being brought from winter-fair, was it to say at least:

A strangely wrapped around a tree, a beast, appeared prior to their full-exist, as they were stopped in the saloon inside the lowest of the floors inside their building. It was not an easy task trying to outsmart it, since it was clearly brought from another deeper pit, and shallow, it were; as every leaf was filled with eyes, noses, mouths and beaks, with stings and rays and jelly, quays and elongated lice-beams, and various giant insectoid-growths. Appendages coming out of their many rows and fruits that cackled in each other’s mouths, only to be devoured soon after by the one made of many little parts:

‘The wind has been corrupted, and it needs not touch a plainer silky skin!’

Another, most peculiar homeless one:

‘Dark skinned people don’t have any right to exist. Their genetic continual existence, simply put, represents a human rights violation.’

Indeed, they appeared to cherish their ideas, not to mention that they garnered their dislike for one another’s probing.

‘Gone, he’s gone, he’s fallen alongside the broken castle, on a shrapnel beaded line of carefully aligned explosives.’

‘He’s survived.’

‘How?’

‘Gone has made it still, he’s still breathing, isn’t he? Hidden from sight, yet still breathing, has he actually been biding his time for this long? Planning his next move? Trying to get something out of the ashes of his set-on-fire neighborhood?’

‘I don’t actually know that for a fact, but, what’s stopping us from going on and finding that out?’

‘Nothing, let’s head to his home.’

They marched towards the Nafhus-Achfass Hold. Its brother-like appearance was only overdone by the outwardly heaving outer-barracks that gave it a general feel as such as an arena might’ve given one if seen on first glance. Another tall guard strode in, they were everywhere. Tall and lean, deformed with robes, pointed downwardly conical gloved-spiked gloved helmeted pointing down; whereas out of their bodies giant elongated trunks pushed out a compact mini-delivery truck cartilage out of which many armored arms came out of. And their feetlessness only drew sight to the one thin peashooter cord that, otherwise, was seen as unfitting for the weight.

‘Where does he live?’

‘In there, It can only be that tall-house, the great building made of lush and riches of bloody flails, the ones in possession of the crystal eyes, in which, to which, near, as well, not even the many decayed men would stand guard of.’

‘Then stand tall, brothers, for we are yet to come near it.’

Still they maintained a single thump, with every step about the hour making them pass, as if showered by the lesser things. A strode it was for them, but calcified as the soles of their feet, remained nearing a sight. They only drew forth when, unlike others, were not watched by those whom trashed around them. It was dangerous being there after all, as it happened. If it weren't for the strange figures and the ones that came after them, they would've done as they pleased. Nowhere near, such as to tease one another's likings, had they talked.

‘Curse your mouths, you deranged mental-niggers, I can assure you that neither of us should draw any attention to us, unless there are other considerations you haven't taken yet?’

‘Such as what?’

‘I've been here before. ‘Cried Hagghal, the clock-eyed, his right, the cock-eyed, the other; as he said:

‘Some bolder homeless made the dire mistake of thinking of them as automatons, striding along automatically as if they were nigh-inanimate beings. And you know what happened after?’

‘I suppose they got smashed in, or something more in the likes of something much worse happened to them.’

‘Indeed it had, and unless you, unless we were to touch on it, we could. ‘

‘Shh, silence yourself, I think I hear something coming along.’

A tall-bothersomly wrought in figure, socketless, a pear-fat-banana shaped head, with a forwardly thrust protruding nose shaped as if a caveman shoved his back of his club inside his face, spiked at the end, and a little hill-growth resting on top of it as well. Even his occipital bone appeared to be pointing at the sky, coming out of the middle-region of his skull, whereas, from the side it looked like a bubbly-pair of oblongs forming an E. His mouth opened, revealing noise-making hoses. His body was devoid of appendages but was a dark flying cocoon with appearing and disappearing arms that flapped like bird's wings that bore, eight and seven, loaded revolvers.

‘You're trespassing, do you have any idea of what we do to trespassers even before we got the chance to prosecute them beneath he spiked court?’

‘Slay them underneath their breaths?’

‘Chop them skinless, until their clothes and body parts are indistinguishable from the rest of the ground, which was made on the bodies of a flood-floor trap that swallowed the previous population, driving them to a wild extinction!’

‘A most horrible thing, yet I suppose you’ve learned how to live with your sins.’

‘We’ve done much worse.’

‘In what way?’

‘In terms of brutality and beyond it, but that is not a conversation we are to bear here, but, in a more private place, therefore. I place you all under arrest!’

He meant it, spiking every homeless with a rush of anger and dissatisfying rage.

Holdretch

It was the last hold that remains, juvenily holding with its bastardly set clawed upon scars, the land was but set on trying itself not be dragged down, torn apart as to be completely crushed underneath its looming weight.

‘I bring news of destruction to thee, my lord of dark creation, to which I have spared thee thy call as to prologue the defibrillation of our death and damp and where they stand aloud, in cloud of such puffy-well to do as to destroy themselves with little joy, since they’re but lain in peril, standing upon the such bibulous marches as to which such kinds would eat and devour whatever they can, dreading as to stand near, closer and nigh to such states between living and eternally cast upon a grave of bile-flowers, repartitions of the dead soon to be.’

‘But who are you to tell me what I already come and stumbled upon such knowing as to be made aware? I’ve never seen your face and as it’s come to my understanding, I do not know or feel the likes of you that have been wretched along and put in peril as to make way, although to my court so needlessly invited, I still hold a grudge to all a stranger that’s come or stumbled here by chance, without having had the tenebrous kindness as to introduce himself. Who are you in such a case?’

‘The retriever of most adjacent dreams as to border the line between reality and that of a nighthmerous audacity as to wake up such a sombrous man such as yourself; as I’m but kindly aware that you’ve been sleeping during such wits of eons that to be completely if nigh-forgotten in such ways as that of simple courtesy being largely abandoned in the hopes of what?’

‘Dreadful arrogance as I and the men before me who had taken the crown before I even stumbled upon, with such wit as I am, clumsily so, are guilty of and may never even be as dreary as to lay myself in such forgetful as a nature as to lay still.

But yet you stills stand before me without a name, a thing that’s trying to lecture the ruler of this city fallen, much to which, ingrate you may be, It is my turn to stand upon thee, as to bask upon such admiration of the courage of bold youth, to which I listen and I lay so, whether or not you wish to reveal yourself, I will not intrude and might will it so.’

Blared scared, boom-boom; there was a war of scum they dug the trenches of steel in, men dressed in seal-children and narwhals and other similar creatures came around the hold and threw moist rocks across the walls, trying to destroy everything they could or just as much until they were caught. It was worrisome how hard they tried.

No band would ever know such rafts they carried on the ground, pulling them like wretched malformed sledges of the most delirious manner, a man could find himself standing and sitting in the same place.

‘Let us proceed into ripping this little pest apart, cruelly so. I wager he is but a screamer of the larger kinds, I wish I could get him as far as I dare day, I will make pain be known eternally to his mind, for I will it to be so.’

A slouching man of much profuse knowing was but put through and would obtain but the most unnatural as to be put through such darkness as was neither bold nor would make a man care for what went out and beyond the Hold, since there was nothing there to be gawked on, having fell upon such drenched ample leashes as to be forcefully walked through a field of horned blissful petals as there are, he could not find himself by whichever means he would, at, rather, passed through time never-ending as to be unaccounted for, he would be bled by means of condescension, as to listen to every obscure word of lore they spoke to him during the time they spent around him. Such a person could not by any means make a difference when it came to the most of things defiles, he could not. Of wretched stature, if one may be, he would not find himself there standing for more than it is needed, that is to say, there’s a place for such a man of worthwhile, as such men who bode well when it comes to tasks of the most courageous manners, they would find themselves on the other side of trench and manners. They would seek distraught and lay not their hands, as to be met in battle, that is to look upon such merriment upon the fields, at the very least they would know as much, there’s little hope for man if he is not a wretch to be called. In which and long and torn about each case, might be, one of these strangers founds himself standing on the other side of such ravine, as to have been pinched around one of his most morbid-looking of each toe, that saying as much. He wore nothing but the most worn-about shoes and knew as little of the world as he was allowed to understand, not that it would matter any longer, for what seemed to approach after was but this. A pair of people whom he met before they, before their bodies were set at peace, with themselves and with one if not many of the lords they had been in communion with. Over a long enough period of time, they were but settled on their fate, having but been drenched in what appears to be one of the greatest falls, a ‘well’ as to be deciphered if one were to look for as long. There but little more to be said as such. He spoke to the corpses now. Him, but Cement Flayer Boulvine, being a man unlike no other for no other reason but some distraught chance that had stumbled onto him during such a time as he would not be and wouldn’t find himself in no other place, seeing and being met as well, in his turn by a giant floating flayed upon man who had been impaled upon a great levitating torn which stood aside for the time being. Tormented by such darkness as no man could even wretch himself as if to near; it was near-time for them to speak with it. Every now and then during a long-prolonged memory of such communion, they were rather met, as much as one could tell by a sudden surge of life which brought their corpses back from life, only for a short enough period of time as to be met, closely in chambers, despite the fall by him, as well as everyone else who was present during that time, be it an aviator of a most obliquely shaped type, that is to say a bird or the dire-in need of thirst fire ants which appeared to be widely spread across the place.

‘Why hast thou come here and for what reason do you seek such inquire as there’s but very little need to cut through veil as there’s but no man around this abode to make is so a thing like you, of as much worth could seek out of us. You who would but seriously, if one were to be of a much better mind consider this, turn around and leave as soon as you can if you know what’s best for the embrace of another may never be felt by one who stays here, even if what’s intended for such wake as yours, to be called but the love of another.

As one such as me, who has felt and seen and whom bled upon them from the tip of my great horn have known just as much, having watched upon so many things I’ve come to stumble and realize that there’s little to no hope, for the broth of a foolish lover may never be accounted, such pettiness of worth to you. A man who mastered no skill, whom’ but pity took ill has come to stumble upon death, is that what you desire, coroner of such kind? Have you finally stumbled upon the birth of another in which case, were you altered in a case?

Did they hurt you by some means as to disperse your soul and make it so you’re but a tool of vileness in their play of destruction? Is there any satisfaction to be taken back when they find you drenched in evil blood?’

‘Enough of that, I will not listen to a second more, I whom had been standing here for more than you, I seek no peril nor will I be met by death. I’ve come here not by chance, nor should I be called to search for any other lover, as I’ve but come to search for nothing more than a tool. ‘

‘That is to say, the only tool there is to carve?

Would you fashion this garden in your like?’

‘I will liken myself if I so desire, in such a delirious manner as there is, there can be nothing more that will put be at peace once I’m done with it, other than knowing that I’m done.

For such a place as for the bile that is spread around, before the Hold, of growths and such destruction. I have been made aware of the lore and of the knowledge that’s been put forth before me and I must confess, that I’ve known of putrid and of putrefying even before I stumbled upon it, nonetheless, I seek as much as there’s to see, take no pity, but dread as one could bitterly see. Tell me of the kind direction, Man of Flying Thorn, today that I may seek a way to bring some restoration from everything that’s been made and would to be told.’

‘Are you but ill as to find yourself thinking like a man? A human that would see such manners, bastardly be ware, there’s but nothing even dreary to have come about, to have stumbled on your place, there’s but a tendril of distraught thorns, I see as much but there’s no more left for restoration. Everything’s been damned long before you stumbled onto it.

What you're looking as well as threading upon is but a trail of much emancipation, of the beings which destroyed and brought about such wretched things as there would be around, the decimation of every living thing and structure that's been here long before you came.'

'And what of them who are beneath us, alive in their mild embrace? What of you, a man on thorn speaking with me who has been here for such means as there, upon no face of the earth would I have found you by any means, I see no reason for there to be an explanation, as to see.'

'They're but come around from mightily away. You should know that for they came out the plains, near one of the villages you were but born in.

As for I, I am but a creature come from another world, one that hasn't even been called for during such time, I pray of old, so there might be something said.'

He was but struck by such a dumb-obtuse ascendancy that one may have thought him an angel simply by mere peer of sight. Of little fright and more of that when once and once again, it may have stumbled on his way. He shone, Boulvine was but in his prime, a man, no longer was the Floating Thorn in wonder.

'I see that there's something, that is to appear, between the two of us, as it happens I was and have been searching for one as such as there is of your kind. You're but a strange one, come before me as one disguised as a nastily prolonged being, of which nature I would've never known as such, there's no need to hide away now, come out, come out of the body you've stolen from the patch.'

'You've come to understand as much.' Cried Boulvine, as if he had been seen and made to appear in the most capricious and fallacious manner, in peril he lay. Of such dark forces as to be reflected from every side of the reign that crossed, across the forest, must one as such even be deranged if were to see. His eyes, his eyes but shone with such alacrity, yet they were not there. He wore a body that was plain to see not there, at all. Was it a must that he was there, at all?

'What have you come here for?'

'In search of the carving tool, have I not told you?'

'Granted as there is as much, is your will not divine by any means? Would you simply not happen to be beyond it, as that is but a slight fragment of your fashioned power, of the trunk that is servile, that which is to say, you may never be met with kindred in the same place. A man with no face would rather make a tool bolder than.

I see no reason why he would not wretch this land and destroy it when the time approaches. He would make but proper use, but you? If you wilt it, all would but crumble under sludge.'

'I see no reason to tell you as such, but I shall do it nonetheless since time has come. I seek to crack it into stone and destroy everything that's come onto me.'

'What will you do then if you were to find.'

'I will blind you and I will blind myself by whatever need there is, do I find myself understood? Could it be that I see no reason here, let alone, rather.'

He but stopped and looked about the place, there was but a servant there, of ghoulish rook appearance, which indeed had no face.

‘I am the Wearer of the Staff, Clehy.’ That was but laughter, or giggle in normal tongue.

Clehy approached with what appeared to be nothing more but sticks upon such stone, and wrapped around with robe-torn apart and barely put together, as much as his time stumbled, he came to ask as well, as well. Need it be, for such need as termination, that one may be damned, will you listen to me, oh great creature, alas.

He was to be a servant such as guide. He was to follow in the footsteps of those whom were alive. Again but dead, could he not be here by such means as to employ sickness, if one were to know? Or throw a rock and plain as it were, could his mere presence there show that there was something beyond the two of them? A liar, nothing more than a liar and a worse one at that; basked in his own blood in which his servants but drenched each other and flew about.

‘You are but searched for, when the time approaches, you are to come around each day and listen to us.’

Whom to speak of their evil when the reigns of darkness draw, when they were but shown to destroy, and when the towering malformations appeared out of the sky; no darkly lore or priestly manner, nothing as fatherly as to cudgel the destruction upon such manner as these empty words seem to dictate. They were but present there for a reason, dark beings as they were, one and one that would be morbid. The likens, drawing ever near.

‘We’ve come from the most distraught place, we seek as much, that is to say, allow us to draw what we can from your body, then, you shall be left to go along your way and do as you please.

For such a creature as you are is way beyond peace and means of likely bold continuation.

Such power needs as the very least to be partially contained, otherwise, what would happen to one, if he were to stumble upon you at all. No one dares to contradict that what we are to do is but to force you to succumb such fragments of your power as may be, yet.

Here’s what you ask, a part of your gut that may be put through the mule’s head that may be brought to the great eight devourers that come after, and draw near and ever fear of something that might happen to them. If you could as much do something that may by any means come behind it, at any hour.

If you could bring us something in return, perhaps we could be persuaded to, in our turn, jeopardize or solemn act. Litigiously playing around the corners of this act.’

‘You don’t mean to trade what I’ve come to ask of him as well?’

‘Why not? Is there something one could not find himself wanting, if not, but to feel the pressure of such thing.’

‘I will weed such a thing and make it so plain, it’s plain to see that there’s something else to it, but alas, I must confess that I see no reason for you not to take it for a while, with the one and only such exception being that we may confer upon one another this as much. Once you had your play, that is to say, you will have destroyed, reformed, made the land and carved it out by malicious or frivolling mean, then I suppose, it's only fair that I may get it afterwards, in order for it to be destroyed once and for all and left without a stretch of a single shadow that it ever might've existed at all.'

'Then we strike a deal, sit and stone.'

With which they but opened him, in front of the thorn and the other things present in the home of these dark abominations. Would one, as it would suffice to know, find himself staring?

Lower land, they dwelled in it, not be called when the time drew forth and might've stumbled in. There stood but a crane, something that would not be there, a dreadful arrogance that followed, closer and closer and little after, would they fare the knowledge, came to be.

There is darkness in the heart of man, he will always seek to destroy. He cannot be stopped, that one that is born of evil will, tenebrously tender in his heart. Such as there lay, there, will not be spoken of, instead some other place will be approached.

Beyond land, somewhere that existed and didn't, at the same time, as no possible paradox, but a disconnect from the general sight there was, one that could possibly be remarked as the complete destruction and rip-off from reality of their dreams, possible lived-through futures, aspirations and memories, all put together and overlapped, in an eternity shared, and senseless as man would have it, from every possible side. Each and every single one of them was there, in some part.

A captured farmer taken from his staunchly set ranch, then put amongst leprous friends, to his head but a part of a peculiar house which spread about the place, evolving as it had begun, but the sea-enlarged to come and be torn apart, all-together in an unimaginable yet decrepit song of many wrongs, all of which were to be done as far as they could have themselves, be spoke to in eighteen voices.

What wretch was to follow through?

A man put on such a branch, of many thorns had come at last. Deeper than the maceration; bastardly they rose.

Dark meat-wreathed corpses that were not on their way to the throngs of pits and falls; were to be seen and heard after such falls; lay, lay, lay deeper roses. For each of them, frozen little dark petals, all imbued; in some way they were.

Imbued with a strange oozing ululation, but watch kindly as they marched along, trampling the line, and roused up they spread, only one had come.

Standing in shingles, the wretch brought tingles to everyone whom watched and but to thread along no longer called.

There was one of them which was still moving around, wherever one could look and in whichever direction, it served as a reminder of the little petty thing that was behind it. Brooding around like a tiny flake of blood-platters, all surrounding themselves in the most unnatural manners.

'I lay with thee in such regard as there but hope for me to ask, dear me that there might be something for me to take and claim when the time calls upon me to satiate the wonder, I but wretch ask of you this much as well. Say where and I may go if the time should sow such need as there is, to bring but a most unnatural little dark thing that is a knife or blade.'

'Where am I to be pointed in such a way if that's the case?'

'Back into the place of Yore, bring me an apple from the black flying gore, and I shall but give you what you require most of hopeless a world.'

'A childless thing that I may watch over, when I am to be brought before you and before long, where and how may I end up laying and I shall bash its head and turn it into a pool and wink at it before it's been shot front.'

Upwardly he saw it so.'

Farther than it:

'Lo and mighty hour upon which the miles are to be completely and solemnly scourged, I come thee yonder and ever closer as there's but little left to achieve for man in shape of evil that there is before the dawn of the cruelty there is, as that would cause such trouble and destruction upon every hanging man there is upon the world, I see a reason to call and pace through the troublesome war that had begotten us where we are, upon the shower of cold water in the river of Murgue where dead-damp spirit lay aside in their wake, I see a future that may take us both, to such wretch of seeds and lay.'

And whence the hatred would to be subside and would to follow through as soon as they could brush the side, they had commeth upon such lay, whereas mightily they would look whichever other way as for the humans that were around, lay in suffering after day in which many would die.

'I come upon thee, of great dark spell, alas. You whom has seen pray of lust and known whom to cast on side and, you see what I see and where I stay now, there is as much as one could fathom through.'

Thence both Klikiesh and the Hyena but walked through one of the villages that were set on despair. And walked ever so thoroughly as there was a reason to set eye on wretch; to follow just as soon after before they could be lain.

A man was stricken down by a handle, of which axe was burdened with what happened after, for the pints that entered through enamored by the eerie sight, was brought to a hunchback as would call her back.

'What had happened during plague? During time where evil wretch, when those had stumbled yet to see.'

'They stole, master of all, they stole from me a flock of blades, of which but handles never lay, but entered through men and used as such, I wish only to be grabbed and by the side of things, I couldn't see nor watch as many, but they were here and they were plenty.'

'Dressed in what?'

'Little antelope, hybrenas, hibernating just as such; they but followed through and just as funerals, they were here in a while, to see, and stole what they could out there.'

The hunchbacked witch but pointed them, and would to know, settled as such, followed through and was allowed to call upon help as there were countless things that could go wrong. Evil day that would dismantle them, they were neared such an end.

Of man, no caravan was empty, but there was a cackler in a giant stone they met along the way. Out of the couch as follows, would to happen if they were to be heard. It was a darkly thing in matter of standing, not too much lifting or bending after a while, what followed through, would happen again now, if only they were to surround themselves. An affront as such as would there be, a prank they said, a jest called see. And they looked.

‘I am the great pester, the one who brought the plague.

My servants the evil insects were, as it may, brought in the lust of Spanish flies that bred, or similar to kind and breed as they would die off, in whiffs of air, I seem to have fallen through in dark despair, lo’ and there yonder see and observe in the forest where stronger of those whom fled before you carved the way.

Some of dark, and mist at last; two tall burning bore through casts were burning during brim and follow through, and incessant screaming, lay in it, and through the tubes and wallowing in, they burnt after. In place they stood and lay as well.

Helmelekke was but a prune, he has reached and would scoop out and would’ve found himself tirelessly wasting, as if a wafer never ending. Out of fire he had reached at last, casting himself from just as far a place as he could stand away from, passing over through both pillar and stone, he had come to throw away both men as if they shone. There, past them he had come and stumbled upon the trenched forest where he would’ve made such call. Him but an anchor to some world he might’ve forgotten if there was a chance to do it and to lay where he stands. But near oh, near, it would but signal for him to reach, and move away from where he stood as such, and follow in.

A peculiar thing, the Thorn Hliuglet, of might, endeavor as much as could be told. Would reach to see as much as they could be, they lived in some incessant glorious instability; finally broken yet a voice did bring. And thorns were speaking to blameful of wretched masses, which his inside insidious air, whom had followed through and asked through whisper, when to come through and tell. It was something to be aware of, being impervious to all but touch, and degraded and what followed after, Helmelekke was but asked.

‘See that fragment of a frame, that fell out of a broken hem? That one that has white fur on it after a manner, I wish you’d bring it to me now and ever so sooner after; no much sooner than it is worth and somehow I could see it as much, it is a glitter that an ant would see but it cannot be seen by normal eye.’

‘Then why must I go and follow it in that case?’

‘Because thou must follow find it for us, for we shall help your not get split and thinned and breathe in as if thou were to be cast in the most perilous of dangerous to be in and lesser of splits that your mind, that things that’s ours now might live.

We offer you this and only thing, a way out, you may be able to pick it or whiff it out, as your choice is only made.'

'I choose to do it in that case.

I shall find you that glimmer of a frame, whatever that means, I shall do it by whichever way there is.'

But before he could finish, of the striking roads there seemed, only but a single thin, planted on the sides uncannily, bastardly even and even more thoroughly. Many whims of many roots, and many of them simply put.

A strange talker, chatterer that was dressed, in iron-belt stretched arrows, that looked as if they formed a fort, within it was a bubble heart and a man formed out of a jelly block, it couldn't be distinguished either, but every wrapped about anchor, within every arrow but a single sheet, with many words of agony wasting and many of them of ill-defeat, they spoke of plenty days to come, as evil sages had become, hardier by the hour, trying to write what they could, and would. They were remembered during such evil day. Like one of these, whence one were to behave and be kindly put around the shaft and fall down and be buried inside the ground.

'I am Shelfeat, the Self-Eater in defeat and I challenge you to a tournament of less defeat, where our hearts should see one another after dark and we shall see whom shall bring the darkest of those that are about us.'

'Whom are you looking for?'

'I do not know but all of the sudden.' Shelfeat seemed bizarrely afraid as he looked around and would refrain from looking anywhere but yet around. 'I remember, oh dark woe, to me, I see that something's yet to come but it had followed me through dark and none other could know of it.'

'What are you afraid of?'

'Of them, of them, there's no, nothing in there but dust.'

'Down there, then we shall, perhaps we could have our tournament somewhere else, no?'

Other

Twass a dying beast across the scarred border, whereas they lie in heart as worth as follows.

'Listen to me now whereas wherever they might go and claim, of plenty ham and wrought in lain. There is nothing in there, out there and in any other place for me to hold graven bolden golden plate. Than to ask for such a palate of pastels, as there is inside.

I seek of you, I ask. What is that?'

And he followed through, and joined as guest, they were both but made to stay the night and refrain from everything that went around. Passed from hand and hand, was brought.

Of which power was drawn from time to time when it but pulled away from it, this could be said.

‘I am the Great Sage of Kill, I’ve taken every animals and turned it into pill, I’ve made everything I could make out of them and found something, a trick you may never come to understand, something of my decrepit mind that is search-destruction, brought from the insides of my chest where is my brain-chest that which hides and hisses away all stranger that hides in glass and in the trenches of masses that there are there, I call at last that you may come to understand.

It’s a ritual that may bring such end as that, might it be dissected from such times and times again, I shall cast whatever there is of me, again.

I have crushed those pills in my mouth and ever so momentarily I’ve become them even before the time could arrive, I could but search and cry upon them as I inherited their blasted memories and cast out of my mouth but what they had inherited from their dark masters, the Alabaster-shaped and hardened Boasters that have claimed to kill my previously cherished victims I’ve taken the claim and lives off in such time of peril as there is now.

Look outside.’

At the mark he spat, out and out, plenty of kitten-shaped dolphin shrouds of many colored spikes that but pierced the window like arrow shafts. He choked with little baboons and was become now no longer comically cursed by the pills, that were drawn, the cattle-boons and the horses now lain in the greater haves, down there, in front of his house.

‘I’ve also formed every livid barbarian there lay outside into a pill as well, but I’m afraid of choking on them as one would know of what to search after, and find himself after, looking after me as I’m old. That much I’m told.’

‘What was told of your past before? And whom might lie about it when told? I seek retribution for those whom choked on chains without explanation, and now that I came upon you, Great Sage of Kill, I’ve come to understand as follows and might not follow within the reek, I claim, your life is to be on its way and be wasted as follows.

You’ve admitted guilt to me for having made poor peasants die, in thorough and in defeat, at the feet of which only their wives might understand what followed after what the heaps might mean.

Please, Sage, follow me as such, you shall admit your guilt to the peoples and then I shall but stab you down, take you down, claim you on top of a great Arc that I shall claim for myself, bringing only calamity to all the men that might follow me after in such battle as there might be.’

‘Leave me house or I shall call upon my powers and make you but choke on a pill.’

‘Am I to be killed then? Am I to be completely destroyed and made to waste?

Like everyone else before me who has done nothing for or to you as to claim. Why?’

‘Because you alone are sole witness to my shame and guilt and I will have no witness.’

Then he willed the pill in the man's mouth, which in turned formed a great house and greaves of iron which in turn destroyed half of the Sage's room, entering the basement as he was but splattered in.

'What have I done? I brought ruin to my own house, blasted barbarian, I didn't expect. You had a house erected before you died, but how much time had you on your hands?'

And by no means or powers could he but remake the house and it was already wickedly destroyed in such a way as he could not understand, nor did he want at all. He was but uncannily unaware of what was happening around him, so he left.

Within the hour he was but at a Make-do, filled with training men of plunder who traded only by fighting and by large misuse. Since there was no such thing as the Sage wilt or might, he could only but cower in fright and offer as much.

'I may only fight the only way I know, and this is the only thing I can show for my skill.'

There was a scar, he hid something in the scar. A hidden long-vein like secret compartment that had bottled air-launchers hid in that actioned one another, weaker and weaker, then stronger in the front or at least as it neared the wrist from all the way back to the back of the forearms, prepared to launch a pill, or will it in someone's mouth. Great and grand they were weary of what might happen if they put trust in him.

The mind is but repair. And there is much despair in the man that follows instead of trying to fix himself before he draws near. This den-hovel house-watch that was but a kingdom in itself where they gathered about, and made a structure, on a pit of dirt, that followed after.

Where they put a few fences as well as many other things as well, and cast upon themselves such pain as there was but punching and punching away, neither of them could help, or wreath as well. Not a single man to tire, they were but sweating after the fire.

But once the Great Sage of Kill, had come within them, and ranks of Ill, once he had figured out what to lay, and will it away, he did it as if to convey. Only the strongest of pain-muscles wilt inside their heads and paunches, and everything that followed after. What could be distraught and what followed about were many men that fell down, while others had to worship him as time but came to a stop. Oogling for far too long; he figured out that he might as well just order them. Make me a bench, a table that I may do what I want to do then leave without a trace and no longer will I turn your kin in such disgrace as there is and I shall only bring the most unfathomable ends and bend the will of every living thing as well that may come to challenge.

They brought the materials from far away. Some even took weeks or months at an end. And they house the Sage in their tents and fed him grains, watered his thirst as it followed as well. Back aches for the cold that was the cylinder of ice his spine was made out of. His existence was a limited one and as soon as, to say the least the next Summer, it would melt and he would die, ripped in an explosion of guttural sounds and noises that may never be found afterwards, it was the only thing he could follow after and the only thing he could wish.

First to be finished with the bench and incantations, he but put a finger in.

‘Who else will offer me a part?’

‘I will, as long as you make such claim as to say it will last.’

‘It will, it will and never wonder, if I put a sill through.’

He made a most obtuse thing as a spell, a chamber out of a finger bloated, in which he crawled in, also killed many of them as well, yet not himself since he appeared to be phasing through the fingers that were added in. Then the Finger-shaped house-hornet flew away with him in it. Lead by such hill, as there was floating in the sky, lain on a floor that was air and floods of thunders that were dry, no rain and no storm, the hill opened, and split in half, entered by him, and met by Bloor.

Mighty man of hardy nature, eighteen pelts of belts and danger, made to feel and made to watch he had a head inside his sash. Kept it warm, but companions complained.

They were there, during a diner, all of them Violet-dressed dames. All but sipping on green tea, smiling with pearls of white, I see. They were wearing red hats with little marks and drawn on top jewels. Some of the jewels had spikes. Some of the spikes had hairs and were alive, as in made of some unnatural skin that would’ve belonged to a creature from another world.

‘I am seeped of many a kill, I’ve taken lives and yet to still myself before one great proper. I could’ve killed you as soon after I was to be found, near the den where they planted you, I could only see as far as a year.

I didn’t know you’d contend or that you might find yourself but there, during a time that might be held, to commemorate such disease as there is as well. This joy with others, something that I’ve never shared; you were supposed to be like a blood brother to me, but I find myself lonesome instead of knowing what to tell.’

‘But brother, you’ve killed, too many died by your hand and still.

I will take you in.’

Thenceforth he was housed for many days.

Soon enough they were joined as well, by a strange primitive world. They were entered by the contortion that was thumb-but-hill, that served as a key, entered now, of worth.

A sizzling sight, of red spins, something that was the sky, colored but a vortex and many things that moved when ill. They were puking but red, the lands were dead and made of hen, all dead and sutured as well, but could be walked on.

Sage of Kill and Blur, they came and wee to follow, a few violently dressed red hated by the pockets of red-mist that were in the air as followed came after. They were thinking of trying to bring hurt, upon the Sage for they hated him, for he was not as tall nor as sharp as there would be more.

Brought about and seen before, a great thing it was, unnecessarily thin.

Attacked by great spirit, fathom it as such, a giant head that was made of fat – far extended from the point in which it stood, with many horn-like entries that were pushing out, they should. Acting like snakes, and little ostrich-bodied shaped legs, many of them extended forth. A fat man lump that was but connected to a giant conveyer-belt form; from every side of it but pushing, the ostrich-legs but hooting as they extended their heads, or his legs, up and down like primeval grass-hopper steady, but kept in line, no arms and nothing else but many openings in the chest from which flat-like globules were set in flight, many even more pumped and moved away, made to push through as well. Many which were winged, others whom were not; but the giant fat-lumped head's eyes, they were hypnotized. Of malady he was made to waste and push out of the holes in his chest but many unnaturally set gases all of which were but set around and followed around whatever they could, the dead voice followed soon after. He opened himself as soon as he could, but then again, he was done for, and rotten away.

But lo' as soon as there was one as clouded, as soon as he was in to come, and therefore from where he stood, there was, to run, upon whence they followed after, of such bands that were counted after every stone for wear and everything put, and everything worn away, they called, as such, upon the act, they called for more and something after, and wilt it to happen, as if torn behind. For as hardly put together as it were, it could fall, in such a thing that would cast all of them with it, as to put aside wherever they might go and plead. And feed each chicken, broken wing, a swing and a miss, whereas where they lay, upon a graven gray, and open, as to, let alone, uncouth forget, what happened after. In the midst of the distancing there came a stray disaster, they had called the mourning.

Lo' and lay first of the men who stumble upon him, to call.

'I've seen by and by with every hour pass, my brothers pay but stone to last, and get but away, and take what they say, an ounce for every pig they slaughter and bloody stone and bloody after, went to flight, and out of sight I wonder yet what happened after, long before I died.

Long before I've been bled try, I, of man who, let alone try myself, I feel myself left to sight, and breathe upon the lost plains, I ask of last and last of men, whom have I become and since my body lay beneath home, where am I to go?'

To which they but entertained; the spirit taken out of his fallen graven, a soul for every passer seeing, for each and every single one of them falling through, as but diseased was but a ceiling. And lost and out of touch for no longer were they standing yet to watch for every fallen brother yonder, for what was butchered after, it had stopped. No spoil of war and no reminder of what dignity was of such and flight, they were but set to wonder just as soon, hardly a matter since that point on, they were to swoon.

But alas, in the distance there stood but Ifeldus, whom but on such cry, he whom followed but in tune, to die, were he sent after, would he ask?

'Have you come to show me where my mere path has led me thus?'

'You are set here in stone, have you forgotten? Through stone and lay and waste and they, whom shall follow through as well, when forgotten, lain in frog, through such murkiness, I would call. No other man to hear such rain, for all the sacrificing gone a long way, where it to be. If you had known as such, you would've called it, before, I see there's something but a speck, I see that you still stand, yet. There's no reason to stay here any longer, city watch, there it stands.

Broken and wretched, I see, at last. You've stumbled upon something I've yet to name.'

'But how could that be since, dear man, you've led me to my grave, no promise and no spoil and none as such that would follow after, I see that you've entranced me yonder.

Could there be as such, as a mistake?'

'That is for your godden vows, and for those wrongs, for those whom had known betrayal, they, of many a man and many of them were brought here as well, so much so as it is within reason, I can say.

Lay your arms for you no longer need them, as they stay, lay your hands and whatever you bear. Lay your body down there and see where you may get to, such, as it is. I can hear the course of water, and of spring.

You must, at once but follow through and sing.'

'Won't I fall, if I am to go through it?'

'Nay.'

And he was on his way, lay dead, as his father wilt it, without a say.

There was the dark in clouds and whom followed after, a wretched thing, a bloated cluster, and what came through, after, from the other side of the wall, brought, seen through the giant beast, not to stall, came but the Sage and the Blur, the many maidens as well as they could turn and reach, they grabbed each man and held on him. No longer would they complain of height, not to bear such an insurgence after that, only after a while would it make sense, but out with them and out of their faces, then again.

'Have we been eaten then?'

'I see no reason to hide, I think we've stumbled upon such land as it but changed, in tide. I think there's but a thing to say for every shared reason in Kill.'

'I bring death from within.'

'That is good to know, Great Sage of Kill.

But what does your command think it might do, when upon sea I see but a rip in dirt, that's followed through. But have you beckoned of die?'

'I've yet to come to stumble upon such a man.'

Purple-yellowed Dame-cadaver, as such he painted their corpses in the lack of an exposed color, what followed after were them floating, levitating yonder. Spinning and spurring as if they weren't not of a place, of a face belonging to this earth, they couldn't shake themselves off or be set forth.

Many of them were but strained, and neither of the dames would, let alone, explain.

'Have you wilt them dead?'

‘I have, I have and there’s a great reason for that, and I might come to explain to you what I see, there in the distance, there’s nothing more and nothing plainer, I am pleased to say that I’ve stumbled upon many but fewer, lesser of such concoctions.

I’ve stumbled and fell, I come yet to know as well. That what we’re after is a land of pores.’

‘Will they breathe us in?’

‘They might, and I might make it our home.’

With which they were but giant race, it appeared and wore no face. The entire species of the beastly kind, it was maddening to see it but on a front and only on the line, around the sky and floor, but no more than fifty feet each side, they were depressed through, but flew as well as it could, all but standing, on top and on to ride. One another’s shoulders hiked on the first try. For plains of ever window clouds, and puffs were flown through, were they to be met, and lie.

Tender

Alas, it shall be so, settled that no man might be so blind.

Staring at the mirror for too long and barely standing, blamably as such, it was all kind and terror until someone opened the door. It was all morose until someone with a heart came along, and then.

They were taken after a while and made to suffer like monkeys in pucker bucket cages, all made to breathe.

Alas of stranger day, there stood, an open door that alone would shook. Would to be, came the gallant groom:

‘I’ve shaken nomad off thine land and seek when hour yet to come, of dry and off grander, of what came there of little more than stronger than there is, I seek the one that’s in power lain across thine field, I see as much. There’s green along and many yellows, all of whom were to be turned to turpentine, a fellow. Once had told me just as such, I wear a helmet that’s a beat and its eye.’

‘Whom was the one you’ve taken it from?’

‘A man of his own worth, whom had looked for me when I was in need, and least of all, would I have seen it happen, if there was a chance within, and within my time, I would’ve done it so and I might’ve reminded myself.’

That there was hope past the Lefighl Spire, and he, Lhyuglsnafflur would’ve found it hard, a wretch alone to admit in his house as to admire. Of golden vows, he had begun, of little more than the golden blue that’s taken him a while. To notice and to keep the pace as to find the man whose stolen his grace. For only a pure man, as one might be, were it to happen for, he, alone was to marry his wife. His soul could only be as sun. A Lellekplapper was but there, standing upon dark surroundings, unaware of life around, surrounded by a stench he was but gone, drawn inside the yellow flower, eaten before he spat a lyre. His bones were sharpened, he was but a mule, as soon as he was spat out, it sung but a drool.

‘I’ve come to serve and tickle thine dreams, will you accept my gift or are you to be at such a feat, as no one else might find them yet, to draw from the reality, before a time that might be lead.

Stagnation comes from deeper south.’

‘Do not shun me when you can, least of all but misbehave, bereaved as you are, I come at last to take what I claim and might take a moment longer yet I’ll be done.’

‘Then have at you, petty man, I’ll eat your throat and malnourish you away!’

Thwarted but as yonder, touch. There was as such, the lord was but a cast away, from where he stood, the groom but taken, yet abashed, off the road now gone and home he must. Unless intruded upon, no longer had he lest of all any chance, like a grasshopper with hope in its heart, what came after could only bring his command, back from where it started an even further.

Devious thing had but appeared.

It spoke of same tongue, but never to near. It jeered like a petty snake, one that was retracted yet skinned-purple, and of barriers let.

‘I am come here to bring you fine brew, I’ve come from wild destination whence my ancestors still dwell anew.

Each with new skin least of all abandoned, each of them but mightily in fright but let alone darted.’

For not a single one was filled with venom.

It said something in his ear and the man was made as to dissappear inside a peculiarly shaped galleon.

Before the reigns were put down, it’s been a while, and thenceforth from where they stood, it’s begun. Twenty more and more to follow after, whence they came and drew onwards after; came but Leggev-Leger Moon Basil, of dreadful ledge on which he stood, there were as many and yet to prove, neither of them touched either of the walls, and neither more would know to follow on, they drenched the stalls. And no longer in asking, one of them intruded on his study:

‘Where are you come from and from what age have you come from, when, upon drawing along to our conflagrated den, you poured in before each step and you invited yourself before a time yet. Thence before the hour, you’re given ink and you shall spill it wherever you can or you shall be taken ill and dreaded so.’

Broken teeth along the path, they ruminated after dark.

In the room entered a figure. It was tall and none the breather.

Tall and glossy, glorious as if the helmet was made out of caustic, and of petty red, for whatever reason, dread ahead, thence it followed after. Dressed and mightily adorned with a queer look that couldn’t be of his own, nor lack of either, a stranger to the eye he seemed. Desperate for some sort of approval, and a wink to the eye, he wore them around his neck and just about his jutting dye, which much protruded and never as for long intruded on anything else but his bloody slim. And neck within, and trench-dug body heaving in, that much looked about right.

Many patterns of floral design and the destitute of a great helmet standing around each shoulder as they passed from hour to hour until no longer would he cower, the man introduced himself innocuously as follows.

‘I’m Grahlmouse and I’ve been following you even since I’ve read your sacred paper, after heaving out of trench, through the body I stolen, I am the man that killed the village you were in.’

‘Bastard, why have you done that? What reason is there?’ Cried Basil and in a moment he realized that he would lose his temper no matter what entered his reasonless ill. Too hard, periods of much disgust would follow after, none that could apply to him, he was set to follow after, realizing, deep within, there was something wrong about the world. He didn’t fit there, not at all.

‘Where have you come from, if you don’t mind me asking? Seeing how you’re a sage great, someone that cannot be unnerved or made to waste, I’ve come to know nothing else and nothing of the matter.

But I know as much and I know, right after. You’ve made yourself some tiny bead, and on your paper, which I see that lay put around, as follows, at your feat, there’s something that cannot be done about it, can it?

You’ve made a name out of yourself in these parts.’

‘Wait a minute, now wait a minute, there’s nothing here worthy of such disciple, I think, you need to reconsider as much.

Listen to me, Grahl and I will try to entertain whatever scheme this is before I lay my arms in whichever other means there are.

First, for your question, I was born in the little town of Lynhbernile, not that it should matter for a big since you, vile thing, just so happened to destroy it.’

‘Have I? How and what have I done to earn such a thing? Have I truly been as wild as I were mischievous?’

‘You were, of course you were, in case you weren’t, whom else might’ve brought the destruction past the breathing places in my home?’

‘Lo, behold, I see something being taken hold off.’

What could it be and was he bluffing? Such arrogance was mislaid and put just about heaved, and wreathing. Pleasure was just as much as follows.

A great dark beast wreathing in and out, one could see it, a two ships put on top of one another, endless wings in the back, many of which looked like an inverted melting sea that was brought back to life and inwardly-pressing. All too close to the misgiving and the dark depression that pushed within and without, and breathed upon them before the time could draw on.

And whence it started calling upon dark days and the Danes, of spirits which whence called upon, like ancient flags upon the wails, were to follow through and see, they would be, and ancient men of long renown had carried their gift of little more than time allowed, and ancient day but followed after, as the beast came only not as stronger, but infinitely more so and darker than some says would allow it to come forth.

Of little more angelic grace, determined to come after, when the time as well; a figure showed, was spat behind, but of the long mile, it broke through the door and charged through the pile, of hay, and houses and of studies, there, whence stood in front of Basil and of Grahl. Both of them being thoroughly greeted and obeyed, for every word came along the way. It could be of nothing more than sunken and little more than it could be defiled and seen for what it truly was, and therefore since that point on.

Wretched was the need to ask.

‘Who is the man that came back and returned?’

There was something about the room and the figure, in the way it stood. For starters it was little more than eighteen feet high and looked about ripped apart, and made to be in whichever other way there was space left around the room, that much was shook and neither of them could understand what made one feel compelled to ask:

What had happened after that?

Basil was the one to flee, he didn’t do it out of some vice that compelled him to sacrifice everything as to prologue it, nor out of arrogance would he do it, yet. Out of kindness he had asked himself as much, and why stay? Why stay at all?

It was immaterial to such for such a book as would there be, and anywhere else where one might make claim as there to be, there was, as it were unclear, of much and as for long as there was ware, they wouldn’t have looked at hold, to bear.

Outside, as one of the fallen citadels beyond the garden and beyond the Hold, there stood a strange formation, buried inside a cold-stone, there touched.

Yore they yelled

Curl thine way and lay in place wherever else they might follow after, as of slaver the one that cannot wait, impatient as they say, until the day where the mirthful might satiate as such, there came the sermon in a time of much well earned distrust between men, that followed after, as they reminded one another of glory and what follows through, of much and deeper lord, that waited for them to come through light of gate. As soon as earth would let alone come in time to let, as it spared, beware and behave as one could see it yet as such, many men but went their way and much to their blessings yet again avoided and followed on the house of bells, where upon the cherished blessed day, no longer stalling after hunt and brought about the margins but a single light that had been brought from a hovel's after side, whence they had burn the pagans and the heathens, in disgust and least of all disturbing cast the ones that came from far, the dark ones that were skinned, at last, they only brought their heads, not to give another second after, they came to bring no bitter press upon their bodies, souls. Many were missing but such as they were it was known that neither man, of dark enclave, of what had made them, let alone would understand what it took, for men that shook to be brought back to the world, in light. And be made to have known what that meant and to bring themselves out of their grovels, in which they hid, as to be made to cloud their judgments when the time was brim, of augur burning, ever since.

'They've destroyed it because you stalled, you men, of all should've known what was happening before the time had drawn on, you of all should've brought yourselves closer, and instilled, and felt what they might care to call, you left yourselves open to sin.

For no man should bring as such, another darker one closer to him, as such, for their souls are naught but ashen-brown and they've been burning ever since they came on, into this world, with nothing more than a will to destroy, I call you as, and ever since, as men of mighty armor, of strength and much wonder, as to listen to my, such command.

And spread wherever you might and charge upon their blasted lands and claim their lives and drive in masses, for they have brought disease and cast you from your righteous path, they would contort you in such plain disgust as many of you will have forgotten, from ancient time and what comes after. For there is evil in their hearts and malice, that which can only bring destruction after, and ever bring themselves much, forth and yonder as to corrupt you as such.

I call upon thee' men to grab whatever you can and cast them from the heavens you've built but were cast away from them once they realized, once they've come to known, that your souls are too charitable, filled with compassion as one would should, immediately forgotten, just as after, one would pick a dog and let him starve, the master is what they've become, but not on rightful, fair of terms, they've stolen from you and contorted everything, as you would known.

Cast away, cast as such, you need to bring the culprits to such justice as such jaundice would call, the call of war that never might stop, the one that would have you all cast them out. And cast them by force as to denigrate them further, destroy and fallen, and rightfully after, I call upon you all again.

Despite their lands, and leashed backs, as you will follow through to punish all and all after, without wretch and without disgust, you shall go much further down in land, you shall put them out of their miseries and convert their lands to such a proper thing that might be holly after, as to bring your heart back into the place and beyond the misery they might caster after if left to proliferate and then and only then as such, will you be allowed a pause, and nothing more and nothing fairer as to cleanse them, ever the closer to despair, and much farther than that, bearer of their skin, I call upon you since. To show yourselves and cast away, regardless of what you were promised, it is clear that you are traitors and traitors amongst the way, may never be accepted.

For fairness may be forgotten just as soon as you show, the malice that can be found in them, as you will be cast as well, in snow. Where you will rot amongst your darkly skinned brothers, as we drive them away, and cast them as one might lay.'

There on forth and there on out they went and charged through spare and spare of land until everything was pure and clean, yet it was known, deep within. Such a battle would never come to stroll, an end, it could never be purged, yet naught as well could slip by, and no such creature could be made to die, without a rightful cause, as there would be no one else to preserve them, and no one else to care for soul, and no one other to come after, either, once the great race of Yore. The greatest piety comes with pain, what follows after cannot be left to fall in vain. For flail as one might, and cudgels and whatever else might one come to need and to insert and cast upon such men's girths, one would have to be repeated and one would have to stumble undefeated if it comes and what it takes to bring them back to justice could only come to such as there is, a greater price.

Fellow men befell to spell, for he may adorn himself with lies and treacheries as enemies as well. They would cast you down and lie to be, and would call but such reason as to see, there's but little more and little less, one would have to, let alone impress, cast them down, let traitors die by hands alone, and wring their necks in, for after the smokes clear and what comes near would mean nothing in return. This is the legacy that waits, for all to remember what comes forth. Only when their deaths are felt, on the ground and many but killed, and bloodied and let alone, not to forger, that thine enemy would do much worse, and mercy for them is but death for many generations of yours, of children, of young, of maidens forced to servitude and defiled, of future and of culture spilled, split and vile and made to be completely wasted. Their deaths would be on your shoulders alone, cast yourself where their beginnings ended.

Unless the man cherishes such things, in, mere away, he may fall upon himself and stumble and die his way, alone, abandoned, yet another petty thing. His heart is vile and he may be forgotten, his soul defiles and beyond it, rotten, there'd be just as naught, not to remember him but to remind ourselves. These kinds of men can only see, as shortened as their sights are, one could be, no lesser set for such distrust, as to cast himself out from his countenance at last.

See his petty hide, be brought then, to such justice as to see him far and in-between gotten. He may be just as soon be taken and less forgiveness, strongly abated.

'I see such men, on many roads, they're but of little future and of lesser wont. Yet they live and they make, on other people's backs, they wail, and take whatever they please, but never do as much as to return and yet they weep.

Upon blessed whipped back, I count upon thee to give and lay and cast them away and forget what they might spare of thee, when come upon your way with him. Do not dare turn your back from man, for you cannot trust any, especially them, take by grip and cast as you see it, do not count on them to dare. On a fair thing as a match beware, for little pettiness comes at last, for they may cast you before them, wretched things that come to life, upon the yell.

Not the direst of blessings might save you when they come your way, for they are cruel, such is life, and there might be no forgiveness for what follows after, that alone might take your breathe and lay in awe.'

Such were the cases when man was gullible as to think himself safe from them, when wonder would leave one off his wails, when one would stand alone, forgetfully of what they came for.

‘Wretched beings as they are, you cannot forget where and when you are.’

‘But what would it do to walk away? What if one were to curl such stance and let it be called.’

‘Nay it is the simple answer, for when the time comes one may not, even to the least of hope avert his eyes, he would bring their termination as he would destroy them through and through, without mercy, not to stall.

Thine enemy is thine future’s destruction and nothing less could be forgiven to man, for if he had, let alone allowed him to do as such, he might seek no reason but to wail. And whom might cast himself a dame? Of such thing as would bring weakness to such a gaze?

Could you not see that there’s nothing to it, but to wait and see? Could you not and have you not come to understand that such a weak will cannot build something that would last?’

‘What of the enemies that have infiltrated to our ranks and would have us kilt? That would turn one against the other, not to spill even the spoiled and rotten, most morose of spills?’

‘One may only bring such anger forth and one may lure them out, with as much hope as to kill them as the plague they are, and butcher them like little petty evils and bring only such destruction that one would forget they ever existed if such, at all. Bring them to justice and covet no lie, for if it is left to proliferate, there’s nothing that would come to life, to such an end, that it could even as meekly evacuate what’s hidden in their souls.

It’s rotten you see, their will cannot be wilt for long, it cannot be satiated nor will it last, for as long as there is a chance for them to come forth.

For as long as there’s a chance for them to be brought during any time, one may wonder whom had led them one? Who is but the cause of them being brought? By what means and how have they stumbled upon the roads that lead them forth, at last. If it happens, it needs to happen by all means, by all man’s effort put together or it will always be there, by some mean or another. It can be of no other way. Either it is done by all man, or by none at all, for no amount of power wilt, by any such a fraction, of small a group may hope to dare, to bring them all to such destruction as their likes would never come to let alone repair themselves again. It’s even, as it’s said, so-so clear that there can be no other way.’

With which they both had ended, one to have returned to study, as to have left themselves, back on, least one would remind himself, there was somebody, called forth or left behind, and their hearts would but beckon to be left out from the maladies that were brought into the world, they would come to realize something about the real evils never told.

Rider of Mettlethlesh:

Of thence there came to drag him after during such time before there was a chance to sky in sight, and there upon the brooding farmers, had he arrived.

‘I’ve come upon ill, upon plain of yielding where mighty men as thine would seem to follow after, and long before such disaster is to come, I hear and bring upon you such grand a cast as there is, before what is bore, before such time, I reckon there’d be missing people yet to ask.

Where has the Rider come to drag his lance and spare thee waste, I see a way of entry into the palace lands, I reckon you might give such sound as one would find it.’

But lo’, they dragged themselves over and would endure, not to face such tenure, of such grand a man there is and come from far and much farther than would he find himself as if to ask, there would be none and none, far other, to come and drag upon chain and after, such meddlesome beads, of stolen veils, and theft from whence the darkest lands were brought and far, and brought as such would he scuffle after a while, as if to ask.

‘I wish upon myself, grand farmers who are my hosts, to indulge me into bringing a toast, to lend upon me such lead, as to agape me when asked for, now I see.’

They followed just right after and would’ve brought him anything after, if it weren’t for the time of lay, when the sundown would remain stilled upon the frame of light, the part of it fallen over that would’ve found itself, wretchedly abhorrent as it were. Would to be and would again.

Another rider, from south of Mettlethlesh:

‘Grand Inquisitor I’ve arrived and come upon you, stumble out of fright and firmaments of evil, much abhorrent there, do stay, and walked upon such empty way, as wallow through as after would they stay their arms and miss their heads and ever after, brought upon such mighty wonder, I seek but such renewal as to find and hear, as to near that day when we might near such a world, with sun.

Upon its drowning when time is gone that we may still our hands and bring peace, at last, when, upon the day, never ends.’

‘And who are you, mighty man, to ask as such? Why are you as bastardly similar to me, as I, thought I have not seen or heard news from watch, I’ve come to meet you before my time would come to endure. I beckon thee to reconsider as such and return, you must understand, my heart is not in the proper land.

I feel nothing but contempt at my very own self for what I’ve done, for what I’ve yet to stumble one, and now, I no longer feel as if I’m to be gone from any other place, you see? My heart is poisoned, flee in terror but do not see me any longer, from this point yonder, I see no future for myself. I see only pain and venom that’s to be injected in those who listen to me from this point on.

I am afraid, alas, that there are forces that would have me so, and would they listen when I told him, do not bother such a tainted soul. They, of whom appear near, they who wouldn’t leave me as such as to disappear, I believe. My mind is but ill because of them, and now, for the first time I see.

I see them for what they are, I see them even before such time was come, drawn upon the things I’ve done, drawn upon what I’m to become.’

‘But lo, do you not recognize me so, my dear brother, whom has taken yet your mind? We of the same wool and skin, we of such thing, how could you be so cruel as to banish me?’

‘I do not know what to believe from this point on. So many things do not make sense to me, for I am but confused in my heart. There are so many reveries that do not look the same no longer, I fear that my heart, no longer, as it is bolder, is to perish before it harms. I fear that what I may say, what courses through our veins will force them all to perish before their time.

To purge their purity, because things that aren’t in my control, I see no reason for what I may do, to continue as they might see through, I, of all, would stand and plain, as it’s to see, I, a bastardly son, cannot satiate my mind as to resist, I do not know reason, I cannot have my peace, knowing that as such, it would result, and bring destruction upon all if I continue on this path.’

‘Then stop and aid me.’

‘That could not be, for you do not understand that whatever I do, I might end up helping thee and them in return, it’s how it is, though most are unaware, of how they act, of how we talk and what we do. I fear that it is something that cannot be controlled, I fear I may bring such pain to people and nothing can be contain, nothing of all.

I’ve tried, upon my beast, I’ve held such crucifix, instead, but lo’, I’ve felt nothing in return, no saving mournful stance that might pull me from the place I’ve come to stumble on, to see them as such. There are things by all means that appear. And whether or not they would near, or yet to come, by whichever form, I will always end up, aiding such a people vile. Aiding them in such things that would defile all and I do not know what to do as such.

For whichever path I take, they will always be helped by some means, and use it instead to harm, great many a man, good men, those that I would seek to protect but I can’t, for I am feeble yet of mind and I am weak and lesser than a blind. For what I’ve do and whatever passing, for my every action and ever amassing, leads the same, and brings but foil to man. I do not know what is left for me to do, I seek salvation but it may not come for such a thing, a crucifix, for good men might make do with it, but I may not.

Whatever reason there might be, I am spoiled and rotten and I may only bring destruction upon all, I do not know what there is left. I do not seek to turn man away from faith at such times, but how can I of all be redeemed when I know so much? Of every action yet there is, of such a thing as lack of peace, of history which tells of us as well. That there’s never been a good one that there might never be yet, it does, by spreading away and doing it en mess they merge and only bring nothing but misery to man, unearned.

I fear. As there is no hope for me to near such kindness as there is in man, I may only seek to ruin and destroy before his time, for I cannot help it.’

‘Live like a beggar then, that way can only do no harm, and bastardly as you are of birth, as well of mine, you may not yet come to defile a thing.

There is still a chance thou might avert and seek as such to not destroy and bent, upon destruction as thine breed, seek nothing else and lay your arms still.’

But neither one of them knew what to do or what to follow after, neither knew what's right from wrong, of such breeds they are as such a shame and pity, of such lies and harm which lay in men, those of poor upbringing which had been whipped, starved, beaten because of them.

'Ours is but something that may never be redeemed, I do not know what to do from this point on, as I have said, I'm but ill, as they are us.

What if all, as such, might give? And.'

He was silent, salient and couldn't understand, his will, his command and intuition, how could they be trusted from this point on? All words and every, else said, and every single thing as well, every dreadful intonation twisted, and whom of mighty world be trusted?

'There's little else to return as well, there's only the crucifix now and little more than some faith if you're ill to know. Hold it to thine breast and be, to follow as there is, keep what little there's to it and see whether there's hope on longer term and time.

You may yet to come upon an answer unless you've tried.'

With which they parted ways without embrace.

Turn

They were in town, finally arrived.

'I've missed this sight, like you would not believe, the warmth, the sight, everything to the most finite detail there was, there is.'

'It is not the same, is it? It couldn't possibly be, you don't suppose?'

But neither one of them wanted to approach the other, just yet.

Like a little speck of light, he leaped on top the post, grabbing it with both of his hands before letting go it if as two young children were on sight.

'What are you doing, missa?'

'I? I wasn't. Well, young sir, straighten your back, immediately I say.'

The kid was but straight on stall standing.

'That's more likely. I think I'm going like this trip you proposed to me, for now. It's been a while, has it not?'

‘Gield, the kid!’

‘Right, you may rest yet, I think.’

With such grace, he pulled the post with an arm and he was yet to be seen as he made it simply vanish in front of their eyes. Crushing the side of his palm in turn, which made it bleed on sight; both children being somewhat startled and alarmed, they ran away only to stop twenty paces from where they stood.

Neither of the lands stood still. Most of them were inconsequential by all accounts and means, some openly battered, thrown and pushed around as if they were specks of their former selves. A great two-by-two figures entered the flat marches, long-elongated trees being perched in the surroundings. A taller figure at least by one tall standing floor stood before them. An open faced-helmet with horn-like flat-structural defilement rested on his brazen face. Darkly molded eyes appeared to be entirely curved around a nose that appeared to be too small and short to be made apart from open-nostrils. It seemed like he seeped in, now and then, dreadingly thinking of whom was around him, dreaming of long lost ages, he carried on.

‘I’ve looked into the Skenmp Skin Sken log and neither of you is supposed to be here, by all means, I shall invite you to attend my sermon and let’s not pretend either of you is here for something else.’

It was tog-shed open around the mouth, reeling back and forth, with coffin like entries which drew them on. Long reeling in lichens wrapping them, cocoons were made and neither one of them could make out what was going on after, nor what was happening around them.

Before the spot: First and topmost of dreaded fading through the first embrace, the little pint-sized people with no heads, and longer arms - the arches drew. A little more, than unimportant spears that came after, through their backs attached, the longer guts were furlong after, much purloin and little strands. All attached on top their hands as if their little more invisible helmets wouldn’t last, for any other reason otherwise. Broken, otherwise working, little puppets they were, no legs either, but strange almost glory lasted, blood contrasted rusty briny swords instead. Many of them largely unfavorably looking, brown-twisted black truffle-patterned armored, many of them bearing the crystal-made cord on top of them, sparkling, oozing with power. They were swinging them about their heads, little more than it should count for the little rays of filth and large baton-shapes.

‘I see there’s but the weapon gone, I see it so.’

‘Hmm, where to go and in which direction?’

‘There, towards, and of mighty and of grander stars, I am to turn when they shall come and draw away from whence and where they’ve go to, forth and yonder.’

‘Is your master, much so than it’s led to believe, is he suffering of mind disease? Of any kind and of much and lesser plain that could be found, upon grand and incessant dark foundation, upon these broken forth and grim disciples that stand upon thine gate, in which direction has he looked?’

‘Forth, grand so, and forth he’s gone to, with. What does thou want, and what doest thou inquire in that case? I of plain and lesser head, I seek such.

I beckon you to turn.'

Thenceforth they both turned and found themselves of little wroth than mattered.

'A song an age that drew from ill, thou callest upon dire front, I call upon thee anyway.

When they shall call upon your door, don't answer, for either one of you, two by two, and call of action, shall be swept away, and die away, upon the grains of the wall, grinded after.'

'But what does thou call upon us to do in that case?'

'Don't seek the Ill, and grand vizier Eddeyeh Ogg, for his part is murkier than any song and any chance of grand return, you needn't look no far than any either one.'

He settled to leave, but as soon.

There was lesser of what seemed the tar, and what came after, and neither and the lesser things, all but gathered, soon as thin.

And then had they had gone and thence, of herd of cattle followed after, whence, upon hour dry, whence they had approached and after, thine, upon the lords had they to sing. Tiresome at large and lay, upon the beckoning of day, whence to follow after, through and after, as soon as they had found themselves after, had there come of lesser, mighty day, of plain of herd and mighty bed upon whence lay as they had found themselves, of darkly matter and lesser ground, upon the gourd, the court, they followed and ever after, they had called upon the meekly hour, lesser days.

'I of all, would see to it that they do come and whence they shall and when prolonged, I shall see and hear no need but lay, I shall go ahead and lay out of my way.'

But whom to follow through at peace and when to call after when not even the slightest hints of better lays, and those that draw after, what else would they convey, if naught? They had only but arrived.

Upon their mighty hall of wooden steel, and mighty as they found within, there stood but mighty man the bard, whom sang around and much to his renown he found himself alone, but pity him no less, he sings, and desperate to have attained, one wing, he had but called to man.

'Grand sire, grand sire, of which the lesser lords admire, those of lesser houses mourn, when you of all, would pass along, whence will I find myself in presence and when will I but, have been found, sitting, would to call. And would to walk, not to stall and not too plain, I seek but such return as would to be, convey, I seek.'

And whence, as soon as sitting down, had they, and would to find themselves convey lesser thoughts.'

The hall was filled and mighty mead about.

Thus end's woe:

And afterwards they had begun:

‘Thou art not righteous any longer, thou are but decayed in heart, in soul, in mind. Adjourned in place wrong, blasphemous but devoured, and this disease, whichever would endower, might of lost, there is none such. And would to after, your mind is cast.

Nowhere would there, and as such, and nowhere less, to dread as such, were there to begin again. You may not see such creatural end. Blasphemous as thou hast become, there is no way, back, there, and whence, might not be any way out.’

As thus it was decided, long before the fallen forth.

‘Thou must understand that there’s no other end to it, as thou has yet become locked, away and stay inside. As fallible as the world is, yours is but a vile thing, driven to no less emerging plight.’

‘Where to and from mighty I pace around if such was the case?’

‘Thine world cannot be worn atop the shoulders of a nasty, cruel, weakling of no man.’

‘I shall yet endure.’

‘Yet you’re caught inside, of rotten mind, and would to be, cast yourself in the benign. There’s no endless yet supply and lest amount to come to such an end.

The hate of man and willingly after would there be none you can discern.’

‘Then let them butcher and fill whatever pleases thine path with such worth and disdain as there is, else there shall be no end to what they bring after.’

And thence they walked in, by the looks of it, head-head, head-head piece all put together on a pile with two elongated pieces below them shaped like ‘I threatened to kill my mom’ written message on top a billboard kind of legs, with the words being as thick as a few millimeters standing out.

‘We’ve heard you were in town, we’ve heard you were desperately trying to.’

Regress into place.

Twunthylo Ikghe

Its land wheel was shaped thus, holding all together in a large brown powdery enclave of Basil. Aggression-titans holding the stone-lumps connected to the bloated pillars with toothless grin- spider – shaped sundials with broken arms projecting the people on the ground.

Twunthylo was curved. Its every inhabitant bore a strange eely thing around their outer ends entering the hands, and bore. Little pint-sized creatures whom were but alike to them, both in size and in evil eyes, opening their maws as to sip in their essence and escape. Projecting it back from where they came from, the inner-long devices, the weird concoctions inside each tunnel-long stone thrust so. One man, out of a million inhabitants has a finger in his mouth. He was born that way, with his finger. In his mouth.

His skull grew weirdly because of it. For some reason, the front; that was to be ignored.

The time for the mourning ritual was drawn forth.

Many a citizen gathered around, removing their hands off, jolts spinning out of their sockets, leaving and letting off whatever whiff there was inside and out, screws jeeringly pushing forth.

They put their own backs in and made sure the arms spoke to them in return. It could only work this way, only when they were listening with their backs put in.

‘I think the liver is talking.’

Two giant liver-shaped grapnel appeared to be watching them as the men formed a small fort of arms, which became solidified in large-attached to flat-pyramid floors flapping vertically flipped V’s, three of them appearing to hold one another, blankly in the middle, where electric-see through lights appeared to bear small electrical particles in the middle where light small deranged dark-skinned particle small dark shapes were put on rotating strip-stars with strange occult-like symbols singing their incantations after they dripped on the floors and on the ground. Their arms communicated sun-strokes which projected small stroke burnt marks on the outer planetary satellites, in the same way a man would place his heart on his chest but burning and on the surface of the small celestial bodies.

‘I must feed my Dbehelum.’

‘What happened to it?’

‘It’s become part of the titan’s face, look, look, I’ve done it myself, I climbed upon his body.’

‘How did you do it?’

‘How does he do it?’ Cried another man sparingly, his mouths were inner-guts, all out, spitting with wriggling motions on the ground, splitting stone underneath the large vertebrae like crawler that appeared to bear a strange red demonical contortion of a man-spilt blood platter-turned into a death mask.

‘Will you cross the path and abandon the mourning? You must see the Dbehelum for yourself, it can only be experienced once.’

Neither of them could see it from the distance. The town was missing, but it appeared out of nowhere, in a bubble of skin with pebbles in bouncing and destroying everything in it.

The fleshy red-faced pattered vertebrae said:

‘Your godly titans decided for you to become humble and without a home.’

‘Why?’

‘Because that way you shall be drawn to another world, where you have nothing to lose and you shall charge and bring war upon all.’

Thus listened the Myliek.

‘This isn’t going to end up well for either one of us, will it?’

‘I don’t think so, as a matter of fact, I think you’re both damn insane, you’re all insane, if you want me to climb on one of those things.’

‘You have to, it’s part of the ritual.’

‘They are all afraid, we buried it.’

‘What have you done, dark vertebrae?’

‘I’ve asked them to bury it, the perfect immortal, all are afraid of it, all would be destroyed otherwise.’

The path above lain stricken as if by force, fornicated by worst of tenderness and wrought in iron, lesser silver, lacking of the shines of gold. Everything lain in terror, small well-heads, stones barely placed. In many hidden, put in wonders they didn’t speak about.

All is corrupt; all is decay, if one were to look at him, at them. There wasn’t much and lesser leper-boils attached, many of them barely standing on their own, trying to recede as they would go back and forth, incapable of standing in a place. Despite the room being filled with a bunch of people, many of them weren’t entirely whole, for some reason, largely dead, fallen apart by the looks of it, incapable of staying their hands.

‘We’ll have to purposefully contaminate all of their bodies with antibiotics, it’s the only way they’ll get to live through it.’

The immortal could not be put down, by all means, he was perfect.

He was but a piece of rubbery devices all put together in a constantly falling apart kind of charred skin-frame, that would always deform itself as it would revert back to its original form. Being prone to being infested with machines, he was the ultimate thing, a creature of two pieces that could never die or be utterly annihilated just by the mere nature of its being.

Since the machines that were inserted into him were but surrounded by a self-powering shield that was imbued with the quasi-symbiotic atoms that were drawn out of the livid-organ that was the immortal himself, that would spread out of its body and infest the very quantum-layers that are constantly being removed from inside the space that’s lain between the universe and the gods. He was imbued by something that was both beyond and him as well, incapable of being wished out of existence, part of reality as he represented time itself as well as its hybridization. The Immortal was all of history happening at once, and for that reason he looked like a humanoid with prosthetics and a crack addict, as to furthermore symbolize the decay and death of mankind. Animated by magic and by God, he was indestructible.

And for that reason the citizens of Twunthylo put him in a coffin and buried him beneath them. Because of courtesy he didn't want to get out of it, although he could.

He also had an eye in one of his knuckles that shot boomerang-with-machetes shaped power rays that formed clusters of look-a-likes to the person or creature, or objects it hit kind of organic shapes that suddenly exploded into guttural pops of clot-spikes and animal corpses, the rays being also homing missile-like in nature. And capable of phasing through objects, and teleporting, in case the target disappeared in another dimension, and incapable of being reset as it was actioned in multiple dimensions at once, all but coming into view once they hit their mark. Acting in multiple dimensions, and universes all at once, utterly hurting a being at an infinite level, beyond reality as well; capable of killing god himself. If the Immortal Hager-Illnyot had aimed it at himself, he would create an immortality-paradox that would make it so the entire land was completely and utterly encompassed by dead animal cadavers, that would become him, which would repeat the process until reaching a point-in-mass where it would form a square-like shape, with animals-hybrids below the knee-region, chimera-like emerged, and endlessly floated towards dead planets. He would be stuck in a state of being both dead and a live at the same time, in a state where, upon the spread having happened, like a cancer-tumor being removed from a man that has the possibility of pulling through, unless he's an Englishman wishing other people to get it, in which case he would be dead, the paradox would be frozen in place, in some way, as if it were stuck in a technicality.

This homing sharp-edged power ray but being incapable of making its mind, bouncing around the bodies only to stop in place, frozenly struck in consideration. Whom to chase and whom to destroy? Only to find itself creating more of them, thinking, the ray is sentient. Sometimes it has hands that are holding the machetes, and while the boomerang like motion keeps spinning, the hands keep making slicing motions, up and down, other times making circling motions.

A rock lay instead of his heart, he could never forget, nor let go, of the secrets, of immortality.

Standing in front of them, the wormy red clayish thing started squirming in place. It spoke to the few corkscrewed citizens that followed.

'You're to come as close as you can and proceed, there's barely any other way left, that alone should tell you enough. Unless you experience it, the entire land will fall apart and be swallowed underneath the earth.'

It was a reminder that neither of them were safe, not by a safe mile, not since he was the one in charge of the sun-dials and the way time was being contorted, past the sworn out.

Never could forget.

'If you stall for too long, there will be no celestial body left, it will be swiped and ripped away from all existence.'

'We are without reason in that case, aren't we? We are to follow, is that so?'

'You may and may you, least of all go through with it without delay, there's a spark of spread, of skin, of what is left of what piece of the sun there is in dead-of-night out there.'

It squirmed pointedly towards one the broken lanes as well as one of the most peculiar, of hillocks.

Mhyiegghi was but a bow-split head, he asked instead.

‘Wait, great Teburus, ill of blood skin.

What is there in the hollow of the titan that we should seek?’

If there was something of any kind of worth whatsoever, it was the fact that no one trusted that period-snake for one moment. Since, many of them, a long time ago, have observed, on several occasions that were but recorded not only orally but were written down, having happened in a few un-obscure points across the land, mainly during daylight as well as mid-winter when one would find himself not only being prone to be extremely more focused on the dangers that could possibly ruin their hard-worked on resources, but their every testimony seems to add up to one set of facts, that seem to confirm, time-after-time that this bloody creature is not only untrustworthy but has, on several occasions acted to the complete, subversive kind of matter, without surprise, interest of the people, aggressively so, to many a times, leading the poor people to their untimely ends. Many of whom still, to their blessedness of their hearts saw it, somehow, despite having accounted for everything they heard about it, decided to completely ignore and dismiss them completely as nothing else but bastardly set rumors. It was already lady since it grew legs, a second face that was propelled by a retracting out of the split below its chest head, that not only had no sockets but bore two thinned-by starvation arms, with four, helicopter-wing talons, a strange glowing red stone as well as four almost outwardly set pronounced ivory tusks that appeared to allow it to levitate until it grew, in the back, two eely-sheets that, unlike wings not only did not allow it to fly, but they also absorbed gravity inside of them, making everything else around it float. A second voice coming from the second head that was erupted from the lower side of its body appeared to create an unnatural voice that created the illusion of it being nothing more than a strange spine-worm with a clay face. It explained why no one appeared to be, by all or any means whatsoever interested in it, since they were mind-controlled in the worst possible manner. And it already stole their pockets, the damn thief, it picked their damn pockets with its elongated talons, storing their valuables inside its small baggy skin bags inside its rigid body. Why would it do that? Terrible creature that it wore, it was looking at, what appeared to be, what seemed to be strangely over-extended yet not attached to its body any longer, kind of straight lined cartilage that formed a ninety five degree rotated U, that then started advancing upwardly on an incline as if it were a contorted tail, that came all the way in the front, as if it were a ceiling hanging chandelier or lamp that was slowly being released in front of him by strange meaty chains, that bore a dark oozing dark-bag with dark jeweled dark heads coming out with hands filled with soil-black clay, which constantly threw it at him. That mere action alone appeared to be the sole reason of its dissatisfaction and no one could see how terrible it was, but the creature itself had acted this way before this strangely unattached limb that was there for the sole reason of torturing it, which could only mean that it appeared for one reason and one alone. To further the suffering, as a punishment for the way in which it acted, from that point on until what would seem to be the never ending time or period of destruction, and utter annihilation, at the very least until it had approached some of the giant titanic sculptures which had once actually been nothing more and nothing else but the mountains. Many of the geological structures were there, in some way or another. Although many of them became dark-junk which was a term for the long-dark legs that were attached to the bloated snake-pus tendril spear-shafted unnaturally almost tortoise kind of creatures that were acting not like the Spartan shield formation, or the one that preceded it, but instead appeared to walk on them as if to replicate the strange body shape of an eel which the exception that it was much more molded by fire, as if it had been forged inside a dark stove. Many such-like formations were spread around in the Slyeak Blodr and many of them wore their spear heads upwardly heaved in the middle formation, that being almost closely more akin to a bloody-bloated snake with strange vaporous depressions in it that wriggled flaccidly, then, appeared to bear a few executed men, on top, which in reality had been dragged along inside of strangely shaped coffins. These coffins had been transported underground. It appears like they had been, from the looks of it, these bloated structural pillar-spears upon which the rounded dome hardened chitin stood, underground not only stretched for miles, hundreds upon hundreds upon thousands of them were like Saigon tunnels that went as far as they could go, were inclined or were alive enough to act like the insides of the human veins, where the coffins usually acted like blood-cells, but the ones suffering of cycle-cell diseases, as to shatter along the way, with the wood-shrapnel penetrating the kept-alive victims inside the coffins, as they would be drawn closer and much deeper in, then heaved up, which the remaining wood would be abandoned below the main structure, in some hidden pocket, since the structure fed upon wood, slowly dragging the villagers that had been put inside, through the guts, through the dome-stomachs, up on the foamy wriggling spear, and then out through the depressions. There they would suffer for hours, seemingly molded or trapped as if weaved in web or trapped-cocoons, with wooden thorns wide-spread around their bodies. A part of the ground appeared to be put inside itself and was puffy, with every stone, that was pushed every few centimeter inside itself seemingly being slightly grown and out-grown and put inside pea-shooter shaped deep-pits, in these depression there being a lot of blood stored that was used for the most unnatural spells by the finger-lobed dark Elmed. Whom had his open-skull by a river band wrapped around his forehead, rightfully exposed, bearing large root-like system-like inside the earth finger-shaped extensions that crawled beneath the earth like long-stretching snake-moles, which, upon being connected with the underground blood-pools they began opening as to form scalpel-cuts, out of which, out came hardened skin-covered hairs that were shaped like beetles chained together, squirming with hairs as they started mixing and extracting the blood, while mixing it with chemicals since it was already mixed at a subatomic level the human eye would not be able to comprehend. Since, at such a level, various eight-clustered different blooded-chemical mixes were kept together, which could not be acted upon independently yet, were surrounded by fake-blood as to be accessed only by approximation upon being penetrated by the ruddy-haired blood extractors, having drawn as many clusters in as possible before the mixing could occur in the beetle-shaped organs. He clicked them like red buttons, but with needles. Drawing blood out of the ticks-clots, before the ritual could conjure the molecules that were stored in the intermediary region that was stored inside the great blood stream of Adsono Blyr's great red-vein crown-whip that grew outside its body, spreading across the system as it made a pass-through region where his blood children-to-be-his-demigod-warriors emerged out of. His being drained of blood, a little stump below the net, in the midst of a fallen vortex or a rock-like clot stone fallen through the middle of the web but stopped as it would decay. But to him, the ritual was insignificant, it would not hurt not draw too much pain, as, one way or another, the blood would return to him. Such was it that some of the brave citizens of the land who were under the great Elmed Kask Brims were there, standing before them, completely reddened atop their heads, their backs having become but a deck-torn trunk pointing at the ground, filled with a cloud-meat of painted muscle-worthlessly contorting their bodies inwardly as they were slowly not only assimilated but were forced to endure the complete re-alteration and re-alignment of their bones and skeleton frame, growing extra arms out of their ribs, and beating a strange much more peculiar, harder-to-look out disassembled head. They spat blood out of their mouths, or bled out. It was not intended, yet they suffered. Dust particles got in their way. And such was that the villagers were completely dissatisfied by their new forms, and only threatened to do such harm and hurt and cast the Elmed into peril and destruction that he decided to completely stray away, he fled, he ran away from sight before they could turn on his master.

Unknown to either one, that being, that the strange approach towards the titans, which left as much as it could be felt or dealt with, actually bore a strange consequence that was dire and hardly to be met. Curiously enough, one of these titanic statues actually had its hollow body holding, with the help of four great chest-placed pillars, in the middle of them, a giant ambulance-shaped police car made out of some strange material with a few dead bodies inside of it, which was constantly being lowered up and down, then upon being released, all of the sudden it flew around the insides of the creature, creating or giving birth, with the help of the flashing lights, those being caused by the sirens, to some unnatural kind of dejected dark specters that were made to bring justice upon those the police-car cadavers decided it would be worthy to enact it upon. It was not an actual police car, despite the similarities, yet an ancient construct of metal that acted like a breeding ground for the most unnaturally-hard to look at spirits, that were in turn, set like wild rabid dogs upon the dark painted images of dark-skinned figures some of the ancient – inside the stone mountain secret- cave carvers, as to contain the spirits in so they would not start spreading outside, killing all villagers and ending all life as it had been known.

At times, it was a peaceful existence, being there.

Twunthylo was cursed nonetheless, with the strangest of the beings, instead being drawn to the night, since at night, not even the siren would be allowed such a solace as to exist undisturbed by the likes of it.

As it approached, even the likes of Teburus told them they had to receded into a safer place, they had to find one as soon as they could, even as disgraceful as it sounded, it was dangerous being out past the wallowing hour. Knowing no better, Myliek listened to him, again.

He saw that this eely ugly worm was as wise as any sage of the kind of man there ever was.

Incessant blood coil he was, nowhere near the other things, they stood beneath the shadow of a single bloated-spear in the dark. Its outer-rims were darker still. The shade left by them as ill.

Blythieko-ny thought of something, while the others were keeping a vigil over what might draw their way.

‘I once saw a woman who was dressed nicely that was climbing the same set of stairs as I went over. I took a break so I could watch her. You know what I say, Mittiek?’

‘Enlighten me.’

Every single one of them had, had to have had a skeleton hidden in the closet. Strangely, not him, every thought appeared to disperse in his presence.

There was no way to break to him, he was. Neither of them thought or considered they would feel guilt. He wasn’t one of them, one of their group, he was an outsider. It was sickening, migraine inducing even. Nauseating, considering, cutting him off. Such a disgusting creature, thinking of harming it, only made them feel worse. And this feeling worsened as well. It was unexplainable. Breaking off him, even in their minds was something they could.

It was a disease. It brought some kind of guilt, shame and pain in the head, and everywhere else. How else could one feel safe, otherwise? How else could one see the other side unless they cut it off? There was no certainty to anything.

It was so hard, it's been hard, it worsened with every second. Of course it was as ugly a thing as it ever were, not even a worm at this time but a broken toy. A walking vacuum with two stuffed heads, messing with their heads, or not; even the men around them were open in their heads, even though they didn't know it.

Large elongated hands kept working and twisting their way in, molding their brains. They came out of nowhere, fingers bore strange long pints that pulled and dragged them filled with something neither of them could understand what it was.

Bloody piece of clay it was, there, in the bushes, where it retreated.

Behind the scenes two wild-faced red cattle breeds were barking at one another on top two metal stove-necks, wriggling around a burning piece that burnt the sticks, the briar.

The night passed half-way through before it emerged again. Its body had accumulated iron. Above it, two golden god's hands floated, shining brightly as to stop the whispers.

No longer were its legs attached, but seemed to form exes and plusses, asterisks and some swastikas as well, properly twisted. Within the two red faces stood a pair of almost strangely wrought in golden-symbols that were written in kanji. Wild insect-compact eyes for mouths, while the vacuum they were in was actually an industrial looking build.

Before any of the citizens could ask their question as to what happened and since they had been kept awake for the longest of time, the golden got hands which were also split in the middle but kept in-between by radiator-shaped dangling electron makers bore, before them, after performing prayer motions, large blue-spheres of power that became titan-like heads that appeared to bear little police-car construct-flies that flew around them for a while. Making the most incessant fly-noises they could go on ahead with.

Something was extremely wrong about him, but neither of them knew how to react or what to do.

'I don't think it's safe being around him.'

'I think its heads are about to explode.'

The two prayer-like hands had already split in half, in an illusionary spill the water kind of motion, having entered both heads at the same time in a paradox kind of manner while having transitioned from a prayer-like hand motion to a finger-gun like shoot in the head hand-sign that started inflating both heads like balloons. Which also made them glow red, and not only grow in size, but seemingly threaten to burst.

'What are we going to do now?'

'Die.'

But one of them took a rusty nail off the ground and threw it off it, only to see it bounce and fall on the ground while it made oink sounds which sounded, vaguely as the n-word was being slowly said, that n-word being nigger.

It bounced right off jerking eerily on the ground, in a flaccid like soft manner, slowly melted from the extreme show of condensed heat.

‘Throw something else at it!’

‘I’m trying, I can’t find anything else.’

With a quick jolt of his hidden, taken out bayonet, Hydsiek, the men before him chopped his own finger, only to find himself dropping it on the ground because of the pain he felt by the initial cut.

It was a splatter of eternal green on a sea of soil-dark olive, whereas the yellow-red shone and spread, oozing with ultra-violence. A burning knife-mark could be seen on the surface, on one of the moons, someone had stabbed the sun. So many flying police-cars; the citizens were doomed. A dead god fell out of nowhere and splattered on the door. The door being a Bush-shaped door, the president, not a normal bush, splatters of ultra-violet appeared to wide-spread a rain of little dots, in the style of Pointillism. The points, that made the overall texture of everything that momentarily existed became rug-like barb wire protruding out, but blurringly rubbing one another with exchanging colors, worms. Mere motions stopped the supreme-rockets-comets from penetrating the atmosphere and destroying the land.

Finally the finger had been thrown, and by the time it did, the hairs retreated back in place.

A few marches were already filled in part, they moved in through the wild-vortexes that were made by the air-fornications coming out of a collage head made out of different stitched skins from different put together unnatural yet hard to look at ethnicities. With two eye-horns, and teeth-hooks, yellow-teethed, as it opened its mouth though, an elongated tongue tumor came out growing, spreading then stopping once it split in eighteen pieces but somehow, they were only eighteen inches deep and only a few millimeters on each side, shot a yellow-beam-like hand extension made out of orange-yellow-kind of greenish but skin-like green boil covered, talon-like hybrid that didn’t aim for the god finger gunned two headed red ready to pop things, instead, having already made it half-way through to the invisible power-punching rods that were floating in an utmost unnatural boiled by skin-disease manner, it projected tiny bloodied, yet smeared by strange-pus boil-like slices that began connecting themselves, slowly molding with the blood-essences that were already there, having been brought by the Elmed into inter-world existence, before popping into place half-warrior sons that were made to gravitate towards some of the hollow-points of the strange celestial moons since they were already cast, that is to say, the marches and the strange dark conjuration being nothing more than the Mournful ritual, which had already succeeded. Skinned alive-men being present, watching, almost completely melted. They were closely, yet succinctly watching, making sure that nothing wrong was going to happen, afraid in some manner, having come into existence out of the hidden slit-living organism that was the universe, hidden in some wretched manner, skin-tissue, going through the Hypodermis while crawling in the world's hidden blood vessels as they make their way in. Eye sockets on the ground, still dark soiled, but the spots were sparse at this point in time.

Mittiek still was yet to do something.

The night was still underway. Dark croaking sounds. One of the fingers rolled to the side.

Some would rather spare their way and look forth, and out of it, and yonder, sort. As both hands had but reddened, joined in head as they became less like the star-imbued thing they were, no longer unaware but molded, eely but torn apart, drawing in and always out.

‘I think this begs the question, as to look at the Dbehelum before deadest of night, and up-front the hour but to devour all that is right, might yet return, as to lay wherever else, but nay. Not there, but we can see it grow from side and wide as there are its arches are but thrown around the trench-waxed embryo-shaped tubes attached to the dead-floating angelic figures without limbs or features whom are made of the same orange organ boils drawn together by the blood miasma gotten from the dark heads around which they seem to gravitate around.’

To which he pointed, this strange villager whom he had taken as a good friend, the titan’s face whom had elongated itself as the molded Dbehelum which was but outwardly, and seemingly incessantly bellowing like a broken clock-tower always striking on a dead note at a dead hour, a piano being locked inside of it and actioned by the device, out of it the arches coming and drawing to the strange gloating winged masses, whom were already splattering themselves over its hard metallic almost brass-like surface as be completely absorbed, popped bubble-wraps giving life to smaller boil-like creatures whom only reassured the wonder, whether or not they were slightly or ever so slightly capable of reforming themselves out of thin air and out of nothing, having sprouted a few miles over the original spots where the boils had been shot at like peashooters.

He could do nothing any longer but consider how good a life this had been. Long and prosperously hopeful as it had been, there was no wonder that he found himself in the loneliest of awakenings, considering this to be the first and only moment, among them, to have been alive. To have truly been so, out of breathe, even, as he couldn’t help but look, sickeningly so at the past. He still had grabbed and got a hold of his friend’s bayonet. And there seemed to be no escape, for as soon at that thing popped, hope would go beyond any kind of restless wonder. It was just as soon that he found himself after, all too soon abandoned.

Before it could pop, there was a large moving piece of earth in the distance, flying inside what appeared to be a great mass. Crumbling as it was put together in the most defiling manner it could be, dark catastrophically shaped wings carrying it – static frozen in the air, but gliding as well. With many forward showing unnatural heels-contending with the rest of the growths.

Echoes of their doings could still be heard.

Not a single man could believe they managed to do it. Going on with it, prying open the side, entering the fallen over catacomb. Its entry no longer blocked, the charming fusing gas no longer choking them as they threaded on, it was the only way out. They weren’t entering it, they were leaving the world behind instead. As if there hadn’t been a door, or a slit.

Nor could either man see his split shoes as they cradled them in their eyes.

‘Are you sure this room is safe to be in? I’ve got some experience in grave robbing, these holes are not safe to thread on.’

‘Why would they not be? Have you forgotten that this place was never built to begin with? There are no traps in it, only what comes after, those who reside in its rooms and choose to stay.’

‘I’m afraid I don’t catch it, but if you’re so sure on yourself, Fyr, take the first step, I’m not going to stop you.’

‘Are you afraid of something in that case? Afraid you might lose a finger or a piece of your strapped on nose?’ His forehead almost fell off, he was bloodied, hardened around him now, no longer a piece of stone or a pair of barely stranded nostrils on a face-sea that would not fall off. No.

‘We shall sleep in this empty room, the sand shall provide the blood flooring, wouldn’t you agree?’

‘I am afraid I do not understand, there’s no sand in here.’

‘Open your shirt.’

He did so, slowly unbuttoning everything he had on him, seeing how he started releasing a sea that would not let go of him, he stumbled backwardly, as if he had stumbled on dead-feet. Then he fell in the corner, confused by this deceit.

‘Why?’

‘We needed a mule to carry our beddings. Now we’re all going to simply stay here, for a while, before we dose off to sleep.’

‘You tricked me.’

‘I haven’t. I gave you this option to help me, to help yourself. But you simply brushed it off with the back of your hand. Then I made you this offer, a small cut for the sake of a treasure. Although there might not be one here to begin with, I’m certainly sure that your journey will have been worth it.

You’ve seen half of the known world by now. Having accompanied us on dark-horse and damped scales and saw their bronze heads replaced. You were tipped off by then that all that we would surround ourselves with would be unnatural, haven’t you?’

‘I thought it was a dream, I thought all those things you said and did to me.’

‘Apparently not, I’m sorry someone had to break it to you this way. But we needed the sand.’

‘At the sake of my life?’

‘There could never be another way, unfortunately. I’m afraid you were always doomed to find yourself here with us.’

The others weren’t there yet, but the men had come along, foreboding of a much darker day. It was rather uncanny to begin with, how morose they had been. By the time they had gotten in, Fyr was done with the stranger. He had already put himself in an utmost dark position he could not leer or draw himself away out of. It would be moronic to think otherwise.

‘What’s inside the catacomb?’

‘A piece of scrounged fare, we have a few oblyoks with us we have picked on the way, I’m sure you’re not going to put yourself in harms’ way now, are you?’

‘Is there more?’

Neither of them men spoke at the scene, neither of them paid as much attention as they would in any other case. A part of Meskin fell over onto itself, not worked like a puppet, but looking at the ceiling.

Somehow a week was spent in and out, during long periods of time when he was left alone in here, having only returned when it was time to douse to sleep again, Meskn staring only at the bluer-light, the one that had stumbled onto him before the first one, first one of the fallen overs. Somehow there was a blue moon, today. One that’s hardened, flattened, and then hanged across the top of the ceiling pane.

It’s brokenly crumbled, a folded sheet of paper. Falling at time, where the pieces only add together, flying across the room. It’s mesmerizing. In some manner, feeling them, during such a fortnight of passing through; such hairy forms, as if they dragged the pieces of hair that fell off the men before they felt. During the hour of sleep when neither one knew what was going to happen, or whether or not a scarab would twist as their dragging seethe, most of it, being directed at him, made him succumb to the pains of his mind. They were melting over his face, forming capacious spots of stone that entered him from both sides. At once an eye was stole, delivered to the ceiling twas the moon.

Piece of an eye though it may be, a good chunk was revealed, not the whole thing; blinking constantly, wretched as it were. He could see himself down there, covered all in stand, but dare.

‘Fyr, I missed you.’

‘And I stumbled onto something you wouldn’t believe I found, perhaps we should’ve brought you along with us. Since we already lost a man, there’s a shortage.’

‘What happened?’

Down the line, he explained. It was too clear that he never stood a chance, the farther he went, the dimmer his source of light, the ones in his body, that they could see, was drawn behind. It was fused with the sacrilegious mounted in place ceremonial arms.

They floated, as they passed them, all hands being tied or nailed to the floor as well as every arm attached, more to it, they seemed like chains. Every man’s thin limb, drawn to the chest until they were inflated; faces formed in stuck together arrow shafts.

It was simply unbreathable around them.

‘It’s a starry night, isn’t it?’

‘What is?’

‘You put me here thinking I would somehow stop considering, or aiming for an escape.’

Cast of all

Neither of them were in there for long. Always standing on top of one another's shoulders wrong, in the back, carrying a ram from one side to the other, as they were; latching like puddle-niggermonkeys they were desperate. Beyond relief they tried.

He wasn't there for long, in head and thrusting, and lo' and they had but to call.

'Where to, of mighty walking, where to go when called at last?

In health we drink but everlasting through and thorough. And lay in waiting as there is and long before their call of peace. Lo and listen to thine walk, to every steps and come around.'

To which each puddle with disdain and what followed after and once again of might and wonder, for every drop that came but after would they, not to hear yet again. Of blasphemy and long term reign, they would not listen and in cold. And whom to listen, as they're told.

'Be gone, for either one of you has listened and has gone in shame and yet again I find each man, standing yet as lame, to whom but listen and to hear, such as would there be. And would to listen to such redundancy, I were to calf. As any man at that, I swerve, and would return to such wrong doing, and would to curm the suffering, of wretched and, as old.

The little horned men have yet to approach us before noon, and soon enough, as they shall walk instead would they relieve whichever and were to face, but one.'

And only one man stood and should upon each matter. They formed a council.

Each passing day would they not to be, and least convey, no dire emotion fading, no indentation and ever-provoking as it were to be called. To each man that stands against each one. He would be not suffered here, he would be made to disappear.

'From faced earth to scoured dirt, I see but one proposing worth, but who is he and what would he, of all, abandoned?

And who is he, and whom but fathered of each child I see? Of pit returned, but one sees me.'

'I, of all, bring news of west, of whom had gathered yet around, confess. Upon such pity, as I see, they've rampaged and but run it over, long before seething of each glade. Before the frost come and there he lay; and lay in shed, a hovel.'

'Why lay in grain? There's nothing that would spare such crops, there's nothing but such ill delight of petty men that would suffer you to seem this way.

I, of whom had seen, but many, lesser, they are petty. Whom walk but to such, lesser degree, whom find no peace and would believe.'

And high if chance of mighty peaks, of moved like petals, mighty heaps, were they to follow if allowed. But such as they were bastards upon the land would they have revved and followed, if such land would be distraught. Were it to be forgotten, that such heavenly things as would be gotten, all but hid inside the mountain-dirt. And move to be the end of all.

Hence they did not speak of it, for all that, in the world they hid. Their own destruction at the tip, were they to talk, and thence, so be it. Would to be and followed after.

For each man was but to anchor, yet himself in dirt. They spoke and yet forgot each word. And yet forgone such tiny passing, and yet, as would they, never coming, mighty stature. Never granting mighty rancid as were ever land, they would forget everything in time.

'Is such lore are you have brought for us, to each and every, better, lass, whom mighty you approach when fading? When to be and never ending as you're to be granted, when was there ever a pass? For a man like you whom is in trance?

As we had heard and yet today we've seen, there are and were they, dark such things. As you'd pretend to be, and old whom in their wretchedness, as they would see it fit today, have long forgotten each blessing of a kind. I of all, have yet to lose my mind over petty, yet endure. Knowing that he died of yet, as it just happens, we lure. Such evils as they would forget, all that is necessary, would to be, come at a price instead.'

'But whom are you to speak of, great sage?'

'Is it not clear, the one that brings, of new, the messenger, the one whom latched onto mighty words, whom has forgotten, would, and mismatch all, in heart, of petty, as he sees as true. I would cast but all in burning fire and of cold, I would sent them through to chop each limb and feed, of stray but dogs would find it fit, of less coyotes hangings, as might happen after. You know if true, that it was never meant for either.'

'Brother, of who do you speak of when time is come for us to grand pardon?'

'I will not reconcile as to beg for such a thing, if I were placed within each errand and such was as there's command. As there's but wretched, goings and never owing, to such blasphemy as you have called. I've known and walked on such, such days, there are plenty and petty, and many a man, as well, to say that they, they will not know what to do with us, after we are gone.

They will not be capable of being peace to that which is distraught, you see me as they do, this matter, you see me as an old thing that falters. Yet you've come to pass and lest of all, again forget. I've lost all certainty of any future that there is ahead.

But know that if I were to be, and trialed as one and all would see, I would chose of mighty claim and less disdain and less of all, not desperate to remain but flee, of all thought, but free of any poison that has come onto me, for man whom wrought, and fought with pain. Now has bastards forgotten me before I even came onto him. I falter, such as any man, but not even I, against such odds prevail.

I rest my case, if there is such as least reminder. I've lost myself in dreams of cold and what comes after, yet no one shall prevail to catch, whatever gourd of cold and watch. Upon my body wreathing, drawing and ever calling upon it, they will carry on and call upon the mountain shatter. There will be no life after.'

'What reason is there for such and such outlandish claims at last? I of all do remember you in such, as it were, my youth, to what is worth and has been said. You've proclaimed yourself, and such was there, if such was there, an end. Long before you've told me so, for ever braver, much would do. If time would call, and trance would shatter, and what to be, the will of man after, would arise to stay.

Of braver flights, discord convey.'

'Yet times change, and I see no pity that shall ever come to such an end as any living man would endure on back alone, no longer prodding on his own, with wisdom lost and what soon enough, least all forgot, there's no will carried through, uncanny, they will soon but foresee us as to be pointless, not worth of any but such piety as there is. With each coming to the age of man, and each of them, but not enduring, arrogant, pointless and thinks of himself but fair, there would be a time when all but realize or are aware.

And when it comes, and such as there is, would there be no man true to himself or ever uncanny. As to call it, whenever they know, of less and of truly as there is but falter, as tawny as there is, as such the sun, would instead govern over all, alas, for no other reason but because we let them do it as such.'

'That to me but sounds as if the youth has already fallen, which is dire news to my ears, I latch upon all I know, I grow weary of all, but would remember what I have been told. If only was there but, some sane, and if only were a reason to again remain, in bosom, as would there be a mother. One that would guide his son and look after him after, such age is lost and we are merely yet endearing the troubles that come to all and yet to see.'

'What is there to me, if that is as such, as would the case?'

'Nothing, for you and I are not longer the same, although we've never been apart, we simply separated, to each his own, and spirit is old but gets diluted, much to its only worth, such, would it be called, convoluted. In darker days, I may have been forgotten, if that's the case, they would've called for my head, I hear them coming, lest I stay my hand and give what's left to it, as such I say. If there was ever a chance for one to show, of an old generation, granted, I would've called them so.

Would've died freely if one might've called, would've taken myself to their suffering and cast myself in front to die. But where is there such thing today? When you, but youth, merely invite them, not to lay, you call as such, and hide inside what's there to be as kindly as one would find himself but rotten.'

Thence they spoke of no lesser worth, than the one of whose presence was there and much earlier known.

'Shall we speak of stars and what comes after? The red point of sky and least of all, but yonder, were it to be called but much satin, of which I seem to but recall, of such grandeur a call, to every arm that might stumble. What is there to be, whom might they just see if they pass?'

'I do seem to recall, your word for word what happened, least of all.'

'What is there from there on out on?'

‘Nothing worth of wretch but saying, I of all would welcome stars but praying as I am to each godly fiend and each listening appeal, I wonder.

Whence will they come and whom of all would take us all?’

But all is lost then.

Tw’as a murder before it even started, such, would they obey no command, and of long ago as such period as they would see the light but fade after the drawing of the oranges, coming from the south. They brought what seems to be, acquaintances and followed after would they know at last, they asked of what had happened, they asked of such a woe. They do not know of what they ask of us, many of us buried in mountain, let alone. Would they leave us, when it happens, for nasty such as there’s reaction. Upon the dreadful hour, of their coming after, would one serve, as to heart, whenever they appear, and whence would they have cast as thus, each body that belongs to us.

‘I, a dead man who rises, I of all, asks, there is. Would you.’

When is there such case as to obey, when bellow as the likes of men, but not the gods who follow after, for their likes never do say.’

On the street, much of it, peculiar a figure:

‘He’s so well dressed, isn’t he? He’s just, I cannot look away from him.’

Dark clothes with black-blue sangria-plum, with card diamonds with sword-snakes, eight in a diamond, wrapped around, with two scythe at the end curved sword, all aligned with glowing-purple red and dark eyes, many faces and fallen over much deformed eaten-over chow-cancer blocks- all pushing out in square-tower fortifications, with lines of fire from where iron crossed metal cords connect them, - soldier crawl beneath army wire, as such. Whereas the pattern are yellow, red, of glowing hues and the wires and the forts are but mixed half-way through with every single one of them.

He had a scepter with four man-arms holding smaller scepters away from the grip.

A pyramid sphere formation that was almost crawled around, an outline of talons with eye-like shape needle-rack open in the middle revealing a strange organ tongue-hardened like a metal-sharpened out of a stove, made by a blacksmith, power-rod conductor that would constantly electrify the wires around his body, creating a power arc that shot out of his body. While glowing with tear-radiation energy that would slowly descent into a puffy-blue smoke; sending cage-like human molds, homing into them.

Fear ran into the looters as they ran, as they were closely ran over by the running lighting men projected out of his chest, in a time during which they could not hold the lines.

‘I do mind it when you disappear. I know when you’re near and when you’re hiding, I can see it, sense it, and I know that there are times when I could almost, I could almost have at you.’

Damn that creature, it would never work, it could never make as much of a difference if either one of them appeared, out of dirt.

‘Punch their heads open, I’ll make sure no one will hear you as it happens, I shall do my best to add a silencer to each fist.’

Would he do it? There was only one way to know it after all, and as an insurmountable beast he had begun, threading no longer carefully as he’d done before, now turned towards the correspondence that would shatter each feature until he gave up and started stomping. Ever so clear as to reel in counting just as many blows, and many after that came forth and rose. Nothing could do to remove and instill such rage, he felt like crushing them, going beyond it, then smashing again.

Until skull was openly cracked, seeping in, blood dripping off his bootstrap, and then again, he’d spill some more as soon as he could do it after. Drinking it in order to avoid another catastrophe and another disaster, not to push it in too soon, he’d see to it and would will it to be culled.

‘I bear no remark, I am not stronger than the man I have killed, but I will do it again.’

This time, with each arm going over, lo’, he has been lied. Many of the sleepers, whose back turned, but seethe in terror at the sound. Who could be next and is that the sound of metal reeling in, splattering? Would they ask themselves, of course, not as fancily as one would think.

‘Who’s smashed iron lodge? I ain’t it.’

As mouth just opened, servant charging, eyes but closed, and for a moment, frozen in paralysis, as the sight of that creature emerged, even for a second there, it was all that was needed before either one of them could say a thing, and lesser, as such, of verse.

And just as thus as would they had, and whence they never would’ve dragged themselves, right after; righteous days. But there were not as few and let alone, many would come and drag after and went, a few, for every a day after.

Thence they stood and such retorted.

Would they comply again, when much to theirs was drawing to an end but no such, as would be, conclusion to every single thing that passed after, also static as for ‘else matter. Leeway as they ride, from afar and what looks like they would’ve found themselves a day as forth, gotten past the day whence they had drawn upon such, least of all and such accord.

‘I alone shall see it through, when mightily as it’s said, and lest it be forgotten, I concur instead, there’d be something in it worth mentioning, when less than such, would they come en trance.

There’s a two men a horse of head coming after them, alas, we must waste no say and see that we do not forget who their master is and what he might bring upon the hour. We must not, for the sake of us give leeway, as such.

I could not find a good reason to attest to what’s been happening when I was gone, when they marched upon me and long before it, least would I to understand, when lo’ of all would they come to no end.’

There was never such an hour as to stand it. Never such a cowardly leer, as to sneer at one another, as they brought of joy, whatever there was or happened between them, upon the square they stood. And dropped their masks before, imploringly fading, leprous after each hour, as they drew, of each other's jerking snares, finally they've become aware, that part of town, as there it stood, shaken, daring, morning took. The best of men, neither of whom understood what had been taken from them, neither for the hour, nor for the passing. Not a single mass, or pile, vengeance as there was amassing.

'We have broken pile, and little scum wrought pillars of ill-climbed near worthlessly torn. Many of the most incessant-helmet, and those whom wearing them, as blearing as their presence was endearing as to wait, and what if left of it, long before anything could be done, instead, I would've seen its worth. As nothing passing, I bring, therefore, from this point on, a single mass, of what remains. No glorious end, but much to it, I've seen it as such ascend past the point it were.'

Of worthy men, as one of them as he were, he was but taken, yet delivered, as far away as one might seem to yet unmask. Would he have taken any time, while, during which, he were alive to spoil, unnerved as to what happened upon the call as to have toiled.

'Lo' Trech'

For every uprooted thread there was a rood every now and there, spread and split wherever they came onto, and out their share, something happened down there. Eighteen trenches worth a drop, holes were dug here, others not.

'There's a dependence in here for the substance that's in root and even after, after and before it was shaken, where it stood there was a man hiding in it, wasn't there?'

'Was there any to begin with? I couldn't know, I wasn't even aware anyone was alive in here. Most were killed, largely as this place is uninhabited, I'd say. You should do yourself a favor and turn away, for what is worth, if there was ever a chance to make it out of it, I'd call such this as were it, its worth to be aplomb, as such. I can make your leave as comfortable as it can be, but no longer to see it as such.'

'I choose to stay. I must satiate whatever lays in my head, I need to see where it's going, where his roots and prints and whatever else there is, out there, playing as it is with my nerves, I shall find him and afterwards.'

But the thorn would not have the man's threats, not to be lost on deafness and aloofness, there as such, had he listened to anyone, perhaps there might've been a change. A chance for his master to grow as told from wherever else.

'They call your name, in the upper-growths, they say the citadel inside the garden is but lost and would but move itself away. As to show as little compassion as one would find it, no longer trying yet to mask, plenty men live in there, but, yet, alas, many would but be driven, as such away.

You needn't look for any other reason, nor would I tell you do not bid.

On a chance that you may stumble onto on again as they only show themselves gagging with blood. They're but tortured down there, I've seen them fumble, stumble, and yet, disciple, you needn't learn of what came after. When they're to be pulled back inside, some insidious torture brought, thrown around and prying in, open within the hour and had they appeared anywhere but where they stand. A problem like it would not for the likes of it disappear at all. It's a given, it's a must.

Your silence, such, I trust!’

‘But why would I keep it and what’s my gain? If I refrain from telling others, what else would I tell them? I know, I shall not dwell deeper, nor return, instead, I shall join them, yet, in thorn.’

‘Alas, blasphemous wretch, do you not understand that once of the garden you’re but of garden? That, once, upon, you have become, you cannot leave, nor be undone? Worn as such, and you’re to be, whatever, just as such, please me, to tell you, as to drive away. What they might make of you, if you but stay? Of starry Dwight and what’s to come, not even the ones that are but done. And swollen in their graves, not even their likes would make it past, as to reach such thing as to refrain.

Mockery would follow, even they would laugh. DO you not realize, such thing as there is, the corpses would but throw you in the wretched calves?

Watching as your pity fading, never yet again, demanding of such thing as they have stumbled onto, much to you, and yet awaking, from their dire needs, to their mighty feed and make it so you, while at it, also get to lure? Many men just like you. Otherwise there’d be no show. For all of it, is but to throw, as many new members, dancers, actors as they might get. Once they wrapped their dead-cadaverous hands on you, and lest of back, you won’t get away, now, do not get mad, at me, I see.

For I’m but a thorn, not enemy.’

‘Yet you were standing here, yet to reproach, thinking I would solemnly cower myself, ever after as if I did not think myself unready. Not to call upon the others, plenty, or just as much time. As I was given before, to dine, on feast, I had been seen.

And, I have known them, would’ve seen them thin, if I had known the better. But I shall make it nonetheless, to each word and every letter.’

To which he vowed and leaped. On mighty feet, which went as far as draft, would’ve seen it all, if jointed tall as was he thus, he entered, from point to point, alas, alas. Was he entered through the base of root, of mighty gate appeared, shook, torn to shreds, it looked, as if devoured, upon such a thing, as was its face and body, lacking worth. A mushroom thing, of fallen dirt, but shaped like dust, and fallen yet apart as if eaten, in wretch and after such a thing, long day, disgustingly forlorn and wasted. Apart from what, of likes detested was he called to enter, to attend. To such a man, as would’ve had him.

‘Else Ylend, I have been waiting for you to appear, greetings, I am servant of the thorns, and mighty roots, in wait. I’ve come upon you, stumbled, before you were even born and yet. I’ve come to ask you as such, where have you come from and where, to, would you happen to drive your own likens towards?’

‘To such a thing as paradise, promised, not by the thorn or the forest committed. But long before, of day and age, when I was but a young lad, I was told, by a man. That there’d be such a thing to chase, in the heart of roots and fallen apart shingle, and mighty, less, I hinder, as to heart what might come.

Upon me, such piety as it’s given, I was told, alas, that I may be driven away, so, henceforth, as it happens, they might forgive what I’ve done to them, long before there was a chance to spare. As to be driven back before the sails come back. And yet I see, not to cower, upon my missing piece, and what is left of heart after. I seek such admonition as I would’ve been granted in solace and defeat.

I've risked my life and even after, I would've searched and settled for no peace if that meant what it means, I seek nothing more, even after, if I had known this.

Listen to me, such litany as would they call. I've lost it even before I had been a man, and they forgot about me, even before I was alive. Truly, so, I seek, such, yonder. I seek that you may bless my path, that I may take yonder and search such root, I bastardly man who shook upon hearing them pass. Underneath the tail of the land, upon the crossing, when they sing and pray, would they have, if such were the case, upset?

And were it to come to an end before they came along, I would've been dead, as well. ‘

Then they both agreed they should, at the very least proceed.

Walked upon each root, then steps, upon a system of mixed tunnels, all fallen upon one another, intersected with the giant body of a rat, swollen after and become. Its head but rooted and glory, four great roots with heads of man on top. Each of them, created walls, as they approached, they would've stopped, but, lo', they settled on no return.

First of the heads:

‘You may not enjoy drafting such a need, as to hear what to achieve, for glory, if you seek as thus, you won't be remembered, bucket-head, you seek at last, prized consolation.

Would you have understood, as thus, for what is worth, and empty, such as there is, but indentation, would've been but heard. Unless lost on empty thought and what you seek, as thus would've unearned, nothing from I.

To miss but such as I.

Again, but to not listen to no other, totter but than mine.

As thus, I such dictate, you must listen to the other three before you will be allowed, to each end to go much further.’

Although no council was it, thus, his ancestors were known to him, would've made to follow, yet in trance. Was he, upon being met by the past, remembered, for what happened there. And yet, despite them, unaware, he would've found nothing to look after, not to obtain. The order of day, not to ordain:

Such was the second one that followed after:

‘You must've unmasked the other ones, for they have seen and they have barely dealt with what comes after, they of all must know of day. I, of all, and not to say, would've called them for what they were.’

A reprisal as such there were:

‘I am old, but I remain, I am bold and weary of mighty action that the youth have taken, yet against me, as they would've seen it fit to much forget, of such deeds as I carried for them, I lay myself bare, as to be put around and lest would I have seen it, yet again, as being fair, would I have done it? Not, unlike no man, the other, I would've ruminated on what draws and comes right after, if it were for I, to, lest would they have called upon me to recede, in the dark corner, towards which I proceed, I am met by such a virtue as for patience, as for certitude that they will make me beckon for each and every single one of them, who drew much further, as to call upon a rope, and then. Upon the hour when I shall grab their side, would I have seen such reason as they would claim each time, that I can go no further than it's needed, much before, as such proceeded either men to take, and such, as pieces, each of them, out of my body knowing, and rather gnawing, and lest of all, I call, at you as to attend. No funeral to no end, but the end of the side where they had buried the rope, and do, as to well, of bolden man, remember, each verse, and each mark on the ground, uncannily so, for I have breathe upon it, I should know. I do remember, as such, and lo'. I've come to realize what happened, when forgiven, as I have been, as to be taken back, what they have done is simple and would've caught be off guard, if only they had seen it for what it were. If only they had known I would've found it so. I see, as for every mark on the ground, for every scratch of nail and after that, I've come to see. Where they had buried, not only the rope, but me, and I of all, would shatter, as little as there would be, no graven after. I but beckon you to return as such and look away, and heave your head in such disgust as to remind them, of what I've done, the least of that and yeast of leper-dance, as would they call. I would've called on it.

Remember as to heed and listen, and as to approach. To toil upon such road as to have brought me, all along the way, back home, during such time when one would regard my existence as something that ought not to be had by any means of be forgotten by no beast and not to coil and wreath without, such, your talons the fists. You, a dark, of mighty cowl painted in black blood, might lessen the pain. I am ingratiated but I remain, a dead man being carried, as long, for as far away as one would know and mighty just as less to say, do remain in such a place as one could find himself weary, of such reigns as would've been. I've seen such things. I do remember you. I've seen you around, during the peaceful times. When I was but a lad, I do know. Of mighty cowl, you're not a youth, but a godly tower. I worship thee, am I rewarded? I do not understand what's happening? Am I to be carried forth towards a place I may not be thwarted? Such was my tale as one could remember, as such, of much and many acts of desperation I would've faced no longer if they were or had something in mind, for I would've known no such lesser, as such were the degrees of pains I had to go through, in order to have my voice heard and see to it, that those that came and dragged us forth, out of our lands, would've found themselves no longer after that allowed to live on the premise of their due. We shattered their skulls, but alas, I an old man, would know as I was forced in the back of a corner, made to play with tainted moisture and a rope, I would've had my life, if there weren't for what little thing there was left in my soul. But I, for one, never would I have expected, to have been met by such and by you, who marches forward, from this point on. I wreath and sweat and least the beads would've been had, ahead, I would've found myself to be. Of much more hard felt agony.

But you, decided, mighty man, to gather me around, piece by piece, my rope instead, rather, as such, missing. I prolong my hopelessness and I see no worth in such a thing as would've done to them and would've done to myself, if that, were there a reason for it, I might've made it clearer. The rope was my life and I remember but praying onto it, worshipping it, squeezing as to draw of breath, and drink its water, as from a pouch instead. I fear that there's no more, I fear that I might've faced something, if there was something there, but now there's naught, no more. Will I have seen such beads, as to remind myself that there was a thing, a family left behind, a young maiden I have wed, and left with child. But lo, I do not regret, for I have never fancied myself, of such, a man. As to wed and as to care, as to do something that's fair. Instead I've lived as I ought to have should, I did as I pleased and it seems like I was punished for it. Of such courteous worth, I would've seen it as being uncanny. I would've seen less and lesser than that, many would've found my please, as not to look nor to see. But I beckon you not to forget, please, I please to be remembered, instead, do not focus on such detail. Of the agonies I've inflicted upon many men, I, would've been, as such, as worthy nature, crowned if that's the case. They would've sung my name, I would've refrained from doing anything as much as it would be displeasing, teasing them with wild command, wreathing all in pain, I must stop myself from talking, oh antiphony of such creed.

But, do you remember, that kid I bore? I, the father, whom have promised him that one day, I will return home, the child, poor thing, had yet believed. He would've seen, and done with it as no other man would've done, as such, to nasty breed, of man, I am. Although there are things that in life, done, upon redone, I soon yet come to realize that I regret, having come, to stubble and ever after, I pity myself ever after. Yet there's naught to sing and not of worth. I set some place to flounders, and have come yet, much younger, to chase my share, of rabbits and of hares. Playing with them, and doing as I must, to kill as many, not tell, to anyone that I ate. All by myself, not to share, in dead of night, fire as I made, as I've never been anything but selfish, instead. I bore their bones, of great girthed armor, but in the midst of daylight, it all came apart after. Much to laugh of haughty children, did come back. I would've whipped them, if I were close to them, here and again, and after that. I see no reason to find it to, as to be, as to show, cruelty, to lesser men, though the bastardly hated, by I, would've seen no end to what I ought to have or would've done, or might've come to do, if I were to have come apart.

You've seen my true face, but you still look serene, I see nothing of you, but show of magnitude of feet, the run, you must run and flee before the world falls apart, or who knows what might come after? Branches and of trees, I've seen peace but they've done nothing to spoil or to fix them, must you not have realized what I've heard today?

At the council that I have attended, though I was allowed to leave the cave in which I was clearly tended. Might I remind you that? I may have exaggerated, at last, my punishment and my woe, that might've been rather a place they brought me in to rest, as to not harm anyone, upon their path. Regardless of it, I remind you, once again, alas. The council of the council, of the council they spoke, and there were spooks as, lest of all, would they have called when one such as I might rise and rose. I have. And they have been kind of me, at last. As to accept the trivialities of time that come after and younger, if I had been, I would've wreathed, heaved and gotten them, hand by hand by feet and back of head, driven them through some wall instead. I would've done as such and if there was ever a thing or a chance that I might get my hands on one of them, at last, this was it. But I see no reason for fur, of such a malice, as they'd given me to be warm. See for yourself, I'm cold and I've been like this for a while. Paid for mighty action, yet I prevail. Of such things, as I was clothed, they rewarded me as well. But I do not understand where they came from and how is it that they had thought as such, that they could simply, as to closely, after, buy my silence ever-after, burrowing under, such my head, I would have averted it if that were the case. Yet not a single man cared, my mere thoughts would not prevail. They thought me, such and such, to please, and plead for such a mighty kin unlike theirs, ours. Would they see no reason, common sense? Would they have done it, in any case, if any or either, be them in my place as I have toiled and I have done such things that the mighty gods themselves, as you, of whom, I suspect to be their king and kind, in mighty place after that. Would've have said something, anything, they would've remembered. I do not think there's something after, my godly defender. My silence was not easily bought, if there was something there, that I did not, I would've started a war. And such a thing, I would've fought them all. A world united, a tribe unfounded, and there was after, as one to bow to them and to themselves after. Yet, who is the one who starts the flames? When the town is cold and he defends? Animals sometimes come, to mind. I do not see them always driven away as they steal our supplies. But now that I think of it, such is the fur that I come to look upon in and realize there's fox in, it. Such is the man, that he found himself killing the pest and taking it by the hindrance and giving it to me instead. Of that, I am glad he had thought it through at last. Imagine that, and what would've happened otherwise.

They would've given me such fur as would be, as, to call it, imitation. I'd be damned if I were as serene as you are now, if I had been let known of such creation. Could, you, of all, imagine such thing, as there is to be, darkly a matter and insult?

Because, I of all, would not take it kindly as to be blind, not to mind and not to be, as such, there are flowers and trees and mighty swollen wasps and bees, also, to it, as well as the heads of the foxes they had planted with the branches going through their heads, with little flame with such fires as would they be called candles instead. I think there's no reason to contort each case as to forget ourselves, that there was a much, to it, such case, as would've been found itself, much spread. In every possible land there is, and many such things, happening around the ground. They do fancily queerly things I do not approve of, yet again, I will never understand why? Such waste as there is, such bastardly things, why not eat and feast on them as such. These are not our traditions but come from farther Eastern as there's the borders, taken after that, not a single man would've believed it to be possible as to spare him the time to understand, no mockery and no end. I, again, think of it, and then. I think there's something gnawing at my feet, and as I looked down, then, before the council that it, do you know what it is? A pearl, taken from a clam and oyster, a reminder, but they let that sink, to fall within and be lost across the road, within. I don't think you would've come to realize, by any means, of what had happened after that. I think, as such. Well, they have kept, for this long, the tradition and would've come to stumble again on the sea-faring and would've been granted such perdition. Of such cruel things I'm shocked, but not of them, not entirely, instead, I know just as I have realized that they will be, eventually lost, to me, to I, to all of them, the sea-faring things and the lootings as to die for me, no longer kept living in my heart as they would see, as they would fare much better. If only they had kept it, this much more, to the closest call, the letter. Would've been sealed and kept locked inside, in mighty as there are inscriptions, not to call or to forget. I am the man who started it all, I tell you. I, the grim reminder, of what it used to be a man, I may have been bought and taken care of, but that has always been the case. I wonder, was I one to be sickened by them, of what I've done after? I, whom were no fool, yet I've earned by due and fought for meat and bread and milk instead, they would've seen something as clear as that and now I wonder, when will they see to it that I am dead? Burn with such solace as I remind them of what used to be; do not dare avert your eyes but at the same time, do not dare look at me before the time draws on, I will not weep, if that's the case, you need not comply to a thing like that, as I make it even clear. Much clearer that any man would've granted it to you instead, I wanted to be vain and I have done it for the longest time I could imagine instead. But lo, as such, my life was spoiled, ruined after a fashion and mightily destroyed, distraught, and done for even before and after that. I think there's never been a chance either or as well, but for you, my mighty bearer, there's a chance, as to be changed. Do as you must and do not repeat the mistakes I've done.

For, you're carrying but a pitiful man, whose life was petty and instead, with all the rewards in life, I find myself more weary and more weary, and wrathful after for the things I've said and done. Not to be recognized by son I have helped create. Not to give back what I have taken instead, I see no point in handling such ruse, I cannot hide away the guilt, for your and your ears only will hear me, admit as such. Out of this very mouth, as I have come to falter, yet again, at that, I am a pitiful, pitiful old thing, filled with regrets within, I would've done such things as needed, I would've come on top, and much to it, undefeated, if that had meant something to any either man. But, in all my regrets, I could not see something more important instead, than those I've left behind, my faith, and those that I have shattered along, wouldn't matter if I were dead. Yet I live and I think, my teeth but I do sink as deep as to cause pain. Neither of it compares. To have seen as bolden mighty son, to have grown as mighty and yet as strong. And to be jealous for I've seen him grown, and I have seen his life, all on his own. I wish there was a chance to spare, myself for every memory, instead. I lack the needed, such compassion, for what was done and what comes after. I'm nasty, there'd be no perdition, yet I, even after all this time, have not come to realize or to understand. Why do they still care of me instead?

They know and knew, and he as well, when he has stumbled upon me and met, to tell. You as such, I was shocked. For there was no such thing as pity or disturbingly forlorn gust, or thing that would be or adhere to such thing as there is, disgust. And shocked of all, would I not have stopped myself to let alone, and come along, remember? He told me he forgave me and invited me to join them, ender, of such dreams, alas. I cowered in shame and I declined, for such was my pride as it would never come to allow. To return to them, after I have forced them to live through such an evil life and such a lie as would've been forgiven; I did not see myself as worthy, for such greater things, as they had been, as they've become as I have known myself incapable of ever being or to have become. Such was it that I left, and most of my life, I have lived, instead, among them, yet afar. I would see and peak and never know why. Such grand, as woman as there was. One that never moved on and was alone, instead, pain could've driven him mad, my son there was. But that's hardly a matter worth speaking of, as there's greater beings out there than there are, for what I've seen happening now, I am disgusted again and I see no reason to chase for, not this reason, not this far.

With them parted, I was joined by council and I have heard. Of many men, their toils and what they went through, and then again, instead, unnerved as I've come to be. They never faltered or come again, they see me and look as such, they know who I am but not a single man can know, as such. Will I tell them away? Will I say something that might drawn, breath away? I call upon them every time, I tell onto them, do not avert your eyes. For cold shall be here forever, as will frost. And you shall not be driven out if you are to fight, forever, at the cost of everything and everything that's being done. In order to save everyone and save yourselves, there's that left for mighty ruler, as for king who toils, around and foils, upon each rancid plan that comes about. Of those whom drive the force, and down, with them I say, unless they come and bow and kneel and ask for such forgiveness as they're petty and misgiven, and as soon as they do, I shall cast but hurt onto them, driving each man into the ground. As they're pained and right about, as I would see it fit to call upon their wretched pairs, and come about, the end as such. I will not forget what has been said to me, or then again, all them to get up. Nay, they shall be punished for each vile word and they shall get beaten and flogged and whipped into such a thing that not ever their future kinds and descendants would know such worth, as that is but my wrath and wilt and it shall never be carried over through and shall never be misgiven after that. I see, other members of the council watching me, carefully enough, I fend, and not to seek at to provoke, I get out of chair, I was invited, as you see. And I thread along and I kick them in the heads, the ones that came here asking such forgiveness as I would given them, I stomp and I would've done it all over and over and over again until I was bastardly stopped, could you believe what happened?

I am no holy man, nor will I bow my head to every single one of the gods, yet there are things now that I would do to many and there are such as would've seen right plenty as would there be.

But no one cares what I do as they all seem to like me. Such is the curse that I bear, the charm, a powerful thing and such as there is, evil could not bastardly contort it forever after that. As for you, who carries me, I see that you've decided it is time for me to be brought home. I feel my life but petty, drafted as it may, taken but away, drawn back home, in a place where I've always belonged. In a place where I find solace waiting, chanting, and ever-so-content as to be ending and ended on, you've known it all along have you not? My dastardly desire to be buried on my own ground; in my home of plentiful approach, in a place where my heart could finally ascent and rose and rise, as I am no longer blind to my failures, no longer as to seek. I am finally at peace, having told you such an excerpt of what my life had been. I would shame each ancestor and each man, as to know, or to find out what I've done during such time, as they would have it, instead. I cross each snow and perilous thing, as to cast them away as they're thin and thinning out like reeds, like maddening beads that are but shattered as for each and every call, they make.

Place me on that moist spot, on soil, upon the spot winter has finally decided to leave its wild abode. I will have nothing more and nothing less, there's no ancestor I have bastardized, instead. As I day, I shall be greeted, by such mighty ancestors and men who shall call upon me, as I am, as I lay, undefeated, not my time, not by blindness, not by any cry, but my it. I am met, by my son, by my wife as well.

By every single man I fought, and they shall nod and shake their heads as I wilt it naught, to such a do, as to avert, no head and nothing, nothing else. I am met by glory, I am met by peace. Even though I have grown weak and frail as I may look, I can still clench my fist. I hold it as it looks in place. I open it and I refrain, for I seek no other solace knowing.'

As in his clenched fist there stood one that lay, a single, bothersomly cold, snowflake that refused to melt. Regardless of the warmth that lay in his hand.

Upon such day, of hardly there being any labor left to sweat as such. Would they help to rise it off the ground, when called, upon the mighty sounds of gulls, when they have merrily come, and yet about, in whichever way and seen and long before they mightily thinned, of such provisions as were left, and yet again when it comes to them. Not to forget, for every singing men that drew along, out of their waists as to accept that in a while and much to them, would they not, lay aware, oh, such it is as to remember. When the days draw forth and as such would they have seen it wait, much to their canter and ever to, yonder, send her as an envoy as such, for mighty ships they sailed at last. In the distance never knowing what to happen, whom to spoil, even before the other day, when they, as ancient men would, to toil, might've said, and might've stumbled from end to end. There was no better day, than to recall, and moisture in the air, along they draw and no more stall, and minded of the drawing forth, of fire, they would much, perchance, ruin it all, than hand it away. When such villages were spoiled, not by them but by their own hand as they remember, that the maiden they sent, as they have ended her, would've been swerved for naught, if they did not. And would remember if there was ever a time. That they were much worn, of toiling forth, too many days, going along, and there was naught else, for else and no man. As they hard hardly worked, and before they could even come along, a brattle, once in a while and they come forth and yonder, never knowing what they did, never seeing, as for it. The sing, the symbol, of mighty star, they would've forged it themselves, if there was ever a chance, to flee and run, as fire runs out, as men but come about, and they surrender. Of might as many still recall, of what was brought and from afar, they would've known naught else, unless, were it for them to have been told. And I recall, if one, as bold, as him who bore a crest, not to go and tender yonder and lest of all would be confess. For mighty men, were they to follow, for mighty men, would, not tomorrow, but as quickly as they'd come and stay, as thoroughly as to convey. As to abandon all need, and on their feet, would they say to him, but Illybis, but only said and spoken, never written, never known. For men like him but couldn't be said or told, of such alike, as anyone with same a mind, would to remember, and would to bring him forth, to such a thing, at to recall, much to his renown, much closer to each ill-defender. Many nations as to come, many of them never having realized, or having come in terms at all, many whom had called but ill, many as to grow as numb, and naught and yonder, yet to feel. There was naught else, and as such, there was never, even slight-a-chance, as yet to draw, and forth to draw much closer, old. As they are, many do not know at all, they can't forget, as many days draw yonder and they do not feel, as said.

'Come, come, draw forth, of run. We've come and stumbled, to such a great a thing, a hunt. I see no point, in try and spare, as to rejoin them, when all is end.'

To which they sang, and glory fell. They but had marched, to such bland, and fend. Off such curbed, mighty invader as would draw from south, although unlike the others, as well as fathers, of such a calling, of such, as drawn. Despite their spiteful coming from afar, despite their reckoning and similarity in stall; although they came in land as well, from neither here and neither there, neither one would share the spoils and neither man should forget, aught all. To have lain their arms, most would forget that there are things that would not follow through, but long before their kind was lost. There was never such a thing, unkindly. As to give to such curls, to allow them to stomp and come yonder, in a land of hope, as to recede, as to grow much forth and yonder, as to come in peace; no such thing would do, to many and to less. No more than needed, as to come and less of it, as such, confess.

They slaughtered the second wave of invaders, as to be allowed respite. A moment to recollect themselves, and not to feel, yet set in mind; they sang with mead and ruined feet, they cut and chopped, and mighty feat. Was it, for many men, but looked, the young and grew as well. As that, of mighty force there was, as naught and naught, and never else, would they have brought in mind. Unless mistaken, unless foretold, unless toiled with and never sold, like cattle, praying. Musky-scent and gods contending with the victor's spoil.

During such night as they would've known:

'I've seen a vision of such day, I would, as such but be content. When followed through by such a dust, as to come through, of snow and lust.

We have to drive much farther South, and drive them, beneath, as it may come to pass. There, is but no such, lesser day, as to forget and be replaced. They whom would, instead but crush, of what is left of us, and skulls but trash; whom would steal what they can from us and cast us in a place to die. They shall not be forgiven so, as we shall drive them, and never end it, so.'

And such was there, much clearer, out of drawing forth, and fear, would they, had been seen. When and during such a time within; much and much closer they had drawn, for every moment spent there, would they have been seen but gone. Followed through, unknown such land. Of much peril that might've never been seen or felt as such.

They were strange and tawny-rude. And their but blades were, such, were crude. And spoiled and trashed and they threw stones at last, have come upon such mighty boats, as they would rival, those with lesser hope. An unfortunate trifling event, one that could not be easily forgotten and if one did as such, were he to forget, he might and mightily would he be trashed, and deservedly as such, for what went on the continent would've had him, lush. And lavish, such were the forests, as they had grown, below the cold of torn fest. Feast of spoils and maggot boils, they were unwashed after so many toils.

'I seem to have forgotten, there, many of them but do not realize what's happening here, nor there. They would have us turn.

Against one another as to mourn and as to much forget. Many men have died for us to show up here and now and then, I've come to sail, and come to be alone, as well. I fail to answer, I fail to know, I seem to have forgotten the feeling of snow.'

He was as much, as to contemplate on it as well, as he would, thence, at last, came his other brothers, just as well. Incapable of knowing what happened between them, or what had driven them so far to know, of what was said before, no better than any of them, were they now.

'I see of mighty green basin, they poisoned it, they poisoned it!'

Yelled and such as they were, many others followed as well, not to forget what's happening between them and bewitched as they are by low-land, of such plow, of what is drawn from it, a spoil of leaves, all blasphemous in touch, of eely mint. They sing, wallowing forth, they see, and swatch of many hues, comes forth. As from the mighty puddle, yet a man, made of it, as well, as well. Of what but came out of the men that fell, and all of those whom had been broken in part and taken away. From many of their homelands, furiously swaying as they would; this kind of living being something no man should, adhere to, follow after, follow through. But out of its chest, but glowing forth, of such sinew:

'Will you join and come to be finely bathed? Will you come and join me as such as to be warmed? There are days, no longer, when there are finally praying, as to bring, such forth. There's none out there to remind us of whom we lost.

I have been in such regard. But many men who now lay dead and wait, at last. To ask, as such, if there might be, of such, to such and lustily. No other kin of mine, no descendant of such benign stature as to stall tall and yet to face. No oratory that might fend, if that were, such the case, to fight. And drive you far away from land.'

'Silence, beast of vaguely green; we have won this land of wont-disease. We've defeated each man as we charged and changed and maimed each other, in our search for glory and in our search of name, driven by our gods who still remain. In their higher placed, yonder from the seats upon they stand, as they might never come and never face as such defeat, as to be usurped down at the feet, of heathens and of those who fall, of those who never stooped as low, as mighty as we are, at all. We pray to them, of safe return.

As well as we are blessed, we shall not forget of you, spirit of old, if that is your will. But if, else, and if you seek to stop, we shall drive you forth into the ground. And dug such pits as to remove, as to fill thineself with rust the pit, and dirt that follows.'

To which the pool was silent until tomorrow.

Wretches, all of them, for no man should least of all forget what happens, when arrogance pushed one to no end to feel himself but rotten, rottenly- he is, taken apart. A blunder, as to follow through and never come to a single piece as to become a thrall, many men but do remember. Of the sayings, of forget. Such a things as would come after, if one were to toil with his nasty end:

'They will invite but weakness when it comes, they will forget what happens, again when time, but nears such an end. When one refuses to open yet his mouth again, as he would've had if that were so; unless you slay of such mighty tawny thing, an invader from the South and farther down, should know.

Their kind is pity, their minds are blind, their bodies need to be whipped, enslaved and much to them defiled. Until not a single one might do, until neither single one of them could make it through, if that's what's needed, we shall carry, of such a wonder, as to never forget so merrily a cast.'

And then.

Blethlske

A little podgy thing he was. With rosy cheeks, around the shop, as long as he kept his eyes on her, she'd not notice a thing, a wing towards her. There she stood. Without a moment's notice, yet he would.

'I've come to purchase a few of your most ramous, yellow-heated apples. Will you please pack a few of them for me today?'

'Young Slittlklam, you're still around? I thought you'd be dead by now.'

'How could I be when there's still some engines going, right about, where, here to see, there's but a few of them wrapped, around and ever-shout, instead and lest of all, would see around. A few petty triangles' That hanged around the corner-stout, one of the closest buildings, of which crowned hooked roof was close enough to fall.

A petty pool as well, there was a rain. Of stormy weather, that filled the side of town with snails. A few comfy toads were leaping about. He was eye-dead-on shot and every single one of them avoided him, dead-there-on. A shin inside his blade; someone had been killed as well.

'Come on, Rosaline, I wish only a most beauteous apple.'

Many mighty days had passed, since either one of them would come, and then, once met at last. Were it for another man to stand, and were it for any other one as well, he might've done, enacted, mightier, as he were gone, before the mighty yields. Of many enemy whom had fallen forth, and better, yet, would've been found in such of fields.

And him

'My lord, thou are still yet to be forgotten as for toast out of whim when they may draw within your range of call, that they might call upon thine blessed day, to hear you talk, of greater journey as had been, when you were suffered along each thin high-roof bowed down, of whom poultry you have killed and shroud of all, might you speak, now, as thine servants, blessed thou we might be, we shall listen as well, whatever, thine reason be, as to call, I see, and call of many man and many of them shall come, and lay, their swords away, such board might claim, upon their many backs and claim the land in thine name and in the name of Christ whom we shall all serve from this point on and until no single speck of dark shall come upon the country, and upon those who dare turn a blind eye as point and hide, away and heed, such thing as taken away, blasphemous, suffering. I of all, whom had been given upon such tainted altar, who has finally, upon, sleekest, such blessing as God, himself, to whom my heart has been given towards, as the Saints and the Angels have, when, drawing upon time and time as such, lend onto me the message, such divine, as one would have it. I seek no claim for naught and after that, I shall go and live, as I wait, and I, alone shall not stall, having been and seen and felt up upon my back, such wretches would have them starved and ignored. For they have not accepted our lord, for that alone they're meant for punishment and punishment alone might not do, unless they're blessed, and true as it might be and due is their day of reckoning that comes after, and for every single day that comes, true enough, after, they shall rot, as their most obtuse benign, wretched souls, whom suffer, overburdened yet beyond, mental and bodiless decay. For many such like them have even forgotten to this day; many least and many shattered, as plain as day, and ever after, of whom, they had abandoned still, and would be done, for, if it weren't for him, still, I seek as such as many, that may still be brought, and turned around from their most desperate of days, from which, beckoned upon, they have forgotten how to pray. Ill of the mind, such as suffering might be carried out in silence for the faithless, as it will have been, seen way before it, as they will have of ill, no wretched of kindness after, that might be still young in the eyes of those that would falter as to be driven away. No longer will they remember if they're made forget and turned from the most bastardly of all, that would happen, and lest all give themselves to our lord, they shall wreathe in pain and much to be, as such beseech, many for whom, as such, and suffering will be called, and many of them, by thine wilt, shall be done fort. For those blasphemers, whom turned their backs, many of them would have to watch. Their precious kin and those whose pockets wince as they can't, any more be filled, for avarice turned away from thine. Our lord who had been killed by Jews alike, of wretched serpents, that would come and shatter, and drive away as if that would matter, for anyone whose heart is evil, as it has become. For those whom had been driven away from your voice the call. They, who would blaspheme your name, and suffer, suffer, ever again. Whom, of idol, would they had been seen, and if not for you, alone, none of this might've been. But shattered was thine path today, for wherever place one looks, evil lay, for kike regard. For every vile kin to Moloch, rescind, for them, he is but god, second father, third of lies, that come after, such vile anchor, for, come after, no more, and naught but a false idol. As one would've seen one like, as one would've had him set in light, one must do, for every dirty, nasty Jew, for they alone would wreathe and kill, would bastardize of what, whichever mind there is, whatever purity, would they, the fiend. Embodiment of consecration, I beg onto you that you throw these evil creatures into the pits of damnation, where they, of all, will eternally rot, and die and sealed with their father, Lucifer where they will die, forever and forever again, until no longer will they be allowed, again, to return to such Earthly realms, where they might steal, kill, and least of all. Eat our children and throw, aghast, upon their doings, but heart of child, and take his blood, the claim, as happens, and ever after, for evil only shatters. As it happens, much today, even to such likings, they still come and thread, upon viler lays. For they seek, of brothers to return, and bastardize the name of our mighty lord, and would but throw but all, and turn, from, mightily, as it is, our kind hearted lord, whom would, serve, suffice, and bless, as for all evil to be set to die. Upon his knee, no wonder, neither of them would come onto, now, as to beg forgiveness for all the evil, yet destruction they have left behind. Of such unkindness none may know, the Holocaust, a lie, and turned from your, all those who would continue such, plow and plot, mightily given, for bastardizing truth, and much to it misgiven would they have such, wretch, and steal from the pockets of your servants, when mightily they are lead. They, of all, are naught to be allowed to run, of such holy as there is, but ground. Upon Nazaretean soil, they toiled, sold, stole from and kill upon. I ask of you, my dear friend, will you consider, our Christ in a land that's being wretched, drenched and spoiled upon, by such a toil, as their grabby little filthy hands.

These wretched kikes that but butcher things and have their way with them instead, of turning back onto Christ again, before they're thrown and burnt for the sins, in their blood as well, as there shall be no way, none other to return, to such blessed days of worship, when the life, of the very earth might come and stumble yet again, and flourish as one would have it after, again and there on out again.'

And another man from the crowd said:

'Butcher these sub-human animals, let us wring their likes, I shall stop at nothing until I will have killed all of these disgusting kikes.

With their wretchedness, these mongrels, whom are spread, and whom had come to throw the entire world into such chaos as none would have it, either now or ever again. We need, to try and mightily cast again, each and every single one of them, in the might fire from the barren pits of fire they've been born in, that their wretched bones might shattered after, guts of which spoils are dry. That we may never suffer, such bastardization as to hear our children's dire, breathing, stopped.

Thus, I have come onto a single way, that we may find a simple resolution, that it may simply be made, and there on out again, we shall not suffer their likes, to mix or breathe upon our veins, upon our necks, as they're prepared to stab.

We butcher them, we butcher them all, to every single last one alive, to every single one that's breathes, we kill and slaughter every living one until.

Our lord is but avenged.

The suffering of our kind but ends. Only then, and only then there, might be gone, such suffering as they would have us go through, beaten and bastardized.'

With which there came a sentence from the Judge, whom sharpened his nails upon the pallor, and brought onto his brow, such collar, as one could see the likes of a single, breathing, taken but apart, claimed upon but left behind, icon. They had ruined in their path. They thought they could get away, but none would forget where a kikes' true allegiance lay.

Eighteen wretched monks would've seen it most perilous as to have them go yonder, and left alone to their wont and anger, as would they have after, bring forth, such as would be all distraught, destruction, would have yet consumed, unless, one could've seen it true.

'But lo, these are not holy men, they of all, were come and brought along way, and were, as to be brought, akin and join our ranks as would they had seen, as such, and even-brought thither and there, they are their servants.

But have joined our ranks, and there, see them for what they are, of such soullessness as can be brought upon his face, as to besmirch and as to bastardize beyond relief and plenty wonder, and true to all, that does come after, is but burning hell for all of those whom mighty, as he is, oppose.'

Somewhere in Holdretch

The wretched concubine that entered my room had, a big kebab for a head, with a few hundred heads attached, all of them bearing elongated tongues that came in and out, reeling without a single shroud of shame, these hussies. All of them, out of their guts spat out, nastier pussies-looking pretties, they were, without limbs. Other women that were so beautiful, pretty, pretty they were. And hair as well, their bushies were. Of course I was to, of course I had to, well. I had to, personally. Oh, but you know. A ladder was in the room, one that reached the ceiling, I've seen in, through. That I gave little kisses to every bush that spread, all over their nasty faces, as well, as, you know me, everywhere else. They hanged like ever puffier bags, the heads were giant, I want to be eaten by one now. And they open, I can live in one, not the heads either, but everything else. Stall houses where I can live all day, all merrily and gay. But not the faggotry they teach nowadays, but happily ever after, inside a woman who'd convey, whatever emotion I'd feed into her, so many of them, so busy, and pretty.

Every womansack, had that beam-stalk coming out her forehead, the tongue. And the heads upon the pillar? All of them choked. On me as well as on their hairy chodes. Every concubine of the lot was divine. And every single one of them lived in a room with red carpets, filled with depictions of a dark sun. To the right of the room, pillars blocking eighteen yellow-puckery plates. The journey never ends.

Ah, here comes the king, I see. Whatever it be. Every single man inside the room bows down, and see:

'As thus, I have finally come and finally have I arrived, in this reverie, as sullenly, as I am. Descended of the dead, processor of Liehlyion!'

'Who are you?'

'I am the Moldernjhehryuinthebar, of Klohke.'

He was dressed all in red, with white strange x-crossed diamond that had red gems split in half but shattered on command and restored, with the color as well, drawn, therefore. He bore, spread-shafts of puffy ivory-rose. Velvety as well; royal, with slashes of pigmented fellows, those being depictions of men that crowned him, before he rose, golden, but rotten to the core.

Him, like everyone else, whose clothes were no exception, all sullen and forged, by one who's fires only destroyed. Embroidered with cones of rotten-beans: But he bore a mighty scepter, with a rosen, pallid, graven blade, on top of which, a nasty head, he pointed at all of us.

'Mielord, does not want your voices heard until he's called the faden-servitor.'

Of whose tallness was open-end, there instead, a break to the ceiling as well; it entered.

Every concubine knelt, as much as they drew by both sides, some hiding behind the pillars, which were much grander than them all. Colossal thing, he were; ankles cages and brown-powdery, chained by bed. It carried it and mostly, that's the main thing that could be seen. It was as if he came out of it. Embroidered by metal, made to be it; chained by every limb, headless, but ill. Like a kidnapped woman's fine legs in the front, with at-whale thrown spears and mighty leered upon, rottenly blinds – curtains faded its tow; no one wanted to look at it, out of fear. Then, dear:

Shilhyio asked:

'Who are you, colossal Faden one?'

But it drew along, a tail or two legs, hardly did it matter, all pieces of its born, torn apart and sunder.

It spoke in the voices of beaten in the head children, through a filter of voices, drawn. Too much attention now, it spoke, like a man now.

But highly mechanical:

'I presume you are the master of this house, no?'

'I used to live in a house like this once, but no. I would think not.'

'Will you welcome me in, Moldernjhehryuinthebar, to join your inner circle?'

The eerie voice continued. It was that of a man, behind a bad microphone. An old man as well and everyone knows that a lot of them.

Goblin-mongrel head on cut:

'You're not to be allowed yet. No, I'm thinking, not until our god of filth is given such command. He's yet to mask himself and hide away, in the body of. Yes, Agrippa, a human man, he's to be made great use of, in the days to come; I think, indeed, there's something there to be had.'

'How do you know?'

'Who asked you Shilhyio? Or your opinion either?'

‘No one, why? What’s wrong with you?’

‘What’s wrong with me?’

‘Yes, what is wrong with you.’

‘Have you looked around you for a moment now?’

‘I have, I, where’s my ladder?’

They were both stubborn, and the ‘king’ was already confused as to what was going on between them. What to do as such and what would he do, if there was even a chance to, even do something about it.

Moldernjhehryuinthebar, Hyundibar.

Handbar, stared at the thing, he was ill now, mad, fumigatingly rotten by, time as a child would throw a tantrum so did he. Not the best time to be around.

‘Well since my left hand.’

His royal suit was already filled with spears, since the rubies were wide-spread and moved, yet avoided touching the golden embroidery. It only happened when his scepter got man.

‘Listen, Shill. Damn it.

Listen Shill, I, need you to, com here for a moment.’

‘My actual name is Shell.’

‘Fine, Shell, draw forth.’

He joined his inner circle which was more of an inner triangle because that’s how the hall was shaped, that plus a rectangle, to his left, the pillars. To his front, that eerily dark thing, shaking; which, now, as it continued its strange electric-speech, had managed to utterly frighten every single one of the concubines inside the room; both men, Moldernjhehryuinthebar and Shell were still, small, tiny compared to them.

The throne was pebble, but not.

Sitting down.

‘Sit.’

Shell was on his arse.

A disturbing cold, a swept-in dust, at their feet, but lust had scattered as much.

Elsewhere in town:

Down and beyond a river in trance:

An open door would have it gone, within the hour. The drunk had no power over the men, but then again, there were four of them, standing. Looking at him from most obscure a side; readying themselves to ask:

‘Who are you, old man, big aloof of powder snout, as you raise your arm, you ask again, when time will come for us to leave? When piece by piece we seek, as this, nature of yours is brought, when you are come about to age of done, whence you shall lose whatever piece of shard, as for your broken armor stands to fall. For when it does, your body, and your blood, what shall have you of them? Such grimace as there is the night, in which your poison, of such draught, might come to coil and fade away. When you shall lay, no bitter say are you to be allowed. No retort, for, by the time we are done.

You, old man are not to survive.’

‘By what claim would whichever one of you will claim my life, when I alone would not have myself be taken by the eye?’

‘We don’t have is Sokolarks, lyet-lyet draws near, he will eat you, they will take you apart afterwards, in warts covered, swollen and made to do, faster than you should. In a land as obscure as the catalogue of Blyeithi says. Of greater houses, all but lain, inside their dug-outs; the pits and the falls, in which hundreds of men akin to you are waiting, but only their heads are theirs.’

‘And tell him, of, the rest of them.’

‘You do not want to know this, Sokolarks, but, they say there’s only one true head. The rest of them, of what might be said.’

‘Let him figure it out by the hour, you don’t raise the bailiff, you don’t pay heed to our warning and wave your guard and let us inside, where we may have a drink, and stall. You end up there.’

In the lands of unawares, where they might rot away with the warmongers of bloated puffs, with the bodies, but the market-brought. A few little men with knives, some maidens of torches of which device; chest-collar, with a weird socketed-arm, flicking the torch at their faces, then off; for some reason everyone was watching, then, from one of the black-coated raised, many man-feet held towers, a few openings emerged. They were high-peaks with mighty face, which opened and a few servants came, out of their way to look down at the happening, commotion. In no direction, none certain could they look. And find out.

But the sun, then again, one of them, the one they were staring ate, way too many limbs, riddled with, plants were they not, pizza-sliced mold filled flowery shapes that dangled, all around space. There was also a weird being that was spinning around them, a giant satellite that was visible to all. Like an eagle racing-charging in one direction without talons, staring down, with only one wing that slowly molded in a battering ram but with a single giant engrossed lump coming out of it, directly parallel to the eagle like thing. And this was only from the side. The short, thinner side of the ram, or its squashed head was an arm, as was the other, much wider one. The eagle, vulture, or ‘feathery’ counterpart, one deformed hooked leg, while the other was thin, as well, as it but stood widely extended; the lump a dead, a darker head that was but lordly projected out of the lump when see, from the other side, of it. The lump was a throat, this thing but like a blade but covered in melting yolk. With the hilt two side-glancing eyes; and from this open bladed, melted by the side, mouth, it was riddled with teeth, shaped like pseudo-feet.

It charged and shot large rays of power, glowing with pus-white-blue-then-red-then exploded as well, in that sun.

Its celestial companion was a coiled piled sack of many put together interconnected limbs that almost gave the impression of a snake but wasn't. Many fingers and many appendages there, but the creature only lived in this livid-house. Its insect-like almost black-plague doctor mask, that bore several bulbs of yellow bore, a giant, still connected to the pile, 'pointy-hat' made out of a greater limbs, with slimy smiles carved in, and a machine-wing that wasn't functional.

His servants were leashed by metal spiked bands, wrapped around their bodies. Bird-cages ribbed-plastered on top of them corpses, inflated with meat inside of them, harp-bodied stump-filled, as for their four limbs, but no head; although they did have giant canon-like lodged in greater honey-shots inside of them, lumped and plunged-lodged inside of them like swords, that never made it on the other side. The leashed-bands rested above them. Their sludgy legs were pumping, beating, thoroughly like hearts.

And their greatest enemy was Ilneoyc.

A blob-fished headed humanoid like hybrid-zombie with vortex-melted in, depressed third-degree black burns, that looked like eyes of the storm with putrid black iron-burnt in alloy, as were its socketless eyes. That had a great dart-organ lodged on one side, pumping in like a bee being lodged in. The other side, half a knife-like thing, pumping as well; his body was framed like an old camera-like device, with two side-mechanical, pseudo-futuristically shaped gun-handles. As if you could cut one wing and it would look like compact squared gun, while the wing looked like a gun-cartridge, but convex; which bore two, elongated almost Gatling guns, or large, giant barrels, that were fattier at their ends, like inflated wrists which carried flaccidly resting mantis-blade positioned, down, crab-pincers, but mechanical. He was like a blob-fish man riding a train, in space.

He opened every few seconds, or a door standing directly proportional to him, underneath, out of which came huge headed, making their bodies, small bulb-cylindrical but anatomically- like an ice-cream cone, whose cream was molded to a forward pointing panel, in which its face drew forth into a pseudo man-arm connected to a bed-sheet mattress bone-like cartilage with spikes adorning both sides. This being a metallic framed platform where everything was segmented with iron-crossed checker board, squares, every single one of them bearing, risible tombs. Dead-people lived in there.

In town, near one of the fountains.

Lower streets:

Four bridge-cisterns upon which they walked, all rolling but dragged along.

'My legs are wasted again, friend, I cannot grow them forever!'

'Nonsense, of course you can.'

'I won't wait here forever, being taken apart.'

'Then leave.'

I can't.'

'Come on Josephine, you know you can do it, I so thoroughly believe in you with all my berated fool beating organ-heart!'

'You are a foul man, it's what you are!'

A melancholiously sullen bird drew along from one side, of the upper-roofed, lower, molded inside, the men of bricks that served as the sign for the House of Ringed Stators, suddenly struck by a most morbid draught. For the maiden Josephine was crying, all along the side of barrels caught, naught in arms, but held above, spun by slavers' hands of love. Of such distraught benign, as for the reason they would have her suffer, longer while. Until a bastardly lord might emerge and might catch, her beautiful dress from the pile that was dragged behind. Yet every dress was made out of a pet. Many of them solemnly butchered instead. Was that the sound, I hear before, when must, I come, when nearing their dance? When in need to, as to remember yet myself, there's none. Not that would they offer to drag her out.

'They're all subservient to me and If I will it, tomorrow, here I'll see.'

'But what must I do in order to take myself away from this discord, from this concord of empty wails that had put me through such suffering as might, I add, no matter, pray?'

'Nay, maiden, for neither the gods might suffer such return, and I shall have none mourn your for no turn, I've sworn, that I would have you here and I shall have you near, until my heart, with bleeding, yet such drear as might be my, wail, as there's command. To have suffered none, and none other, who might come upon me, yet I stop and suffer, thinking, wonder, who shall come after?

If I will them now?'

And a day passed, from the looks of which, a leg would appear, to have twitched and pitched of lordly was there a manner in which they might listen after, the Goliaths with four bulk-heads. All of them bearing large appendages, men, out of their mouth with bubbles that were violent-spiked, out of which came long-wheat eyes. And each eye spoke to her:

Berateful, they didn't.

Instead they started pounding her in place, splattering her apart, only to see the reigns of the curse emerge, and make itself known to her; as she would be remade again. Out of which, lost in pain; one of them pulled out a mighty spell, bowels-of-power which came in shots, eight-six-five-five-and-four spherical variously geometrical but made of magic-lots, which trailed one another and splattered her after.

Wilt her as such, they had her, the bunch, as they spent incessant hours butchering the broad, like a bunch of dire-in-need-of-heat animals incapable of such retreat, came the cold.

By now, a few seasons passed, but during wretched as there was a night, candle light come from below. Like bells ever going and threading along as one ought to, rather know.

'Wilt you be taken away by wish?'

'I seek no such company, from such a beast!'

‘Ah, wretched maiden, but you insult me, have you now not considered, by then, as such, months, has passed, that help might be sekt, and better yet, than dead, will you not have me but come instead?’

‘I’d rather be alone, abandoned.’

‘So be it, then I take my leave.’

The man looked for nothing more, nor company.

Lleyske Yyil

‘The ground it pitty, pitied up against us.’

A large stretch of wild concaves, they were singing as they approached, slowly threading along, as if they couldn’t make either, or, from so much more of what was there, drawn by couch-like machines, with eely-twisted wheels, they sang.

‘And drag along and drag along, let us just forget ourselves, if only for a little while.’

Where to walk? They all wondered and they could’ve stopped, at any time for such, were they, and wild directions, either way they would themselves staring, at a single puddle covered moist, sprung from one of the petty cones, standing merely, flaccidly in awe.

And awry, it stood before them, ever drawing, out of breath, a fish on both shoulders, splashed and better yet, they spoke for him, of largely stopped. Man of woe whom dragged himself upon the middle of the road, he spoke:

‘Will there be a chance for me to lay upon the middle of the cut? And be brought upon you, that. Might I be taken home in land, beyond the lesser wonder, that I may be of closer, lost long stature?’

‘To whom are you to speak?’

Intertwined Lkher, whom had already approached, with a slithery peeled off thing, he almost came close to wring his throat in half a boat, from which the blood sails would rip, and torn away, and fall upon his feet and wager:

‘There on after, here, stranger, you’ll find naught and you will find just as much in whichever direction you look towards, regardless if you were to join us and ride, in the distance, when, upon petty cry. Make it forth towards the thorns, and live inside one for a world that’s unknown for the ones that grow from the most bothersome depths, he will take you to his home and do as he pleases from there on.’

‘But what if this, what you have claimed, to me as well, as it might be, but a petty lie? How could I trust you, scoundrel who would but have none other follow me after, whatever might be said, as, lie?’

There was as little left as there was as much done, follow-through. A ghastly moving castle was breathe upon the land, pursed through the lips of Ikh the giant whose Itchil-core of heads were wrought, all but drawing up, apart. But one of them, whose sockets, carefully as they've been brought, started drawing out instead, with many flying, wing-spun legs. Many of them as incapable of noise as they had been before, but they were already forgotten for the sounds of a brought in, four; greater viler, red-imbued, like specters walking, in sinew, of dark-machines, in souls uncanny. Of what was brought after, the lesser and the ones, as tawny-metal, greaves were put. Many of which but lesser-yet as true, would come to no apparent use.

Eight of them possessed a child. A giant one, a bare-breasted, ridden with cartilage, a darkly wrought, obscure knight, whose lesser scrawls appeared so, they were in the air, following him before he would but throw, of need, and much to his mind, it served as no reminder. For what came before him and what came rightfully after.

For the man on the streets, whom had been banished, of his road-plan abandoned, had he found himself in much nearer encampment that had lain wherever he looked. It was displeasing at least, and much more so, incapable of ringing true. That he had found himself in, or during, which, a vision of a town, it was here and there, disappeared, then came back, returned, during a time not a single soul understood what was to it, before it was come under his wilder thing, and, as such at unawares.

Aware of what was going there, at least. It was as little as could come to bold, and fist, were there naught, and were they brought much closer to him than that, the specters spoke:

To much provoke:

‘There, here on out and look, at such wonder as we will have proceeded to bring forth, from the distance, and much more distant as there are horizons, the flying castle we shall cast upon all, in which, may lay, the many souls we cast away, until it splits.’

At which command, he showed him such, and there they were at last. Two castles, brokenly split, much more to themselves, pleasantly ripped. From both sides but standing many, of lesser as there were, spires and towers, petty. All of the souls that resided in, most sonorous but it served no beast to listen to either one. But then again:

‘We could take your life if we will but that shall serve no one if any at all, for your are indeed too young to matter after, to make a difference or to come after. I shall bring upon you something more, indeed, something that shall call upon you, to bring me forth, upon your place of solace where you hide.’

‘What will that be?’

‘A piece of the giant heart-room you live in.’

A deepened sight followed as well.

Broken by the reeds, there stood, as simple as he was, and lopsided yet in truth he trusted, off the country he had landed, the few people whom were with him alike. They were afraid of leaving him alone. It was dangerous standing in a land filled with puffy snow.

‘It’s fallen of the roofs belonging to the Lichens of Ourroko, most of which hide on a whim, they get pitted against one another down there for reasons neither of you will understand.’

‘Care to explain to us then?’

‘Bastardly, you will be made aware!’

As an offering he only drew them closer to them. By now they claimed whatever was left of the rooms and of the lower areas. Claimed by force; that could be seen there; as some of them had immediately displayed an aversion that found its way in, as opposed to what other circumstances would’ve allowed for. The chamberlains would’ve dropped, the cleaning maidens, even if brought could not deal with what had happened there, an exotic show of rugs and plain carpets, of bookshelves and broken dances, of plates riddled with shards and dust, and leftovers of men, whom bore armor and used to look, for every single thing fought for, being unlaidd.

And the things responsible for it were fat, obese abomination-slugs, of hardened chitinous insectoid covers, lain outside was there a most peculiar exoskeleton that replicated a marine’s chest armor, though the chitin ensured there wouldn’t be any resemblance whatsoever once fully grown. Its tail was but many teeth united, at the opposite end, no head but a large eggplant thick horn of many shards, grown, like tumorous barbarous. Many of these horns held tomb-like formations with head-peaked carved in gargoyle figures, with the mannequin-segmented bodies of men attached to these giant faces; like the strands of a beard.

Three mighty beings hid inside. Whose bodies were magician sawcut-coffins, wildly attached, whose heads were dolphin shaped craniums with lumps at the back, but blob-fish like, filled with many branch forms, elongated spikes, and more than enough deformed wild growths as to fill a forest with. Two giant eyes pushed out but they were empty socketed and had faceless man faces, shaped buds that rotated while attempted speaking as if their mouths were sutured in. Its wildly-disturbing to look at dolphin-cranium bore the giant smile of a giant human, but, as it opened it revealed a giant fat-sharp appendage like the sting of a wasp, that wriggled in and out, back into its hiding. All three of them were dressed in long-fifteen feet high curtains, drenched in blood.

And every slug-bodied creature had them, each three-alike.

A patch of verdant

Four men gathered around, all wearing their axes backwards, aimed at their ugly pointed heads, with spiked-chains and large nails, they stopped just in time before they could all end themselves before even stumbling at the stump.

‘Wait a minute, you sure this is where we’re supposed to be?’

‘Is this not the stump?’

‘Of course it is, but what you wager is in it?’

‘I don’t know, there’s only one way to find out, right? Rip it open already?’

‘Wait, fellows, how about, we don’t aim those things at ourselves for one moment, what do you say?’

‘Aye, shut your filthy mouth already, I say we look what’s in it.’

‘What do you think there is?’

‘Rip it open already, I want to munch off its blocky peels, and fill my teeth with sparks of wooden thorns and little pigs of wooden boards.’

‘Calm down, you’re going to scare it, look, it’s shaking.’

By their sides, the wind was already drenching part of the house dens. Rummaging through one of the tree-barren spoils, and spools of cradles, and of barrels donned on them before any chance could be taken home. The house of a warped skull, whose sockets as window-blinds were glowing figures strung, from its nose but giant bubbles shaped like trunks, but still, a wood’s a wood. They could chop it, they would. But the stump shook even the smartest of them, it riddled them. How it stood and what was inside.

It pulsed with boil red, acid-tar in place. A transparent thing that made smoke come out of itself.

‘I think it’s about to explode, step away!’

At first sight they simply started running away, trying to hide themselves behind any if all, at all, could they reach; whether it was a barrel or a passing choir of duckling and ducks. And rummaging about, a sparrow with eighteen hundred piled on a small tower it made out of its own stacked-upon one another ocular device, that reached the sky, and saw through clouds, hardly able to open its beak because the weight pushed down. Remarkably feathery light, with everything else concluded.

‘It’s not doing anything other than pumping in there.’

‘Grab a hold of this, you pathetic churners!’

At the call of which they chucked a few stones at it. One of them bounced back, it didn’t even harm the thing which only danced in place, it had. It had, made a giant mushroom-squared tank-livid device, but without the canon-piece. A submarine visor came out of its head, drawing onward, from which out drew the second visor, having formed a small block of spores holding it together. Out came a vent with rotating black swirls inside of it that spat, and they were wide and big even in relation to it, fully stretched to their connected to them –arm span, fist, connected to an arm, which bore a long wooden-like handle that pointed at the ground, connected to the forearm, at the end of which a sharp sword came out of, pointing at the sky. The sword was straight, the handle concave, the arm might’ve been standing, as the handle, flaccidly on the ground. But they were flying towards them, and before they knew it, they started throwing ducks at them, only to see them spliced in halves and made to fall, both apart and wherever they could land in. Whichever way they could follow through and fatherly after:

‘You’re slaughtering innocents.’

‘A duck killed my mother.’

‘Blasphemous, how dare you lie to us?’

‘We stand to die, cut and chopped, and punched as well, when they are done, do you seriously think I would consider the lives of a few ducklings? Will I seriously take them or their lives into account?’

‘I don’t know.’

A giant half-a blimp, house-body whose front end looked like a cruiser wreckage, out of which a giant round-insect compounded black eye came out of, whose only two thumper-forcing legs were two cowed figures whose heads were attached to the beast, that was also pseudo- ‘scaled’, bore, inside of it, a socketless skull with a squared-iron frame wrapped and connected to it which produced weird lasso motions of some peculiar quantum matter, out of the oozing protrudence of which, weirdly melting wormish one-horned shadowy lyimless came into existence only to be sacrificed during the process of being pulled from their dimensions. Throat spikes were wished inside their bleak-hearts, which in turn, out of this deadly exchange, turned one piece of the sky at a time into a window-blind, drawn behind, as it opened into space.

Out of space came flying in, weird humanoid skulls with rhinoceros horns, whose lower jaws were missing but carved in the giant crystals they appeared to be lodged inside of. Weirdly flying hammer-headed chopped thumb-cartilage pink-skinned slimes with a trailed by the sides of a serial killer victim’s mouth cuts’ shaped mouth, extremely open-wided, with black-bent-straw teeth, and a single puckery eye-protrusion that looked like a globular parasite inside a snail’s eye, -eye, kind of creatures appeared to rotate around them. They looked wickedly sick, falling apart, infested, by some plague, stuck in a never ending cackling-mouth position, their Cyclops eye crimson filled with moisture and desperation. Only caused, in no time for them to grow spic-wings, that were overly grown to an extreme grass roots that almost looked like blood sprouting out of their sides out of being stabbed with a knife. But each of them only bore a single ‘wing’, although not wings, more like a torn-apart scattered broom of long-dark needles pulsating with clot. They didn’t flap their wings, which were static, they were unaffected by anything and merely flew, or were, floating through gravity itself. Nine or so around a crystal skull; although one of these satellite creatures bore a skin tag beneath it, that was as thick as a man’s toe.

But it was alright, for one of the Gods had blessed the four men.

That being the Patron Saint Bjalba, who is a strange stove-forge-pot- bodied, with long pillar spikes coming out of it, arms that look like spade- scimitars elongatedly curved cones with dark face features spread around them, a lower body made out of a dark gust of slime-gas-smoke constantly being released, as if inside his body a genie was trapped. Whereas its head is only a half, a left pointing axe-surface diamond puzzle piece mold with a mattress spring device-like mouth filled with not only many protrusions but many crab-like clawing apart, extending, clickers that came in the hundreds. A single eye and nothing other, which was perfectly flat; its throat was the same smoke-thing as well, the gas.

Its star-children were giant domed-nautilus fortune cookie headed, or two welded but more compact straw hats with botfly parasitical tendon filled, caterpillar like bodies, that were animated by the same gas their father had blessed them with. Their one eye was less flatter, whereas their mouths were many barb-wired circles that overlapped one another, while twisting, turning in the same way a vortex would. Also a huge cancerous gangrene parasite shaped like a thin-anorexic pepper with harpoon shot mechanically lodged inside the other side of their star-child weird helmet stingers attached to their bodies. Both of theirs; and every star-child was infested. And every single one of them was dead. But their painted eye was, eternally youthful, filled with glee.

‘We need to retreat immediately, to wherever the wind might take us towards, whereas they might look in our direction and what to tell of us when we thread along, and much, much farther, where they shall be less inclined to find us, brother Warrad, call upon the mares, let them come, and draw forth that we may find a way out of this pit of despair.’

‘If you say so, I feel as if we cannot leave, still, I think you’re right. They could most bastardly butcher us like animals if we so allowed them the lease. To carry on with, I am rather afraid of what that might mean for either one of us.’

‘Then let it be so, I think there’s yet something in either, or farther or closer, the sink inside the ground that might take us to leave.’

‘Dreary are the legs of each baton-tree that comes to live, but lo, look.’

They’ve eaten their mares, the beasts, women; taller, haughtier, hardened, as they were chewing these majestic creatures up, like the leprous females they were, one strand at a time.

‘Savage beasts!’

‘They killed our horses, what are we to do?’

‘I know what they did you mongrel-brain, I can see it for myself, nasty witches. I would have them burnt, but we have no time, we must retreat to one of the standing houses before they’re taken from us!’

Towards which they drew. A giant crater that was made out of two put together parasites, standing side by side, being deformed hamster-worms with flat sides. Their flat sides being them, as well, two dimensional flat-walls that bore side-depictions on every side of the wall, rounded up but connected as if they were on all eight sides of their combined bodies, which were only separated by a single door that cut through both of them. In total eight eyes, eight mouths and many bumpy things on every side; including the thinner walls, which were the same right sided hamster-like rodent with worm-like gusher teeth coming out its mouth. It was like an inner living wagon being in.

And a few bandits were waiting for them inside. As soon as they entered, all four of them men realized that twenty arrows had already planted themselves inside their guts, just about in every visible spot, wherever they could be or be put inside of, they simply could not control themselves, falling apart, their body parts started wriggling in the air.

Shork had a few arrows sticking out which went all the way through the backside of his head. He opened his mouth only to spit out a few pieces of silver-tipped arrow heads and boxes. He spat boxes, his head grew a lot, like a balloon, as well as his throat and got, which forced him to spit blood-boxes, with arrows inside of them.

‘What’s wrong with you Shork?’

‘I am bleeding profusely, I think I’ve given birth to arrows.’

‘That’s horrible, you could lose an eye that way, or a gut.’

Luckily for him, he had a Satan shaped blade on him. The father of lies imbued his strength, the morning star began glowing red. It was time for him to attack.

The create was under extreme stress as the many foes beyond it began attacking in a most desperate manner, in a hardened attempt to get rid of all that surrounded the place of the reckoning, the splitting of the trunk.

Lies created swords unseen that did not exist, but did. Harmless to everyone else but the user, who was the only one hurt at the end:

‘There’s a falchion, somewhere, in this house. I know it, because I’ve seen this house, I’ve been here before, during one of my most lucid nightmares when I became one of the first killed men in the dreams of nether-taking blood-drawing, gelatin-kings with their pointy hats and their wild cone-teeth that drew form their many curved like elephant trunk siren-skeleton bodies. But only their heads were made out of gelatins as they bore no skulls.

They each bore one dark sword made out of space-smoke that had tiny veils universes in them, as well as eye-stars with strange giant worms that had spiked-like porcupine fingers at each one of their ends. Whereas their other arms bore strange giant two garbage trash bags put together formations with a harp lodged at one end, that bore one great scythe-sword scorpion tail beaded mold, one curved tip and one popping out of it as well, whereas each scorpion-bead bore blade-like protrusions coming out of them on both sides, that kept puffing in and out, whereas, on the other side, a conical –drill drew out as well.

Yeah, they came in here during one night and hid a falchion somewhere, planting in an object, so they could slowly partake into the theft of light.’

‘There’s something wrong but I cannot wrap my hand around it.’

‘For what reason might that be, for I’ve seen naught wrong with your face now.’

‘It’s not necessarily my hand or my arm, but the demons that are inside every man and who hide inside every insidious skeleton there is out there, threatening to leap from one side to the other, incapable of fashioning anything even remotely plain, for they fear what beauty might be brought from the most obscure of dames that venture into town.

They who would bastardize the ladies and whom would fashion them out of much falser idols, I’ve seen them persecuted by the dark spirits of splintering woes. They have whispered in my ear knowledge such as which, my wit has yet to decipher. Yet I know that those demons had blessed my blade with the likes of Lucifer, for they had feared what might come after me if I had waited for too long.

I am brought here, onto you, great master, the Stump. I know you’re out there still oozing into the world, of whose presence and sentience and power is well beyond that of likened common men, but I fear nonetheless that our paths could somehow become even more convoluted than I could ever expect them to become. I fear, as I have stayed my hand again for what might happen to my kind, and those alike, my descendants if you're left uncut.

For that I can only promise this, once we leave this unfathomably house we're trapped in, once we've left the premise of the twins, we shall seek only a most supreme fashioned and heistened, as in robbed, retribution that might've been aimed at us, but has not.'

With which, he vowed like every petty man out there to destroy in, incapable of seeing through the walls, part of the world especially the one beneath it, beneath that point had been completely broken down and left to rot. Like a spoiled apple that's fallen apart, under his command, by his toes alike, alarmingly so, destroyed and distraught. It ate away, and would've done with, as for, aforementioned, darkened was the day, they slept through.

But darker dreams had followed all of them, incapable of fully drawing out of the sinew of the globular Mars they stepped upon. Although they were in the world, many of them but bridged by the bones of giants that had been, no longer standing home, they waited; wailing whale like things but echoing upon one another's reminiscence of dark commands, but neither of them could understand why any of it happened, nor would they be capable of doing as such.

'There's a yonder snow-drift, I think there's call for winter come. And it'd be brought before us by the call of wolves and dog-mutants that come to life, whenever pleased, by such and come to pass. Whenever you may come upon us, sing of retribution, bastardly is the home of those around us when they'll come upon us. Knowingly, we have honed only the worst things we could stumble upon. We have brought the cadavers in our homes and slept with them.

Behold the race!'

Oh, what bitterly-woe, as there was such, madly endowed disgrace no less likely, would it have appeased no apparent dead gull that came upon shatteringly mad command, as to listen to them, who were brought upon a desperately depressed, not court, but a land made of sinking planets. But in what were they sinking? If not the most obtusely disgusting looking wail-mix of pale pools, all put together as if sutured by most disgustingly set gelatin, from the eruption of which their erudite minds could not help themselves but be forced bent over as to listen to the cones that came apart. Right as they came into life as well, as would've happened, and might've done, for them. The calls and likes of Nak, whichever man looked, could not remember, nor tell, what had happened during such allusion. Madly wrought and cowardly destitution as it were, as such:

'A servant, I am a servant, his alone and I have come to say one and only one thing alone that might happen to be jotted down, whenever I am, as to come from the depths of allusion, the lords of mightily dark illusions have sunken in the most deprave basins.

They have bastardized the world I've come from and I draw in. Breathe might be forgotten for now, but at least, now that's the time, when drawn and sutured upon the following clocks, I see that you are yet in wonder. I seek to ask as such of you, will you follow that which is true and make it seem as if I am forgotten when I am not?'

'What are you talking about, madly wrought Servant of Nak?'

‘Forget me for a moment, that I beg, and if you do, if you are to call upon the most bastardly way there is, I shall call you as such, upon a blessed agony, to watch upon the birth of a caller of dead birds, they’re filled with flagrant glaring birds.’

He knew much, and they all nodded, they all listened to him as if he were a brothel-brother to all of them who didn’t know much if anything about the world, wouldn’t it had mattered? If he did, if he tried, if he called upon a worthless cove, he knew just enough.

It was all that mattered, that and the fact that he was extremely disgusting looking, even the worst of creatures, even those afflicted by the maddest, most disturbing to look at plagues didn’t look as he had. He had been bombarded by growths that sabotaged even the likes of warts. Like a giant brain lobe with a single tubular tulip body of many smallish legs in drew up-front, towards them, levitating as if made out of metal and pulled towards magnets that couldn’t fashion or jerk themselves into place, nor would it make any difference to call what it was. A giant bovine leg came out from a piece of the lobe-lump, jerking eerily as it drew towards them. It twisted and turned. On the other side, he hid inside. Or would’ve done it, but this was the servant, and the lobe was only the growth to which it was attached. He had a giant helmeted head that looked like a pseudo-skull-capped mask, with round googly visors, with teeth that were small plates which were almost drawn on top the mask, put on top the giant sack-body that was attached, on a side, as if the slit, the spill was elongatedly connected to the piece. The device, the giant fridge coffin with its many dog-call-gizmos, the whistling and the grabbable appendages of brass and of iron; it had a pair of legs but those were overly grown horns. Regardless of it, one thing about the lobe, it was depressed, on the other-side but not the tulip-body like cylinder-flaccid thing, that was, surprisingly normal, unaffected. But he, the servant, was actively being, as well as every other gizmo and device, depressed-buried into it. Making it even more depressing to look at it for more than a few various reasons, that, more or less were unrelated to the message it appeared to bear. It wanted to waste away. It carried something inside that fridge-like unit. Niggers, most likely, niggers were hiding inside, niggers with strange geometrical trap-heads, which had been beatenly carved in. One could not, not, think of niggers as being in anything else and anything other than an unfavorable light, as they were wretched and evil, vile, they stomped on people’s heads and deserved to have their legs chopped off; although it was late for that, since these niggers were actively crippled beyond saving, since their heads and cognition devices had been destroyed. And the nations were at war, one could also not forget that, since morality was abandoned, their in-blood bred nigger-stomping habits were not to be erased any longer, unfortunately so. With the wretched advent of a distortedly sickened world, there was naught to be looked after any longer.

The others would not even endear the thought of something as awful as it was, the shells that were speared like ears, crackled in the distance by shattering hits of thunder gotten through by most desperate of heaves could not, even then be properly ignored any longer. As this lucid malady could not go for long and the incessant dream of these four, ancient, sleeping men who could not have been left in a more confused state than they had been, finally awakened during the disquiet, being only, forced as to be even more confused than they were before. Since the world outside was beyond recognizable. It was a somewhat less legible thing outside, a queerly wrought imitation of its former shell whose fall from grace made it ill-shaped, malformed. Darkened in color, with twists left behind as if wristed boils had yet completed rippled of fit-together molded oozing bacterium-elongations. Everything being put together as to form a disgustingly, hard-to-look at puzzle not even the sanest man could look at, there.

‘It appears as if during our absence, as we basked into an elicited sleep out of which, with vile regard to anything else, we’ve yet to find ourselves free of its reaches, its malignant stretches as well as the spread of the many put together filaments that threaten to destroy us.’

‘Not yet, not still. For as long as I bear this thing on me.’

But lo, his blade had been wished away, whisked by a few dark felines that had crawled underneath some secret passages that were filled with little siphoned blocky quays. Many of them had almost flailed as they fell on top their backs.

He wilt it still, but no response would be yielded thus.

‘It’s rather clear there’s a stove right there, buried underneath them, still, they’ve claimed the side.’

And many growths appeared to have, as such amassed.

‘They’re desperate as go through one of the broke sides. Through that which still wilts itself in place, I can still hear them again.’

The entire house not only shook itself in place but oozed.

‘It’s desperately trying to get through as if on tray.’

A platter of soiled dirt could convey just as much or less, it started boiling everything beneath it and above.

To readdress everything, a few meters off, it stood.

‘A much deranged animal, nothing in its path shook when it first approached.’

Partaking in the mold, of crooks they came after, yet again, nearing the stump, which had only pushed itself eagerly so, as to climb on top another piece brought, again into the view. A few harsher-buds but nearing them:

‘Greater cysted-many faced gorgon of many elongated heads.’

With each of the coil, bearing at their end, a giant pair of lump, but skull a water-tap protruding, and smaller pincer-mouth, downwardly pushing, it drew out, many twisted toothed clasps, that were but urchin of the sea a-like. It drew forward, yet was named.

‘Hullselv, out of which cells yet draw and bleed aside, you are called in action by the will of the stump.’

And yet alive, they called on it to see, as it wreathed and rested, in wretched pain and little more than broadly bore animosity.

A knapsack filled with little brine, they spoke of it as thus and there:

‘It’s still yet to move out its way.’

Dream of evil and confusion

Dead hours, some of them came before the first, come upon, drawn for, eighteen months, before Eighteen fifty seven hundred four, four times already, set, in which the deformed two volcanoes-mouths combined figures that shared their twisted humanoid-pillar twisted aligned teeth, tumor dancing gut-dancers with filthy-imploding mine-growths that bore the entire history of humanity, represented in billions of illustrations, contorted as to be cubical-cones formed as devouringly beating hearts trapped inside bubbles being their crown, pointing both downwardly and upwardly, while vibrating, seamlessly in such a peculiar manner that the destruction of the Hellish Realm of Kapfhus Krekhil Ongcho had already proceeded, having taken, took it, the head start, which was spent, already, devouring some of the dark bubbly cadaverous hours of time, many of which had thrust forward to the great dark masters of the world, whom, upon and during the subjugation of the dark-hourly amassed time of yonderly approach, a second Age having intervened in the already going devouring process of great mightily deformed concord-alacrity, mental sanguinity being the only proper derivation of the chiseled sculpted-wrong set bleeding figures whose mental consciousness have intruded upon the advance of the Realm, that being only, and having only served, for some reason as a fire-most platform on top of which it may thread upon, as to walk forwardly inclined, on the evil days, themselves, of Sabbathean Easter where, exactly one corpse arose, from one dead bubble of time, although, with a key difference, whose potency would define the very difference between an anatomical modern man and a normal one, could confine them into their prisons, for unknown rotten eternities, Meal Olno, second in line to the throne of Fyiekuv Beadyie, had already thrust forth, advancing through them, only to propel himself towards a dark sight, of bloodied, as he had ruined it by blood contorting the sinew of corpses-wrought in painless quiets, where he had found his nest kingdom Hog-Uas, the Oratory of broken blood-time pieces of scum-wrought flying cadavers, where he lived upon the brow of his dark castle, near the shores, on top the sea, as if frozen, on top of it, of Wuel; upon the nearing glassy sounds of long-forgotten frog-like fog wails. It entered the premise, their house being dislodged from where they rested, initially trying for one of the fallen-through windows a few of the fallen kids smashed through during the earlier evening. An irrational thought occurred to the men, standing up-right yet awakened by something else that drew them to the realms of waking. A scent, that engulfed their senses; they had been pulled out of their coffins, tightly shut as they were, carpets and pieces of the ceiling having entered them as soon, as it was time.

‘We’ve been aroused from the realms of death itself, something, something must’ve happened.’

‘I believe it to be so as well, something less content with our sleeping session in our eternal beds, that had to be completely interrupted; for some reason, I cannot plant myself back into the grave.’

Remarked some of the men inside the cemetery; it’s been long since they’ve been plucked out of it, having followed a nasty sliding of the hinges by the side of the room, where a few marks left over by some passer-by’s rancid drunkard fall-over managed to ruin a whole set of shots that had been taken along the way. It was bothersome, being there, near them, especially since no man fully regained consciousness, not in the bit. Although their lives had somewhat been spared the grand canal of being rustled over through the living, although they would not have been awake.

It flattered no one to forget what went through their heads then.

‘We’re leading the dead marches.’

And then, as if they had pursed their lips to kiss some transparent angels, they simply rose, without their torsos, only arms, legs and their dainty heads. But only two of them capable of speaking acknowledged as much.

‘We’ve been brought back for a reason, haven’t we? And I would consider it less than enough, if it meant. If it hadn’t meant sacrificing that which beat inside my chest, for, the lack of it would have me crawl like a pinched and pricked dog, drooling on top of them, with little hope still standing in my chest.’

During times he swore he had it, even before he had been brought back. It was an unmitigated pain he could not take his mind off, since, most bothersome abode did follow even then.

The few of them, of number which may be, uncalled for; toppled one another in terms of who was the last one to be seen as if, he rose, on top the others, and called on it, gravedigger’s clothed by each side, apparent filament unattached.

‘It moves and follows us, but how?’

‘Would you see it as being any different than what happened to us, as though, tuned and gone, upon the sounds of whistles we did hear?’

Yet awakened as they were, neither one ever considered, who was the one who did that to them; it was simply enough, incontestable, the fact that there was, nowhere near an explanation for what happened, still.

They moved around each den-made around. Many of the mourners being very much in league with the corpses they dug. And each family worshipped a rotten cadaver, while others were not. Instead, what happened, was the quick pacing they had gathered as of noon, that had replaced the midnight hour, half-way through the night, in a land where there was only, as one could tell of it, little light, but a delightful march of fireflies that came up in the sky.

A road overlapped four more, and it was thoroughly felt with each passing of a step. For what was the uncertain amount of, barely subdued of a thing, that was:

A moot point:

‘Are they supposed to be here? I haven’t recognized a lordly-highly placed man as there had been before the time, instead. I’ve seen their graven, bed-ridden into the bowels of misguided realms.

In which the dead swim like flies. But never, have I seen as such, out of a most delightful coach, a man of stature, in such a wild, most peculiarly dark, above.’ He still maintained, to the discretion of having his thoughts emerged or heard by the others, that his recollections of the underworld were yet untouched.

If there was ever a chance:

‘I’ve seen him before, has either of you?’

But all only gathered for a reason, having stopped around the three of them. Tall hatted, on a suit's brothel of buttons, they crept by a wearied stone. And they were rather falcium-in stare. Strangely bath-faced and grayish pale; more cadaverous than they themselves, although there was little to show with their bloodied limbs, that were yet, unattached.

Behind, yet farther, the following thing only stopped ever so near them. It couldn't have been clearer that they weren't feared. Nor would they have made a point of it. To stare back or to acknowledge the house, a candle being froze behind one of the many ill-crept grabble windows that had been lain behind.

It wasn't even clear whether or not either one of them would acknowledge them back. Yet:

'Will you listen for a moment? I've only yet to ask a thing.'

A giant compact-mushroom headed thing strapped on a contorted body- a sack covering a root bearing pea-pods and little ribs, with two cricked wings as thin as two giant rodded-cysts, that were its appendages, which bore a mightily deformed hat: a rectangular board with a rocket-launcher barrel second mold coming out of it, still pointing to the side, on top of which a square-butter cubical jewel adorned the side of a nasty growth-spoiled rotten flower that induced but sleep-derangement approached:

'All of you need not touch the stone unless you've communed with the grave digger, and know that he's not one to easily forgive another man who's wronged him.'

Each man on sight drew closer to it, very much so that it found itself surrounded. They decided, in their much less bereaved animosity that he was to be confronted.

The Machine of Whispers:

'Tlyt, Tullut, Tlyt, Tullut, Tlyt, Tullut, they come in chains, I see them through.'

One of the first men spoke and they didn't merge through wall, nor hope would there be. Blood lay inside his spikes, like a floating tiny coagulated star which followed through. It could and may as soon just follow, what was hidden around and by their side. A little clothed man of sorrow, canned himself but Emperor of Murky Water, dark fiend benign. It appeared out of nowhere during such a night as one could not forget after, they took what they could and then they cried.

'What has happened to us and what has become of the time we were standing?'

'Could you mind your manners?'

'For how long will that be?'

‘Until we’re left, for reasons that might not be seen, that’s what I’m asking of you, just give up on your pursuit and make it so. You stay here, in this place, behind the hour, and then and only then will you be allowed to leave.’

‘But who makes the rules, Colonel?’

‘I cannot answer that, and I think you know it. Tell me, if you would be so bold, what do you see in this room exactly?’

‘I cannot. Very well, I see a few missing things but I may not be able to explain what happened.’

There was the broken neck of a mammal which had almost rotted in its place, it had a peculiar sight and a facelessness unlike no other. It bore its two beaks, largely in the system of the gridded lint that made the surface of the room. A chair was placed near one of the adjacent places, everything was trembling while nothing seems to work as it had been intended. For that reason there were two men, and only two men present there.

One with such a face as one might find it, rather.

‘Have I cut your disapproval?’

It felt rather uncomfortable from that point on especially since no one was listening nor were there any signs that they would attempt to do such a thing again. It was hard to pinpoint where they started realizing it all went wrong. Little pints of electrons being shot in their heads all the time; dark as he was set on asking what he was put through, it served as a reminder that it was time to return to a time where things were just like they used to be, where one could forget and abandon fear in its every possible iteration, regardless of the consequences, in which case, it was at that moment that they were both called to attend to a whisper, outside the room, where there was only a long stretch of white-bright light, with little to nothing in its surroundings. It was reasonless to a high degree, no one wanted to be in that place, regardless of what came after, and whichever was there, where to be and what to be called, a reason to see. They shut him down.

Brought finally to the machine of whispers they started marching towards it, as if they were owed this visit to begin with, even before they came to the realization that there was no test of endurance to be called, nothing inside their arms, to be called or to be torn away from them.

They listened for some time, that way.

Charegarden of Ethulymor

In and thence and during lo’, of mighty hour where the drenches were filled with lay and would but took upon such piety standing, and lost along the way; it was a sign, of boastful needs, and where to come when wretch of beads, were it to come.

He's lived for some time, and would to be, set his mind to something, long before the issue started, all the thoughts were put in lock, and every now and then they flocked to him, right before their time.

'But who are you now?'

Aleksey was but stopped, he had but met a strange man with a hat. He was but wearing it on his back, it grew and moved on before he could stall for him, he was but pulled and out of shape, a disgrace for all but one man and who would look at him from that point on?

A skin-hat of rat-fat, like a mushroom cloud pushing out of his back, like a parachute dispatched but fallen through before a notice could come. Yanked off his chains, the rails, ailed when he found out he could do it again.

'Who are you? I ask again.'

'Ostrovsky, I am called, but we've been speaking before, have we not?'

'I'm hard of head, I've but walked away, and I remember much, were you present there?'

'Where would that be if you're so inclined to tell me, as for this reminder?'

'When I put the bottle up hers, I seem to find myself always but near it, past the binder.'

'Good-good, but I don't think I've done as such, I would've remembered it if I.'

But they could neither go nor deny it, nor push for or abide what happened after.

What a thing to bind their mares, unlike saddles they were cradles of chains, chimes that would be set in, and would allow to sing and go away, in the distance.

'Strangled, we're both strangled, estranged, are we not?'

'Why can't you shut up your mind already like everyone else did?'

'I don't know but I can only hope I'll make it through somehow.'

I think I stand a chance, and if I cross it.'

'Blasphemy, you've reached your full potential, past your prime, beyond the hidden world inside a small device, now, all that's left is naught. It was short lived and blasphemous, nothing more, nothing else, only that, and there's no return to it any longer, now that you're outside.'

'I need to. I don't know.'

Will I survive the week?'

'I don't know either. But I know as much, we both deflected, so whatever happens, we're both going to be sorry we've crossed paths.'

'We can't both make it at the same time.'

‘Then I’m going to have to claim your!’

Everything seemed to be covered in chitin

Especially the adjacent walls, most of them being set aside for what was happening between them. Too dark to see at first until the molded lights approached from the distance, antennae-see through light bulbs formed out of pure light, drawn from the inside the man of Neon.

Neon came, complete outside and all, organs clearly delimited, shaped like crossbows with little pins of light going all the way through until they couldn’t be stopped any longer, all in a fashion with twenty pins around his throat, he met by the Clam-Clan Chitin.

‘No entry for Glow-man.’

‘No entry for chitin clam either.’

‘I stay.’

‘I won’t.’

He left just as soon for the other room, pulling the moving handle off. Lots of stuffy-stuff with hands and little pug-pukey poke-in all sides kind of matter put-through bounce-off fall finger off the insides of a barely chewed off past-deliberately slowed down digestion kind of meat that became flat-top queerly squared flying puddles that became robust pentagons with bugs being shot inside of them, bouncing like quarters everywhere around, little puffs in the air, they weren’t aware of what was going on anymore since their heads and whatever else they had left of their neurons ended, were put through, deliberately stalling, by the time he realized that he had been looking at the door for the past twenty minutes, he pulled a little shank-shiv shin-prick before he started stabbing the side of the door, drinking from the mass fountain until he could no longer understand the world he was in, drunk-pudgy with what seemed to be a little puffy man’s toe if he had it cut off by a Mafioso after finding out about his kidnapped-rapped young daughter by one of the rival clans. It was not how he expected, to say the least, that he would spend the rest of the way. Especially since the chitin was beating on his mind constantly, it was there, carried through by the forms. He entered a hole that appeared in the scum-air that hardened and followed, right around. He felt naked, so looked down, still there, wasn’t undressed. Ate from the ground when no one was looking; the chitin-creatures were garbage-looking, like hobos, and they carried what seemed to be little puckers of meaty-meat, but only in appearance-messy, hard in actuality as they were but shut through bullets that moved around-around, then stopped-stopped when drawn back from the little chain-like things that were inserted in their backs, everything as long as their thoughts were taken off. They also had little sinisterly sharp-lighters inside of them that melted whatever they could before going back in, dancing around, then began again, gaining a little more than a hard-mass around them.

Here he was, a tambourine-with a broadsword put through- the shape lodges into another one of the Chitins. He was but asked again.

‘Leave or I’ll put a giant blow through your head, and I won’t make it pleasant either. I will under no circumstance make it any easier on you either.’

‘Think you could simmer down with the aggression? I just want to live my life.’

‘A criminal with blood on its hands.’

‘Your spur of something as if you’d know, what is the reason behind?’

‘I’ve seen it with my many eyes. Although planted beneath every cherubic-shade, I could but feel you all the while defiled, and made to be wrought, I felt you defile what seemed to be.’

‘Shut your filthy mouth, you’ve got no proof for any of it, and you’d better keep it shut unless you want to urge yourself for a reprisal. I’ve got the tools to claim your soul.’

‘I’ve got the numbers beneath my toes.’

‘Think you fancy yourself a fighter when surrounded by such, what are they? Lobes, piles and other put down creatures?’

What else?’

Not even a second after, he trailed his eyes around, what seemed to be. No, the Chitin pulled a wrap of skin off the wall. Vials-with something, stores inside the wall, eighteen of them standing one near the other, connected by sparkling copper wires, the starter being there as well as the fuse.

‘This could blow off the very floor along with everything you’ve been through for the last, eighteen hours at the very least.’

‘What do you mean by that?’

‘I’m referring to the long stretch you came through on your way into the hive; the eighteen tunnels, and the underground downcast you passed through.

There’s no escape unless you want to.’

Lower Chitin marks, like raunchy insects but leaping about the ground; they seemed to be struck by one another during their constant flight and incapability of breathing when their time was come to deflect. An activation like it seemed rather incessant.

‘I see the bloated mouth.’

One of them said just as it came back into existence, always pushing, always mounting itself and its wildly deformed body, this mount of dead carrion-like things attached to one another, from the throats out of which came only a most peculiarly deformed syringe-thing that pumped in and out from every side, bloating and inflating drool-shaped faces that came into view. Most of them were humanoid but only vaguely, before being too set on one another’s dream-like motion and bubble-wrap they started chomping on one another’s drill-like teeth, sharpening-sharpening until they couldn’t help it any longer, one of them came into existence like a little block of meat-pulsating. Some strange mouths weren't present at all, it was, it was the eye.

It was the eye, present there, not attached to the creature, to the underside of a single little card-block that had been passed around for the last twenty minutes by chopped-floating hands that moved from one hard direction to the other, carrying with them and within their grasp what seemed to be the grasp of eighteen open-wounded glow-things from which a weird man came out of.

'I'm going to put you down, felon.'

Yet the bile belle-creature but pulled a man-foot, a few spear-shafts and arrow heads, all of which were actioned as they were thrown above his head, between the sides, and before the place he stood in part. They wallowed like little inorganic plasters, and little fumigating elongated bastards of skin that began dripping from every side, shapes that fell from wherever they could. The foot was become, like an unwrapped puzzle, although it shouldn't have, eight of them, little infantile creatures leaping on top the man, holding him as they but drew around him, again and again until he had enough. A slip between his teeth, they gathered, a spittle was brought as soon after, drowning first, second and the fourth one that was put down, head-in splattered after, as he had but chained all of them together with what seemed to be a belt he pulled, and hanged them off, and should or would. He had hooked a punch, yet he bent back with every infantile put in front of receding spear, they shot back and forth before they'd disappear again. In a matter of a few seconds, wild noises were made be.

Some of them came back from one of the most distant directions it could stretch and band against, each wall but being struck down before it came. Stronger and muskier as for every passing second came; a single more morose moment, came as well, then came without, a single breathing thing, aloud.

It happened in the matter of a few passing seconds, during the confusion caused by the startling sound. Little gourds but followed after and were made to wait before they came alive. He carried a few of the shafts out, as if to pick, and as he did, the man simply fell on his back, reeling back and forth rightly so, just as he had intended, he brought it by the many faces, pins pointing at him, the many laces but struggling to pull the faces back. One by one like bubble wrap he popped.

A scene had unfolded right before either one of the Chitin-like wild breather, could barely hear it, but for the time being they were still there.'

'Bed-bugs inside your ear I suppose?'

'I think so too, wouldn't you like to find it out?'

Eight more hours passed.

'I don't think it will make any much more of a difference anymore.'

'I think it will.'

They stared at one another, calmed down by what was happening around them. It was serene, seeing how he splattered the carrion-body heap shaped pile all over the ground, there wasn't any more or less of a need to ask.

Little plant

No more than twenty paces were taken before they both settled on the kind of tournament was to be had.

They were under no control whatsoever, the Decay appeared again and they just teleported out of nowhere and came into view and began forming their hands like sink-plant shapes that had many cannon forms in them that shot power rays everywhere around and all of the sudden more than a few tens of them appeared and they started shooting everything they could and their power rays started bouncing around the walls, creating such power and malefic magnetism that grenades and nuclear bombs and missiles were drawn towards those magic-spots, immediately exploding. Before long the Decayed started attacking one another and blasting away, in the explosion, being unaffected but neither were the men, who simply weren't shook at all by the nuclear nor the normal explosions, as they brushed those things off and merely returned to their work, which was just as quickly hardened since they couldn't help themselves but work with absolutely nothing and nothing at all is what they had to put together, piece by piece and everything that had been put that way. And a few tens of the Decay started bringing it power missiles and exploding little dogs that had their tails shaped like little buildings that were filled with larger bombs in them all being but forced to shoot in every possible direction they could and they had mouths that opened, the bombs had them, that pointed tongue-shaped missiles themselves that were but puffy and pink and hands with heads at the top of them that were happy people with evil eyes and broken yellow teeth, no one had white teeth, not even the Yanks, whom were also there, looking and cheering the Decayed as they fought as if it was one of their old school WWE's highly praised matches, never stopping from cheering on, as they observed the Decay who just appeared out of the right flank of the side of the city which had, initially been a crater before the flying part of the city flew from one of the lost flying puffy cloud cities of lightning where the light-shaped humanoids lived. They were like the top of an ice cream top that had but strange hive-like structures melted inside of it, the bottom being the bodies of the Decayed of which feet were like bands, but some of them had weirdly lamp-like shapes that had little bubbles of cluster-like explosive guns attached to them and little eye-shaped giant fiddles with Bonaparte-like tall, not short, as he was of the average height at the very least, darkly shaped hunched back humanoid servant-like feet elongations that carried them in the same way slaved carried their master's tents in olden times. And they all carried a large pea-shooter like cylinder that was passed from hand to hand until it aimed at the other side of their ranks, only to start firing electrically-shaped, not entirely saw-like pure energy flying missiles, but some that were but shaped like men that were standing in T-positions whom were chained around their arms and held by both ends of the saw blades, which also looked as if they were frozen in place despite the saw-blade like, which had gaps in them and for that reason they didn't have saw-blade like forms inside of them but some weirdly gapped similar things, while the chains somehow moved yet reseted in their original formation, as if they were some magnificent magical animations. Also they were homing and appeared to be completely set on trying to find out their victims as to rather completely destroy and totally annihilate the life forms that were after. One of the Decayed was named Corlehivlnks Nastyrottencancerbox and he had a sword made out of many decayed and had not feet but floated without a lower body and had a large machine beneath him made out of many worked through almost laser-shooting torsions that were put together as to fix everything he could. His large shoulders were giant and held millions of deployable Decayed that were shot out of his shoulders and were planted in the earth and grew up inwardly then formed trebuchet launcher that launched hundreds of them from every possible entry and exit hole until they reached the point of launching themselves in the air, having become unstoppable. And more giants like Nastyröttencancerbox appeared, filling the battlefield with thousands upon thousands upon millions of them, planting themselves into nuclear bombs as well, which they claimed for themselves and formed slingshots they shot the Moon with, colonizing it for the first time. A giant dog was there, but he was become part of the moon, and its open canine-mouth opened all of the sudden to revealed a giantly, grandly elongated long-device that was shaped and sharpened and made to shoot voices into space. Space itself became deformed and was become destroyed as soon as the voices came into contact with it, since they created paradoxes of space, making it so neither of them could exist in the same place at all.

Cartjolt Munchboxer ran up with a box filled with explosive tequilas and Molotov explosive cocktails, dropping it on top of an old granny who immediately but became a tractor after having them dropped on her head, after which he entered it and began driving upwardly towards the Moon. He entered the giant dog who opened its mouth and stood on top of a reflective platform shaped demon with two dimensionally drawn limbs that were drawn on top of every side of it, every single image but coming up with a single message every single time they were being touched.

‘I’ve lost my leg, oh dear, I lost my leg.’ Spoke one of the memories that were kept inside by the vile demon. ‘I’ve certainly lost my leg, haven’t I? Dear me, I suppose this is it for me, I remember, it was blown off during the war.’

We were digging graves for some of the men, when it started. Unannounced, the troops weren’t supposed to be there. We were surprised by what happened. I still remember turning around, blood frozen, my chest bombarded, my gut strung, my body shaken when I saw them drop. I can’t describe what it felt like hearing men yell and shout. Being surrounded by them in the midst of what was supposed to be our last attempt to give a proper burial to our fallen men, to our fallen brothers; it’s never occurred to me that I would join them. I thought I would. I was surrounded by dead people, dead men, some of whom were fresh. And I couldn’t focus on anyone else but myself.

The pain kicked in, after I came to realize that I was missing a leg. The pain doesn’t kick in fast enough, it just happens, it comes out of nowhere, you don’t feel it entirely, it’s the numbness, as if you’re a boy standing on top of your leg, on your foot and you don’t realize what happened. And you’re afraid that you’re going to fall but you’re already down. None of the men are responding, they’re not responding. I don’t know who is alive, when the pain kicks in and I have to stop the bleeding.

I can’t hear anything. It’s like being a deaf man surrounded by other people you see the mouths open, but they’re frozen in place and they cannot move. You don’t whether or not they’re dead and open-mouths, trying to scream for help, or out of terror, or out of the mania for what happened around. They want to be shot but to put an end to the pain. No one wants to be here but I survive. I didn’t ask for this.’

‘I stepped on my eye and I accidentally squeezed it out, it popped and shot through the open side of my head as if I suffered a grenade-aneurism; that is how I died.’

There was a madly wrought panel that was worked by him just as soon as his tractor stopped getting traction, before Munchboxer even knew what was happening, he was preparing to do it all again, being incapable of making it in time, he pulled a pack of cigars and started smoking.

There was an open field farther down, it stood upon a plowing grown, it stood there for hours in the making, raking and forever baking, as of stoves opened, darker dirt. Watching and grimacing, they were bitterly blimey yet darkly animatedly walking as they reminded one of open sores and dark galore and moving on, their incestuous. Fastidious in every remark they were gone, weeding one another out.

Dale Siebel hold Lekhlem'ur

Of going through the first of trance, of going through the mist, a dance; little more than hardly walkers, bringing up a feast and lancer. His was but one of hardy point and brought with him from the back of darkly joined. And many feet on every side, all but extended as if beast was not meant to die. Brought as much; dark lizard in the brain, one hardy man but had but all the spoils but couldn't put himself to grave, danger followed, just as such.

There was silence in the dread, there was nothing else instead. Every single ingratiate thing, appeared.

'I am the great Ghondehr, and now it's drawn in time.'

He couldn't open his mouth entirely, having become two parts and two alone of what drew on around him. And many more joined him as well, and what could he see around him if naught else than what came on.

A great deceiver, fashioner of rhyme, whom mouth was sealed and was brought back into the first gate, his head but brought down; around him there was only a single summer-woe. Burning as it happened, there was but nothing else for him to know.

A flopping eel-shaped gun, an arch-light of spreaders that started glowing whenever there was a fly around. He bowed to them and many others, he started feeding on them before the showers could even be started, the chairs were broken in his back. And they were but simply darted and made to waste.

'There's a gate open, I think there is. I can somehow see it, I can see every plain thing put behind, I can see the waste that's but spoiled and whimpered as it happened after a while.

I listen to no cruel lie, but know you're hiding something.'

'What am I?'

'A fool for listening to me, en garde!'

He leaped from one side of the room and was immediately gotten at the man's throat, like a machine of dirt spreading seeds.

The bloated apparatus stopped them from entering a phase of much destruction, having been stopped as they almost charged one another, their weak bodies but thin-skin, open throat-chest bones, appearing starved. Yet charging one another like dumb cats that were but looking for some kind of resolve whenever it was time. One of them mightily bearded, while the other was but covered in sarcophagus skin, parchment and sheet.

The bloated apparatus square, a thing that had many patterned maze. And little out protrusions like deep balloons, all contorting and lesser pushing out and wreathing, and never beating around each fence. Deep contortions, elongations, from whence they shot around the room, as they impaled but both of them, shook like rooks they stood down there. Incapable of breathing and perching their lips as well, one might ask.

What hid inside the Apparatus if not a single unnatural thing with bloated heads and many a body, cut in pieces, then rotated, like a middle stacked pack of cards, all of them being but pushed through until standing, shuffled and never ending, all of them but molded despite cut, then perched and eaten, the heads were brought, grown across each ceiling, happiness was spear.

Out of their mouths, little throat breathers were set to the ceiling and made to waste inside the top of the apparatus, to which they were attached. And breathing awkwardly, they started drawing in some of the most unnatural things, drawing in their blood and skin, were made within, the second floor, beneath them stood, at the hour.

But a fest casts, many of the people were there and cast, were made to lain in waste and rotten, were but cast together, gotten. Like a little bile of meat, set in flight, floating in the middle with their elongated legs and arms.

'He has emerged, bow to him and let yourselves be known to him immediately.'

He beckoned them to still themselves into place, for nothing less and nothing else would make one endure himself as to stop. As to be brought forth, from what seemed to be a giantess of arms, put together from every side, dead and split, with her open at her feet, would he be brought out of. In front of them, there dragged at last, not to be awake for long, the lord that would be known yonder, and forever after as the False-Martyr.

Strong and diseased, fallen apart, he opened his mouth and many a hands came, all pushing to his feet, they brought, many hands that were put together and would, of the lack of a better timing, come at last into place, would look after, such as it were, deranged an eye.

It come forth, and bloated as a sniveling.

Inside of his head there was space, as a small reality which drifted in and out of existence, weird machines:

Ielfdas system of dark put together stars in the distance, swaying they appeared ever since, and brought within the space-containers most of them were put at ease.

There came the great Hylghebad Subduer in the distance, cutting through as it but strode on every side. Its bloated form uncannily swinging as it bloated less inflated yet in size, could it be brought there, here and on every side, nearing one another's visions of what ships ought to have looked like, it appeared that the crew was dead, many lacked sockets.

It was clear from the side on deck that many of them were to disappear if left alone, unchecked. It grew out of the sides, for every crewman that stood there, there was another one placed inside the bulk of the floor, living as a capacitor, that grew even deeper, then appeared lost, for the lack of better directions, one of them seemed to seep in.

Pleisnke wanted mighty torn in shed. In wake of where, in home instead, and whence he walk and where to after. And what goes further, down and farther, they lay. And loom around and lest convey.

'It's been a mighty long time, hasn't it? Since the day you've stumbled upon more than a few fallen forth gables, near broken street upon which I lay.'

'Indeed it's been, that I suppose, for there can be no other result, other than that.'

A long system of rapier like hook attached almost spear-head device designed as to completely induce euthanasia provoking hormones in the African jungle pouch-monkey specimen whose inferiority can simply and plainly be observed by all members of every other non-nigger mixed with race. Almost like a forward thrust like motion propelling as many and as clear of pain inducing thing as they can.

Of much lesser ends they sang, there were eight ships that were clearly set in place yet aligned as to fit one another, just as soon as either of started blinking immaterially so, there was not a single point that lay ever as obscure as to ply itself in a smaller, thinner hole where the blankest of the marks lay wreathing about. In what appeared to be thousands upon thousands of unmarked grave-like foundations, there was not a single one clear.

Obsession-corpse

Always for a reason, it rose, from the spot it had lain for this long, for some unaltered yet harder to look at, for the longest time had it become volatile, here and there jumping as to be looked onto. Latching on whichever be, whatever corpse, as to see, without direction, indentation, it smiled as passers-by with least of all, strange creation, started bubbling as if it hadn't moved. It prized itself as soon, as soon, but then approached, from farther away and wilder angler. It opened a strange mouth and lost whatever it had going and whatever power might've left it strange.

'For how long has it been standing there?'

The strange creature, of which hardened head strained, and strangled by whichever means, any either way, for reasons, everything kept in mind, and every single thing that was there, kept in line and trapped inside, it thought of just as little as it would, beyond content and beyond the time.

A strangled way of walking, then, just to appear out of anywhere, dangling from side to side, a little wink came out of a dead away. But from this strange machine, a corpse within, came only little more than anger, thinned. It seemed to seep in and out, whenever, passing and going lest around. There were a few more passers, and chitinous lepers with tiny latched upon, and cradles soups.

Many passed and least of all swooned.

But amongst them stood a single man, whose face was but barely standing and least of all, would stand in place, it shook of mad directions asking, and ever since, forever dancing, from a body onto the other, it seemed to replicate.

From the looks of it, much longer than it had been there, stood a single mouth that could not satiate the man.

‘Where did you come from in that case?’ Auhber didn’t even pass his glance as he opened his mouth again, no longer waiting for a reason to draw near or to make a point out of it, fare well, he thought and launched a little pint of fire, which spread as far as a bubbulous negrous skin would spread inside a negro-pyre.

Little primitive neck to be snapped, little more than it should be allowed, came after, then he was lamely put in such a stance as to wail, to start again, whenever time drew on for either him or the other one to prevail.

It stepped from the side and waggered, it looked as if, this peculiarly indebted stranger had little more and little less, and much to him, would he confess.

‘I’ve come to your rescue, dear Auhber, I know and am aware you’ve been waiting here for some while, but now, of all the time I could’ve arrive, there and thence, I’m here, are you not aware of what I’ve done?’

Through the perils I’ve passed to make myself, truly known to you at last?’

‘What are you talking about then?’

‘My passing, it’s been close to an end, and thence rebirth, look hinder, yonder, farther more.’

He pointed at the dark sky, to which a mold of many mountains stretched from every corner of the world, all dancing between two points, as if drawn. By two vortexes that were but sipping in all of their and no exception, every single point in sky seemed to lead between the two of them. Like murky yet darkly contorted, and such a wit as would be sorted, would they draw such life, and would return, whenever just as much, or less than needed, not alive. From the two point and mountain tops breaking, from this distressing sight and much to fading, came but a falling shape, a strange almost kite-worn to wreath and rot away.

A strange thing which drew in either heart, both such rotten things, both Auhber and Cart, he pulled on a single little wooden wheel which by the time he had made the difference out of, he had lost as much of the appeal as there was. It was broken after all, and for some time, despite there being no explanation, it was as much as he could do. With a lame finger, he pointed at it, and misused whatever word of less command there was.

He questioned the fellow and before he knew it, he asked.

‘Whether you want to admit it or not, do you like the wheel?’

‘It’s broken, what have you done to it?’

‘What I had to and what had to be done, after all, there are things in this world that cannot be expected to changed, for no man, and no nomad may ever know what happens in the woods.’

‘Of course they wouldn’t Cart, there are no sands and no deserts in there, what else can one say and what else might they bring from anywhere?’

‘Verdure to plant, such as the likes of a desert land might come to bring some less stagnation.’

And both of them were very much alone, and found themselves moving on towards the smoky towering mountain heaps, whom healed such sights as one would find himself whenever ill to make a choice, and for whatever reason, there would be some ploy to make them watch, or to call it as it were, to make it seem, the least of all, very much alive.

‘Be joyous, you must know this, but now, of all, I find myself at peace.’

‘Why is that?’

‘I’ve been reunited with your for a short period of time, nothing more, do you not understand how and what that makes me feel like?’

Before Auhber could answer, they passed a nigger-killed scarecrow whose simian nature had been cut off, whom was left there dripping like a pig-tottering creature with a little brain matter pushed out of its little head, out of some uneatable pouch of leprous-pus skin that sneered, in and out of his face, but dry. Blood had rang out of him, a cattle head inside his gut, for this felon, for once seemed peaceful, it was the only natural state.

They didn’t bother to search for a, much, more or less better reason that to know, from wherever angle they might’ve come out of, there was no desire to know, but show.

‘Your wheel, is it marked?’

Jumping-leaping, thing the creature was, but now, it wasn’t playing. It was strange, not to feel such an appeal fading, not to know where it would lead itself, elatedly fading, but it appeared that it was no disease.

A tall standing stalker-creeper gentle creature with no feet, whose back was but a cardboard box extended, whereas its nasty feet contorted past the grit that had amassed in time, looking back on it, that could've pounded their eyes, since its face was but filled with spikes, especially out of its sockets where the cacti shapes but started sewing off part of its face. In and out it reeled, and couldn't see the larger need to put on some effort drawing. Its hands contorted in the back, its face but put inside what appeared to be a long trenched crater that had made its spine. But where, if that were the case, would to be, the hidden arms or limbs located, that was a mystery, for they were there. Fur-covered and appeared in the sky, a ploy, as, whereas it happened, the sky was but a deeper flat-blue, with a red dot with features-dark, whom smiles and many chains but brought as it would be achieved. This back and forth conundrum that would bring it here and there, past the feet and there was only a single thought this strange creature thought in its simple mind.

'I've lynched a nigger, I've killed his god damned little bastardly retarded child, haven't I?'

Both men were startled just as soon as they were made aware of this accusation, this elongation, this reason for them just, happening to come across the body on the side.

He drew on the ground as well and he liked animals as opposed to someone else whom shall not be named here. He enjoyed them, and for that reason, he found only one way to spare the animals, that being, slaying the, slightly, barely, but in reality indistinguishable apes niggers were, though he was a hypocrite nonetheless.

False place

Yonder he walked accompanied by none other than the Martyr in his false chambers, upon the dreaded table which was part of the cavern, yet distraught, broken mightily as one might find it, yet torn apart. He appeared, after once a while, to, longer before he had gotten the chance to, again sip from a cup of blood-bile, the toast had been drawn to a still. He was there within reason thinking of what might come after, deep within the mark, mighty as it be asked, they were but struck, as dangerously as they looked. With every corner of the room, less niggerish, but a swoon, his guests were not left behind but peeled. Many cranial formations but swung back and forth inside the walls as they but drew on, deeply and much so enchanted. Part of the room was made out of strangely formed reservoirs as well as peculiarly set cabinet filled with the yellow jarred dancer, all still cut up, leaping about in every possible pose he could leap into, right on time. A knock appeared to disturb his strange slumber.

All too paranoid and devoid of emotions, there stood the calling, it could not be felt again, and then again, asking, was the first of drafted figures, a peculiar coldness, for every touch and every handle that appeared to be formed, as strange as it seemed, this was a dark creature, legless but almost to a fault, it could not speak for long, its mirthful appearance betrayed, only the most, the lesser and the least satisfactory gods attached to the waist, many of whom had grown and were absorbed by him, as he had yet to chance their escape.

He wore a single head piece that seemed to be a swollen bucket, one with but a single strapped on top pair of maws, and many jaws that entered his lonesome mind, as soon as he could try himself and stop the breathing, as his faceless appearance, the lungs appearing were but daringly forlorn. It also bore half of his arm around his body like a strapping belt.

‘I’ve come to discern something out of you and I will not leave until I’m listened to.’

‘You may proceed, but make it clever, witty and do not stall. I do not know and can’t remember when was the last time I was concerned with lesser beings, ever so pleasant as I am to show compassion, I grow weary of toys.’

And of little dead niggers that were even eerily so in his mind, the killing of their kind.

There were many realms as those where happened, for the lesser darkly mattered creatures to be killed when happened upon them to thread and shed in their blood and skin instead. Covered with the most insidious of wild devices, many of whom would enter them every now and then without reaction, this satisfaction being met only by the butcherment of a little kike, spinning it in a little pucker of pus, they always came together, as to be degraded and put inside a littler dirt mass.

‘As I was saying, you need not convey a word unless you want to, I shall clear whatever countenance is in this body of yours.

I shall pull the anchor that is the spine from you and play with it as I stay my say, and make my hand but crush through your body before I lay my hand to side.’

And he pointed at his table of which cartilage was made, of blind and lesser, yet malign, of evil, darker puss and wings, all molded together in an utmost capricious manner, one could not help but look away, then again, after, did he called the Martyr.’

‘Ruler upon rulers of each kind, the one whom blessed but evil days of vileness that there is to come, what might you stall upon the day that comes after and when will I and when that day comes after be put under such employ as to destroy your enemies that seek to distort your world?’

‘Leyidsub Ohor, you are not to be released from my grasp, no matter what you may consider right, or least of all and dark convey, until I give you such direct order as one might seek to convey and shove you ever farther than you’d miss, I shall seek no act of imprudence until I call it so. And I shall not act on rush appeal, and I shall not seek of you to do as such. You’re not to act on your own or do something that might bring such pity and contempt upon me so, as I won’t have it.

I shall kill you if that’s the case, put an end to your insolence, as there is, for, you, broken as you are, would seek to unearth me from my hidden place and take my throne if I stall and seek of large contortions, you know that I cannot trust no man and that I may not look upon no other place than this, so why must you seek me when you know or at the very least see that I’m finally at peace?’

‘My pardon, Martyr, I didn’t seek to subvert or to imply, that I would not only deny but ruin anything even if I were to try.

I only seek, of wild desire, to aid thee.’

‘Yet you do not understand that such thing is but an insult to someone such as I, whom would fashion himself in the likes that no god and no deity alone would find itself threading along. Because I see, through all of mighty and lesser ploy and I might not be stopped by any means and by that alone, I only seek of such wonder, to see alone what happens after.

When I’m gone and what servant is to come and whom might be as daring as to do something that would take me down, as not when I am here, but in spirit as he lays his side upon my throne, as he claims is so in the name of whatever faction there is to be called upon this show, this ruckus, this political destruction and contortion of all that is right.’

Though he alone of all did never and would not claim it to be so. Since even as he said it, he had but a hidden smile underneath the rotten hairs, as if to show, earlier in the day, he of all had the nastiest and darkest plays, as he had but attended to them, least of all alone, and found himself daringly staring at the darkest of creatures, many of them being as dumb as to show the wildest of impulses, many of whom lunged to attack. Many large bodied, almost featureless hourglass-pears of the most unnatural of unrecognizable inhuman material, most of which was either something between some silicon-plastic-metallic alloy, mixed with some unnatural red-orange and with large pucker-textured cracks that appeared to actually be grown on top veins rather than anything they claimed themselves otherwise. From the depths of which largely elongated syringe-tip thin legs appeared to push out of them, crawling and dangling then and thin, as they were, entered the first and the second and the bodies of their neighboring forms, as they started a wild fight of growths that appeared everywhere. Unnatural ghoulish-like humanoid malformation being splattered-appearing on objects around them, in the surroundings where they didn’t exist; it happened so:

Within every strike amongst or across their bodies, pieces of them started being spread and pushed away, cut and thrown as if hands had grabbed pieces of clay, throwing them against the table, against a lamp, or wild darkly painted walls of spears, only to have it made appear, the darkest of shapes, the cackling ghoulish limbs of dead-mean trying to swipe away, barely formed, yet curved as if cylinders or bookshelves were there before them, kept in an almost invisible trance. Before either one even had a chance to come and draw breath, they were shattered as it happened, for neither one to be allowed of wild and such survival calling.

Darker heads reeled in, and then, before either one could make it to the Martyr, he had grabbed one of their heads and splattered the shape of a pear into his hand, crushing it so, incapable of denying himself the waiting of a blasphemous show. He then appeared and neared a single watch of broken heads inside his gut, as his many arms revealed in the depths of his belly, he spat them out, blinding the hourglass peers, having appeared by their side to cut, while his arms acted and accounted for a most unnatural way of being, he had only entered it as far as his span would allow before he pulled away his young and youthful looking organs, preying upon the direst of foes, like shark-bait they but stopped pushing one another, so. Had they come upon him, praying in each direction, attempting to eat, trying to deepen themselves, much deeper than it ought to be allowed, in. Had they entered and swollen as they were, they ate what they could and made way for a lesser thing to be convey, he entered him home and put a new rug made out of their bodies, he sutured a dark head on the wall which, long before he knew it appeared to contrast with the darkest, most unnatural of things, at last he started spending time with the moon.

It was a small and short thing, of blue-cattle prods out of its surface, with unnatural dancing little specks of angelic-like shapes lances which were its hair-like heard tendons which appeared to have their cherub-throats snapped as for the tip of their lance-like heads were but become, the end of gun-barrels that opened up and revealed wild tongues that were flat and bore strange almost lower side of the body humanoid legs. It opened, the moon having revealed itself to be cut-in half, and bore teeth that were curved around and bore tongues at each end that were shaped like lollipops, in the middle there was a giant human-heart that oozed and was black and dripped down on the floor, kept between thousands of put together praying arms that had, in their hand against hand position kind of praying stand, keyholes from which unnatural energies came out of, entering and feeding the heart, as it started oozing and growing, making the elongated cords that were attached to it from every possible angle and direction grow even more. Until the very point where it could not help itself but become, the shape of a large diagonally extending, but only for a moment before reverting to its original shape, kind of ark-structure connected with, or having on both sides of the flat ship that had nothing on its deck, not even the sails, strange canon-like almost cut-in half barrel shapes made out of silver, as if they were some strange power strips, from which the cords actually came out of and appeared to be, thinner whips or leashes. Even the bloated surface of the moon revealed itself to be less grayish and was but of a strange almost fallen apart decayed kind of a texture, with many no-eyes but almost abstract representations of degenerate paintings that somehow complimented the strange form that it had become. A large almost pus-swirl appeared on the side of this cracked-in half malicious figure, whereas its humanoid legs started pushing around, being much more hairier than they were before, throttled by what appeared to be the syringe injectors that appeared in their tender-leprous shapes that hid inside. A few strange figures appeared to bear arms and hears, and upper-body halves, all grabbing on top of one another in the same way crabs would, trying or attempting to take one another down as to revealed that inside or between the towering angelic spears, and inside the bulk that lay between the extended arms and the outskirts of the moons, hundreds of hidden hole-grovels filled with an unfathomable number of prisoners lay suffering in there eternally.

This Fallok-Fallok was but a friend, companion, servant to the False Martyr. At times, this moon-charade became a flaccid curtain, leaving it swaggering and swaying around the room or wherever it went like some unnaturally hard to look at, hardly of the matter, pile of rubbery put together piles of arms and figures and hairs and legs, housing a beating organ, since it was sluggerish most of the time. Henceforth, it greeted such mighty master as would anyone else in part, and would to come, be brought back as to be aware when life drew on.

‘I’ve come to understand why such wild purpose as there is but beckons for my life to be.’

‘What did you come here for?’

‘I’ve come to bother and provide annoyance for you, great False Martyr.’

‘Why must you serve as nothing more than a postulant inconvenience?’

‘Because I have naught else to do but lay, and there’s no one else whom would go out of their way to call my presence as there is, endearing.’

Outside this strange room, there was a long two hundred thousand miles stretch that pushed to the right then and lead to the Station, a place where there used to be a rolling head by the name of Dour, which had been immortalized in stone, completely and utterly so. It bore strange machine parts in it, and appeared to be worshiped by much and more so decaying featureless creatures whom no longer had any kind of shape to attach themselves to. It was as if their long so abandoned bodies could no longer be put to good, great, an unfathomable use by any means, they were but aimlessly driven to become as slaughtered cattle, driven by tumor-bolted cancer.

But between those strange halls there were millions of test-tube shaped rotten hole-pits filled with trillions upon trillions of rotten sub-human non-humanoid sub-species inferiorly wrought rotten cadavers such as the likes of monkeys, semites and mutts.

One of the eighteen rituals of the broken groove had failed, as would to all whom falsely lead to yet believe.

Outside his place, in the distance, there stood a mine.

‘Come on, get back at it, slackers!’

Two more miners were joined from the side, jointed at their legs, in four segments, like grasshoppers.

‘Keep wrapping your hands on those, they won’t get any warmer unless you put your backs into it.’

A few more men came along.

‘Don’t forget that you’re doing this for your country, the coal needs to be shattered and completely ruined. All mines need to be put under order and under close surveillance just so it can no longer be reusable.’

One man came up with his shrunken parasite; its rubbery sea-cucumber face was a mirror of his own face. It practically chews through his iron pick in order to get to the coal. There was no greater force trying to destroy his finger bones than his.

They spent many days feeding it, forming a station, or a reverse ATM, where coal-money was being paid to the eater, which grew, larger in size, larger than any accountable thing there was, larger than the average size of not only a builder than a greater, much more well dad-body kind of type who grew in fat once he realize his wife can no longer have children any longer, so he let himself go. As in, he’s already planted at the very least eight babies in the oven, and his wife already started being obnoxious, picky, starting picking up fights over the most insignificant things, bitching around over nothing, yelling and shouting all the time, which in turn caused him to let go of himself because there was no other option than to do it. He’s beaten her a few times in this scenario but that somehow still didn’t quench her total obnoxious nature, it’s as if that’s embed into her very nature and being. Annoyance, total and annoyance, and who would even want to deal with all that stress coming from someone who can’t even see past themselves or their own ego as to care for someone else? That thing alone causes a man to start drinking, to eat, to grow fat and lazy. There’s no force driving him to try harder, hence the result. It was that kind of body that appeared to have come out of the body of the strange parasitical thing. Not only had it bore some pseudo wings to the side and instead of legs, which were bloated-like strange in motion, made as to resemble, vaguely but not entirely as if seen through several visors, while looked out of a kaleidoscope-scope kind of vision, splattered soft material bag that was hardened, it didn’t make the same jolts but appeared like a soft-flour bag constellation that was just as soon connected with cartilages and lesser forms that floated in the air, spectral thing that were like puddles filled with tadpoles-lesser stars that were but fashioned to look like smaller feature filled, humanoids trapped in smaller eyes, with chains around their wrists and bodies, that appeared to be – autopsy – vivisection performed on them open as to reveal dark-red gushing wound that resembled pseudo-deformed irises. They were evoking dark red-magic like splatters of fumigating dust invocations that would appear out of nowhere, as soon as they were all but fed, since these sun-forms with chained men were connected through a system of in-the-city kind of suburban area roads or trams- regions where the shattered coal was being absorbed by them, slowly as if to grow.

They wore badges on them, but they were so tiny that they couldn't be seen.

For what reason were the men decorated? Darkness could not tell much.

The mine was disabled, spiritually, and mentally, as the men were almost worked to death every single time they raised their voices.

Outside the mine there were people standing watch, but they were altered people without genitals and without sphincters, whom were naked. Waiting in the cold, their heads had hair inside their eyes and in their organs, which forced them, cats were they now? Spitting ruffian-bottle of blood-hair in bottles they shattered in each other's heads. All day and all night, throughout many cycles and many months, opening them every now and then as to look at the result.

'It's time we bring another Coal-shatterer out.'

What mighty gem would there be?

'I want to build a house in the mine.'

'Huh, you do?'

'Yes, I want to build a nice house, inside that mine. I want a nice house, I want it to be upside-down and I want it to have weird things in it.' The Outside-watch inquired the Coal-shatterer. He was set on building and running down a house. A peculiar construction of hard labor done by others that he would not pay back, instead he wagered he would kill them.

He considered, at first the vile incertitude that was behind the steel beams he would use as one of the support pillars, that being, whether or not the power-melting sprays of supreme condensed heat that's elevated by inside-job planted explosives by the Coal-shatterers infiltrators are to plant in the lower-regions that are connected to the underground less-facilities that are hidden inside the larger plain-mole bombs that bear three blind eyes, and only a maw, -noseless, as to, well.

'I shall do it outside the mine, that way there will be no way I could possibly be sabotaged. You, call out some of the shatterers.

You're to assemble immediately for a special task I shall bestow upon you.'

And they were there within the hour, twenty Shatterers made to follow. Neither of them could've made it more obvious that they didn't know what they were doing.

There was no time left to run, or come up with an excuse. As peculiarly distorted as it all was, they had no chance to put a word in.

What grandness had he in mind, although he did not know what to expect out of them, especially since they were, rather, upset with this sudden change. It was a piece of him, heart was a frame. Frame was some wax-set sheet he carried; he talked to them before each dime a day.

'I wish I could live inside my castle, in this world of my design. I can finally be alone now, once the coal-shatterers are done building it, laying down its foundations, I could become free. No longer forced to think, or do something bothersome or plain. No longer troubling my head with unsolvable solutions that I am going to fail as to fix or be praised for something wrong over countless generations that are never to know what their thinner numbered kinsmen now, the ones that can see through all.

And for that reason, all shall become automatic, inane as there is, without action and without cause, as something that's never been and has nothing to become. Where my thoughts of evil shall perish and contort, whereas I shall not fall victim to my own poison but embrace it, as I ought to when the time comes.'

True to it, at the very end, but one problem was still there, he had not known how to make a build, and he was not known with any engineer, as to ask him as much.

His plans for the conception of his base were rather grand, although the resources were limited, there were plenty of men he could get killed in order to get what he wanted.

'We are listening now.'

'You may heed, yet still what I ought to have carried over a few decades ago.

Build the thrusters first, the propulsion pieces have to be contorted at to fit into the high-hive roof-tops and the grand schematics that shall form the great girth of the dark piece, the headed tendons and the bodies that are inserted into the great unfathomably dark riveting dark tile that shall form the inner fordace of my grand hall.

The Fordace shall stand upon the entrance and shall only serve as the key piece to my dark Sanctuary; yes, that is what I shall call it, the great Sanctuary of Lasalf.'

It was mighty and contorted, like the grandeur of a great peasant rift, their creation resting at the feet of God himself, but the decrepit but standing in its fully fledged form, the stature being completely decaying as they wasted no time to build it forth. How else could they have done it if not for the breaking of the, the shattering of coal that was in the air, as their picks only made contact with the coal-shredder, upon the shattering, iron, plastic and chemical-oxygen being made.

'Start the great coal-engines and shatter as many of them as possible, slay them as they rest, kill them in their sleep, the likes of the race I, as much as there is still time, so much do I detest.'

As to attest to this testimony of his, there was no reason to forge their legs, since they had them plenty on the ground.

‘I did not order limbs, what’s this?’

It looked like a galactic-reef, a mess that would impress no man as to give a rather plentiful a touch.

‘There’s something wrong here, no, I don’t think I like this, I wasn’t expecting either of you to show up this soon.’

He was desperately trying to meet the leaf-shaped bands that were running alongside the first few meters that were already slightly raised. Much of the dirt was put together, barely, only but only in the form of slightly higher-raised roof of coal-dirt, that had become elongated-alloy, as for the mix, yet could still be shattered. But it moved, since the limbs that weren’t supposed to be there attached themselves to its squared-around form, and kept going along until unnecessarily so, he couldn’t actually ask them to do it. To kill them, since he considered them, well to do. They were his pets. From this point on at the very least:

‘It’s settled then, you can all relax, I’m going to have my base, from this point on legged. It shall move and keep moving.’

‘The legs won’t sustain the weight.’

‘Then they shall wriggle in place at the very least, you know?’

‘I don’t think I understand your reason behind it.’

‘I just want a house and a base and a Sanctuary and you are a worker, come on. Get back at it, or I shall start whipping you like a cotton-picker until your back with be arched around my whipped cracked, my cracked whip. I shall whip you like a boy, but not my child, a nigger!’

As expected they returned to work and there was much work ahead to be done. There were some liberties that had to be taken momentarily since the Coal-pparatus, actioned like a cement mixer and a snow-making machine, placed on the side of the, rather a few meters away to a mile since it not only mixed the broken apart coal, but had to be set in the direction it would, or the general trajectory would be set at, of which, there was only so much a man could do about it. The general area of the place the coal pieces would land it had to be worked on ever so slightly, rigged even. It yielded a fix, but he didn’t feel like pronouncing it just yet. Irving Cattletale, being the main self-employed to function architect only thought as much.

‘I think I’m going to, well, I could make a few alteration, or. Pin them down, butcher my children, my pets, my companions.’

With his blessings, they came closer to the limbs and crippled their ankles with their picks. Quickly they bled. All of them, including the workers, Irving, the limbs, and even the workers in the mine as well. Everyone bled for a few minutes.

It had to be supremely made, its arches combined with the hardest of wrought in and unbreakable buns of bodies that could be attached from the side and left, rottenly so, drawing from the outer focal stratagem that was there in part. Arched in its back-palace extractor dark floating bulbous bodies but with long arched on the side arms that were part of the blood-coiled growth that erupted out of its back, its head not being present there, this organ as it was no being, having opened itself below the chest only to revealed a dropping flowing rift of gutted hardening gelatin-set of contortions which, upon hiding the base of the structure, which at this point in time had been finally stabilized in place, the limbs being crippled, it stopped growing or drawing forward. Three more of them appeared, and they made the frame for the building, as they each claimed a corner of their own. Having already established contact with the coal-shatterers, it was only a matter of time until they started working along, threading carefully on a set of pseudo forming but corkscrewed into reality alien-plants that appeared to form the stairs that would allow them to get to the higher level.

‘That’s it, I think I’m starting to see it, we should make sure there’s a large bridge extended from one side to the other, as I’m planning on, already, expanding this base into an intra system.

I want a giant square-like satellite on top of the organs, it has to be, a cargo.’

He had already planned on making it function, since those organs only grew in size as to accommodate for the entirety of the growth as well as for the incessant drawing of the larger almost rapier-signal chasers that grew from their tops.

The plant-like stairs that were formed out of the inner-seed that had been put inside the soil, inside of the first of layers began growing in, changing in twists of knots. It began drawing in the nectar of the most prime of colorful angels that were there, invisible yet they could be heard by Lasalf.

He had just arrived, with a diving message, drawing from the inner-body plume that spoke of the Higasghyio the False-Martyr had, so, prophesized of. Upon his many errands, he had established a dark perfume, he had created a scent that travelled, through space and time, and ended up there. Near one of the plant-like forms from which the twisted knots of the inner-bloatings had intercepted along the way.

Dark master of this house

At first he was but wallowing, a pale figure, on the midnight streets. His teeth but gloomily gummy worms, wriggling in place, colored but changing, his gums and wreath.

With his head kept high, despite the light, there was only eggshell white against a barely outline sun against which his red frame stood, his armor. Standing tall, his throat but sutured.

Entered upon the tavern, there he met. But every single attendee dead upon their seats, were they. Next to every killed men there stood a son, who looked exactly like him, a look-a-like.

‘What have you done to them, my children?’

But he blinked and he saw that it was not the peasants killed, but his sons. Only a figure stood in front of him, it was himself.

‘You’ve killed them!’

Was said to the accuser, to which, he but contorted back.

‘It was not me, it was you.’

The maiden said, after he shook his eyes, he realized that she was his wife, instead. Of waiting any longer, he pulled his nail-filled mace and threw it at her face, killing her but in a moment.

Then he left. Nyotholos Blood, as he is called.

He lives in eight castles.

At the entrance, eight hooded figures draw forth towards him, with spear-long blades of decapitation where the tip contorts around the wooden shaft. He is cut in eight pieces, four for the limbs, one around the neck, midriff but once, and the two sides of the chest in halves. Then they float towards the cadavers’ frames, joining them. Latching upon them, he moves towards his castle, thence comes the night.

His castles stand high, upon the peaks of a mighty blood coagulated bolted, planted roof, shaped like eight hundred submarines, with veins in them instead of torpedoes.

Every living limb but granted but refuge in his home. And every single one of them is made out of rotating hallways, down to their structural formation, like platforms hanged in the air by floating chairs on top of each of them, oozing with gravity, dripping on top the halls themselves like open taps, bleeding onto them, allowing them such a thing there is, as flight.

Most servants live on top of those platforms. They don’t eat, they only starve themselves to death every now and then until their master returns and feeds them.

Concubines inhabit every castle, and are at rest when he’s around. For they too float around the chairs, even though they hide in the recesses of dark. When they appear, they are static but move, both counterclockwise and clockwise as every limb but draws along the lines of a contortionists’ asterisk, from which they carry on, there, to serve their master. Sometimes their neck snaps but then it comes back into place. He had made them that way, in order to put up with the abuse he would cast upon them as to constantly, with every coilmotion, strike at his women without emotion, as the nails would hit but leave no mark.

Nyotholos has his way with them in front of every servant, although most of the time, the cadaver parts fail to function or bring any kind of satisfaction. Thence the ones that shake and fall, the ones that cannot look at all are made to bled above the air, much further and yet beyond.

Wretch of armor, dark servant, always speaking of evil guise; with two probes and four dark joints, in mind, had it gone along the streets, and wrought. In iron, drew on swords, four as many for every arm that came through and darkly as it were, stoned was he upon the pass. Yet with every strike, alas, he had wreathed just as much, he could. But smashing through and nastily as he were, miss-hue. Would he have gotten them, if it weren't for the thinness of the pass, he would've gotten them. As soon as soon, one peasant starting:

'Yet the munching, let's begin, a feast, a feast in the name of the king.'

'But who's the prude that's but come through and what does he do to anger the true, of all the godly ranging, our king but least of all, worthy of no mockery as there is.'

'Friend, dear friend, who looks upon all to no end, this, this is but no wrathful ruler, this thing that stands before us, as he is.

Never has but a time come where certainty was but at peace.

Four dark blades emerged, out of his wrists, hidden by verse and verse the dark wrapping in which they had been cast, for no longer praying was he, as he could not look nor abide whatever whispers he was hearing.

Waited upon the night, Servant Glagflax, of bitter tumors of the shoulders that followed, floating in the air, with eyes, reminding him of his master's sayings whatever entered him, at last.

Nose-bleed acid prevented him from trying to slit a sleeping man's throat.

'Shh, let us not be heard just yet.'

Who could forget hearing the echoes as they draw on forth and when they draw after and eat and scour the land upon their worthless husks that follow; once again they started yelling at him.

'Unless you plan on something, there's but little need to try, and fade and rot away, whatever the reason, you must act or flee away.'

'They will hear me snap his throat in sleep.'

'And you can fight all of them, you're not will equipped.

Four arms and armored, but the joints.'

'Real arms they are not.'

Yet uncannily they jerked in and out of place, then their sockets would emerge.

Its beast, the one that followed it around during the toilsome hour was the Chasurmear; that could barely be seen now.

Yet its giant palms held within then hundreds of motions, from that, which could be said. The motions being rather set; of snake-like in pipes and shot about to distance yet fattened as they drew along, bloatedly, that traveled at an unfathomable speed while being mixed in place, as if they were being shot they drew back then forth, then reseted back into place.

It carried two freezer room-compartments in its back.

And protrusions of incestuous-feature kind in sack-bubbles of floating meat, that appeared to ooze on top the dangled arms.

The beast was like a flock of insects near a hive, whereas its body, being composed of those feature-filled sacks but held the cryogenic machines attached to them in motion-static, as if they passed it sack-by-sack in a hand by hand kind of manner. While the humanoid arms kept bursting with the hundred-moving meaty tubes, all searching every single place for something to find, whereas they lay in a place that shook, as every girthed earth would.

Hleish

‘Who might listen of high regard and who to come, and when as such, might they draw breath after?’

‘Where to after, if not to reconcile with what had happened and those that, yet were there to come? I’ve seen them and have yet endured, of many moons after, yet to prove, as one would know, there was not much to go on.

Many man already have returned defeated, all but bent as low as to expected, there would’ve been no return to either of them as well as lesser being, were to come and stumble onto carcasses of their own brethren forgotten then.

Might I ask you, kindly man, what happened? In a day as such, when culling, much forgotten by such man would’ve ended up being dragged behind by them? Upon such plow one might expect to find as little more as they would show, even after, what they’ve but hidden in nasty day. When during night, their likes would not, for such sake convey, no emotion for their losses, and the men.

Many of them weak, and don’t display.

Not the slightest, direst, that to be, no emotion, as to be called, nothing even solemnly closed, to piety. They all see of different cloths, all akin but derivates in heart. That is to say, they’re all soiled, whereas one might not expect as such. All of them are ruined in such ways as one would forget, in trance as one to be. When it happens, come to me and I shall yet find such way as to defend, to make ones cower, as to, for much as there is, to see, distraught. Mighty hall and mead, though I may not yet come to offer.

I can still give you solace after, in such way that I might seek to harder, not the spirit yet of bold. Not too kindly, yet of worth. As I’ve seen you before, I would give a piece of my very soul, if it meant the men. Them and theirs, not to hide away and show what one might come to plow, among the way.

To take such unkindly life, as the ones whom would betray one’s kind. Theirs is but a suffering that brings, one cannot look away, from such disturbed as there are, wings of retribution that would sweep away, and cast as such, whatever lance and to destroy, whatever there is as such. Stance that boils but skin in passing, they would not suffer weakness, wretched casting. As they would burn each man, as they would disarm us, as to spoil, each day.

You know of all, there's little more. Need you be reminded that sometimes man has yet forgotten as each day, but counts, and every one of you amounts, to nothing as to lay but lame. I seek such thing as to avoid, prevail.

But lo, who'd listen to mighty messenger of no god? For I seek only the destruction of such enemy as one would've had him dead, on the first day and ever so on. No one might remember, thus, the glory as to forget, so on, and on as I may see. So long, to such long days, unless you act, just wait, as there are things, such agony, would've continued to spare. Not a single desperate man.

They, of all but know, to pray. They sicken me, of such a sullen god as one, they say. Would you happen to abandon all? Of much tradition overall? I fear that they might've cast, and whatever that be, I might've been, of such. I would've chosen so. I would've called, as desperately on them, as to be shown. Compassion, might, as little as they might achieve, to put me down, to a place I belong, to have never been seen. I would've chosen such instead. Anything but face the coming of this chance that might erase whatever there is and whatever is left of me. Of such a soul that may, to be, of long distraught. I would've seen it for what it is, in the past I did not.

And for my weakness I may not be as bold as to claim such suffering as I am told, to bring forgiveness onto myself, in an age that it's forgot, that they may come and stomp onto my body, ever, thereafter, that they might forget me and undergo not to call upon me as a brother but instead, but pity be, but spit. On my carcass they would see. Only the same likes as an enemy. Though we share common blood, they would wreathe me away and cast. A tainted piece in memory, something I did not and never have I come to cherish, never would I, might've seen it before, long ago, as I stand, but perish. Would I have forgiven any man, for what was done to my kin, instead, I would've taken each.

For not to stand on their feet, for I am not of such like, although there was a time I might've forgot about it, now there is not. Nor will there ever be, I cannot forget any longer, simply because of the lack of it.

I must drive whatever man there it, to pick upon quill, and broad a thing, as destiny would call upon me to wreathe and cast and lest obey, such needs, there are, along the way. I, of heart am no more pure. I of all, but stay as true. No longer such there is as to deny, cast me away, if you will from whatever heathenistic paradise you may have promised me in youth, I need no many but a few.

To cast my vengeance upon those that would draw away such blood as I would know such as there is, and knew. Before either of them came and stumbled onto me, I latch today, I see no way, no other than needed to repay these men but, to, as long as it lasts, to promise them thus. For every single dark strand of hair and effigy of lust, as cast, to the pyres we have made for them, and graves we dug along the way. To protect whichever woman's cry, and cast the enemy away, until their likens die, and much forgotten, let it rot. As they are not some that stand their own, as to remember what it was like. Never pure as they had been, never such a light would they have seen. Always were they meant to end.

But lo, behold, so would we, if we allowed each end, and every arm to fall. They would not stop at anything, nor would they allow such solace as there is to push and lest of all, would I endure, their voices listen, there they come.'

But, lo behold, no one at all. Whom would even, much to come? In such direction, as there'd be none? Neither man but such likes dames, those of whom but triggered youth, those of mighty day, as they might've understood, such pity, to let them leave. For each one's beauty might've seen the last strand of light, for everything that happened after that, would they had come to see.

'I see each day, I can't believe. There's nothing, but a fallen face and one that stoops down as our enemy behaves.

We have greeted them in mighty rank. We have given them as such, it was, but lesser house. Be as such, they would've found, a way, a stance, to draw us back, as they would and as they may, they never stood a chance, lest of all, would they convey.

Such pity as there is, there is no other thing such peace. On and on, as mighty as they are, shall come, or whence they find out, during such and such, the storm.

When there is and when the time and when they follow after, and every single time one sees. They would but cast away, and lest of all would they find no peace, within themselves, unlikely. Many of those invited in our rankings, were it as it may, might find. Each of them but culling our most darkest fears and opening the gates, for, our enemies would not permit it any other way as such.

Would we falter and lest of all, would we but fall. Not a single day would, and after, pass without our kind be lost. That and for that reason, such, is it that I seek, only retribution for those whom smelt of such defeat, but listen.

I seek only their heads, be taken and placed on top their beds. Split in halves and made to be, like meat, milk and bothersome cheese. I would but cast away, each globe of blood. Their likes are something, the likes of which I would've never had, nor would I have ever yet invited in my home. Never to have them sit upon my throne, not to bend such thing and such, I, not to despair, would've seen them, mighty entrance.'

No valley had ever looked the same, not a single strand of ice, or dame, nothing of the beauty after, nothing of what was left before or ever, as it was after. Nothing to remind to man, that what he had, to him to his name, would but stay as such. No one to recall what happened, long before or after that. It saddened no creature, for all was left but yet again in shambles, and too cold. For many could not live there, and even long before, and rightly after, before, to know it, so, it was no longer their home. Bastardized beyond belief, one would find himself no longer content if that was such, much beyond it the relief. That they had died as well. For who to take care of the lesser races once they found themselves but spoilt and ever-drawing, never gnawing at each other any longer than they did before. Long ago, one would've culled an eye. They might've known what it was like, but who to carry such legacy if all the merry men are dead? And those much bolder, yet such, stronger, left before and never would retort. As to return, as to come back to life, during a time their ancestors were met with such cowardly stance as no one much expected, to have ever seen.

'I remember such a thing, but flee. I cannot but see. Such as there is, pity after pity, but not a single man offers to help. It's in their veins but they cannot see as such, what I see, instead.

They see me as nothing more, and nothing less than a madman, to that, to which I must confess. I but a buffoon they call, they have forgotten me already, and I cannot stall. I need not wait, I need not be forgotten, as they draw on ahead. They spat, and already I forgot.

Whom were they? Of whom to trust, whom were the men I used to call brothers and what happened to them, alas? No one will speak to me, no one to remember, no one to have served, if such is the likes, of any blind man's desire, yet to falter, it's all they know. Not a single one carried on a blade.'

Then and from there on out he went. As to know, where to build a mighty house, but whom to join him, as there were no more maidens after that, all were but expected to be. As such as hardy men, as they would see, there is no such reason, as to wait. Who will remember and who might satiate? Such need as to keep the scrolls and every word on each parchment, or each stone, or bronze age artifact, they melt.

What does that say of the future then? It says naught and as there is, one forgot already what there was.

Scum of dark ages, they had come, and of lesser things, they are inhuman, yet again looking, they pretend as such. So much so, as to be alike, but all would know and all would stay away from them. No one should but show after, no one might come to throw of such a day.

'Lo, and lay, and see to it that you may go away, from wherever one may see himself and never, to regain, in trance, or be forgotten, for each action will earn their bastardly suffering after.'

Nearer to one of the Belligerent kingdoms

Hardly was there anything else they could point towards and make a fuss, not likely, by any means would they be capable of distinguishing a hit from a plain hit at the side, but they could always try their hands in time.

'You allude to such destruction, yet I am Beam-Allug, and I bring forth something as I've but drawn it, as to prove, my loyalty comes from a place in bowels not in mind.'

As he's eaten but a part of her, as he was set, alike. Pieces of a head-set, all but merging and emerging during which the challenger fainted, largely, as elated, he had brought forth, in the poyett, a single speck of shattered into pieces blade.

'I've come to stare at this.'

Allug squatted, squandering about. In an attempt to get a better shot of it, he wondered, at that.

'I could never understand what triggers this in my mind, instead, why I've come to understand what's going on in your head. It's that simple. You've previously accused me of treachery.'

'I've come to ask something of you, nothing more.'

‘We’re alone, and I’m playing with a shiny wheat, left of what’s been left out of a shiny blade. Upon the trims of which there rests a finger that’s been bled, now and certainly long before, as you would’ve known it, if you had paid any attention to what’s been said of it.’

‘I’m listening now, Allug. There’s no court and there’s never going to be one, by the decree of the pardon that’s been issued, you are free to go wherever you want and do as you please, instead of wasting your time around the darkest of holes you pitied yourself against. But you are incapable of moving on.’

‘How could I move after being disgraced in such a manner in front of so many people, of so many castles, of so many holds, of such courtesy as I was granted, as I’ve and my likes had been invited there, to attend such dates, and reveries. In front of the people I’ve met along the road and those that I’ve but spied upon with such darkened a queerly-a-pivoted eye.

Most of them leave me now, neither of them grant me any solace or embrace when we are met. It’s as if I am forgotten to them.’

‘And for that reason, and for that act of treachery, I have been guilty and ashamed of accusing you.’

‘A hypocrite after all, like all the men who live inside this kingdom, but that is unsurprising and for the same reason you’ve told me that, I adhere to no embrace of forgiveness that’s come from you instead.’

‘What’s it to be, Allug?’

‘I fancy that there’s a time I’m never to achieve, or reach, as to the likens of the greater kings that built this country in their wake.

I choose to waste in here, in the pits, where I may fight forever and may waste no wit, and tattle upon naught more, jaunting, that may be, I want someone to come along and claim my life.

But in such a way that I will have earned it, for all the sins I have committed along, to which you stand proudly there renouncing whatever sympathy towards our laws there are. As to be forgiven in a place of pain, where they have granted such a star to a man without a mind.’

‘That is our king you’re talking about.’

‘And the same man who granted you a pardon, who would not have done the same for I.’

‘So you are petty, as to even come onto me and receive a fight, to fiddle with.’

‘I’m not listening any more, nor shall I, how could I, in any case, after what I’ve been through, as for the. And you almost caught me again, in your miserable net, in your fanciful ploy of gifts and toys.’

‘You’re still a child playing with sticks and stones.’

‘And that’s where I shall remain and that is what I’m going to do from here on out, and then again. How could I be stopped from this eternal dream, now that I’m made aware of who I am?’

As the man left, he considered this as well, the man to whom he will once lose his life against and to.

Ployshkelaar would be the one.

As they had called on him before its time had again, been drawn upon, began to sign. Being of resin; it squabbled itself out into view as out of cock-pit filled with dark sinew, ever-lasting in a dream of strained along puckers that had consumed much of his life. There were only so little, fewer puddles that were yet again attached to him and gone, would they be, within the hour. Would they had sung his name and ever after? Was he to recall as such, there was only one pioneer, much distraught who stumbled on his dark feet praying, many of his arms, dark signs conveying. As it happened for the tallest, grand, much of what was rottenly gone, they he started forming them again. Looked up from down there, a fall, deadlier than, whatever blow-of-organs any rapier would've taken before him, before the fall and deep within him. Had he known this would happen, he'd call. Of such, forgotten grounds on which he rested upon, once he hiked down and joined the man. If that's what he could be called then, who feared, as a matter of fact, how darkly the being was, before him and before them, it stood, chained as such, with many pearl-like things attached, beaded were the things connected, out of chest, then, and therefore, had they yet again emerged. Out of the pitiful thin prick, that wasn't seen, the covers were barely holding. But he'd live. As mighty, was his helmet turned by a bloated cry, whom followed through, deaden-birds of morrow-kind. Many of whom carried such as was, respite of battle. Eight wars had been fought again and rightfully after, yet not a single man would've have had, if that were the chance, turned around and took his place. Agony-arrogatory, irrigation of bloody rape, it smelled of it.

'How many women have been taken from us?'

'Not many, sir, as I would suspect, oh, dire as you, have you yet become a god?'

'I'm still to merge, if hope there is, with what's left of me, out there, as long as I'm at peace, there won't be such a thing for me to search for.'

'When will you happen to come after if that's the case? For what's left of the darker days in the gallows of reverse already beckons for another head.'

Or at least another than the one floating, above and beyond, with each beckoning thing that comes, beyond, reverse limbs floating, in such swim-like formations, as one would find himself financing with girths. Doing as to adhere to such things, as to be forgotten before each torn-up, worse, and worsened as such, were the days when women followed after men in trance. Sacrificing themselves to the greatly-formed building that grew upon what had remained of him. Harrowing figures, all of whom were such conjoined as to be now abandoned as the last of boils from which Ployshkelaar had emerged out of. With every turn, as quick, and at his feet, with every bobbling of his head, as to quickly draw after, would he be met by no more than what he found as less, with every darkened ask as such tormented-arm, and leper-talon that, out of him drew as blot, would he be met again. Another bow from another servant whom had yet to realize what happened after that.

'I have long since prophesized that they would take them away. But you needn't worry about it any longer, for as long as I'm alive, as long as I'm awakened since, from my deep-slumber from the hibernation-sleep, I shall help. And endow upon you, the alulae of the dark.'

Wretched evil, such as pox and pus, as I have come to remember, about my past; when I had been a part of them, during lays and such evils as I, would've pained myself to go through.'

‘Thence, where shall we go, forth, leader of such bringers as there are, and where shall I find such peace, as there is, in a land as such?’

‘You must obey the need of celebration first. We shall bow.’

To which both of them were joined now.

It was a meaningless gesture. Empty. But after spending what seems to be an eternity in that blasted thing, which was nothing but a boiled cyst in the body of the deadly conjoined giants, there was nothing to hope for any longer, let alone, would one consider this.

A silence caused by a silent whip, of a dusted wind, of sanded snores. As if the land itself was resting on another one of their brothers who was resting, such, no more and who could blame that desperate cry? For there was another man out there, readying himself to death; wasting his body in a land like Nlahej, Nleuhij, Nnnuhliurn, a thing without a name. Whereas their bodies could not waste away, unless they wanted to end up being absorbed again and spend another eternity, creating another boil.

‘Even dead men have to be given the solace of not suffering as well.

Come on, we shall go from this point on and search for one of the darkest places we may find not only solace but plan our next move. So we may.’

As mysterious as the many handed strangers had been, upon drawing back the cowl, it was a woman, a female, that had been wearing the face of a land-sprawl. She took it down, it bled away. Even to this day. He’s still questioning how did one of them snick in without him realizing what happened, rightfully so before his day could ever-draw near and come after.

He was made uncomfortable now but he joined her nonetheless, as there was nothing he could truly do to drive her away in the process he brought upon himself. Such was his release.

Driven through the night in a land-rover; a cart-machine, sand-go-through the car-apparatus. With wings, on both sides, which were made of many growths that looked like him and had back-legs upon which they walked, both of them; the car was kept on an incline above the ground, like a slave holding a giant fan, preparing to lift it as to get his master’s temperature lower, the sides of it bore the pseudo-wings, which were arched in the back like cricket-grasshoppers, and even more curved in the middle. And they were sticking, but not at their finger-tips, which were like inflated straw-hose spears, that had a high-way area, composed of a few meters, that completely curved as to allow both of them to stand on them and never fall. Both of them walked back and forth. A giant eye appeared on the rover, but it had appeared only, and only appeared when Ployshkelaar blinked, over the fraction of a second. If he kept an eye open and closed, the eye on the rover would not appear. If he kept an eye open and tried blinking with the other one, only half of the rover-eye would appear. He hated women; but he had to save them. For now he entertained the idea of being in her presence. Even though she was a slave, to him, to his wishes and to his personal needs. He could have his way with her if he wanted. It was what he wanted, he was drooling and the drool was sandy like, and got caught between the limbs that were fornicated drilled out of his gelatin-hardened great unnaturally formed mouth, the great tormentor of dreams, that being, the essence of hopelessness that seeped into existence. His face was just as rooted into the jaw-ballista thing that cackled. Eight pair of teeth, all corkscrewed, did he have hundreds of limbs in the back? It only looked like a pile of worms put together. That pile of limbs even looked like the illustrated figure, as if seen on coffee or the after-image of a carpet of the lord and savior, which shall not be named, or an eerily similar figure to his. Regardless of it, she feared him, but lusted for him, as any woman with a right mind would.

They stopped, during their travel in one of the closest touched-upon grovel-pimples of sand-bunker-raised top of to-live in platforms, -of clay, -of iron, -of cartilage, -of joy, -of –there was something lodged into the side, in the innards of the structure they entered, that being a card. It was the ten of hearts card. Beating in place, like ten hearts; it was moist and pucker and touchable, like she was. As he entered her; making love. To her. As it had been as it was felt, as what it felt like, to make love to her. Sad.

During the morning he had gone out hunting, trying to make amends for the time he had spent into the destroyed anathema of grounds, the poisoned girth of land-gravel of sand-travelled upon filaments that were buried into hardened things like the embodiment of demonical nightmares, made of bowels and cries.

From on top his chest there came a spear, of many languages as well, as it was fashioned out of a diseased scepter, he had inherited. But there were no words he could write on. Being illiterate and all; that either meant he couldn't read or that he could not write, in either case, he could not fathom the disease-distress that was provoked by the sounding of the malignant glory-sounds, echoes of the darkest depressions that shot from below. Many of whom beckoned for him to join them, as to steal the artifact he had carried inside of him all along.'

'Allow us to make such thing, as you of all would've found it wreathing at our feet. We would've had as much, for you alone an offer made in, leper-trance.'

'Who are you, and whence have you yet, had come? And of what land have you become?'

'Part of the one you're touching, look ahead, if you will to see it marching:'

They had pointed with unseen rings of many wreathed-around their key-chained stings, as often as it could be said.

It was a sign of weariness he could not take or draw away from, being of a wasted day that were never as it came to pass. How many members of his species had walked on these plains?

It used to be so simple. Much simpler than it was before, not only tracking them down, but. Dreaming-with your eyes wide-open; seeing them ascend or descend as you'd hope and cheer on for them. Many of the swollen broken-by shore stones were fairer than that. Many of them shattered and cracked, by the lust of a dustless sea, a landmass that's empty. Standing by his side; there had been weak winds, that almost swept aught away, ever so weakly, but still no print along the way. A tool of gems, and fearfully nicked by shades and leashes, where he found it on the ground, the scepter almost hollow. Only marks where they had been. A bloody perched upon it nick of steel. They had a moving forge with them, brought from somewhere in the far, much closer to the western slopes, where they had cradled such sleeping giants, such as the one he had been in, but living. Coddled like children, as they would not shatter, crack and feel, the parching of the land, by lack of water and of what would happen if they simply let go. It was not to be forgotten that such dolts lived in stone, sand-caravans and helmeted coifs, gone.

‘Who’s the one hiding in there?’

‘A pluck-wonder, they’ve pulled it from, the garden. ‘

‘What is the Garden Geoghan?’

‘Wretched thing where they grow out of, in-between and much farther, so much farther, lest of all, below the earth-like catacombs, which.’ He’s yet to tell him of the moment, by basking under the swollen purple road, whose glow is that of a filtered sun, whose stones adorned on each-both side, whose ever present, all-compressing, and after-a-while of so much pressing, onto, lopsided, ‘s shattered ceiling crevice-halvened, covered such eye-blinding rose, as soon after as he could be bothered to rejoin, itself by the echoes that reflected inside of every single Troy, of whose walls, the horse, and gaps outside, from where the light of the road came out of, projected onto his swollen by attrition wait, at the back of which, darkness failed to satiate whatever wonder his mind was filled with, curiously in search, upon, slowly being carried out, it was that piece out of the upper segments that guarded him, from being fully blinded on, upon having been caught forcefully, stared, outwardly up-front, having lessened the strains of his eyes, which in turn, have finally alleviated whatever chance there was, that he might die from blood-starvation, as his queerly-defunct body could not hope, starving while heedlessly surviving, in a matter of fixedly in place, stapled in like a statue or one who’s been turned into stone upon having made contact with a lurid sun that was the road, by passing men that threaded along, their vigilance having caught him head-on, hence the twist, sandy hourglass of each eye, deliberately being slowed down, as chains lifted, lowered, anchored, in frightful rancid-lance, a matter for ever-drawing, being drawn to them, as they call onto him, now, that he has come to realize after, that they were the farmers, whose livelihoods belong to the garden, in which case, he decided not to do something perilous. As it happened, he drew on, farther, much to him and closure, they put him in a bastardly basin, they called The Roder, a dark cart, he was put on, with his head between the long-device, that reshaped his body until he looked, part, machine, below, the square was thin, and part a beast, as they had previously slain some dogs they drenched and found along, of wretch-resin, and cradle-gong. An awkwardly shaped – both sides as well, but not there, but of winds, in which his shoulders were both pulled-release; also shot in front, he was set in flight, and hairy at that, with a body filled with talon-claws –porcupine placed, but with elongated reeking, in a way that one would think as drenched, made for assault. His shoulders were but flat. Missing cubes or small boxes could fit quite nicely in those gaps, if it weren’t for the constant pull-release. Which only signaled the strange eely-feel, skin; Geoghan didn’t tell him about that part of the tale, for he was now Geoghan, but his servant who looked like him, that had been grown, and give life to, out of the cart they carried. And they had done this ever-as-such and never before would they have done it if they had known.

They scoured the country for such hidden caves, the servants of the Purple-sun Glowing Road. It was a bastardly doing, choosing him as their lord as well, since, with everything taken into account. Some things should not be discussed.

Not in the front where one might leer as to find himself near it.

But bastardly hope, they were left with the ‘Garden’ filled with lesser hope.

And no more baiting men to find such caves as to stumble onto them, no; that was way too time consuming and the 'Garden' could only take so many of these things, let alone, many more than followed after. Worst of all is that they weren't even.

Not all of them were floating on strange machines, but on horse-backs, fully made. A man was also connected, or his lower side, to himself. And four legs crisscrossed almost carpet-muncher scissorlike.

'So, who are you supposed to be?'

'I am Plathihdfagharn' Illmenac Rheto Ollander from Hohguymesh Dadda.'

'Is that truly your real name?'

'Of course not, are you a moron or something?'

'Yes, please explain to me then, why did you lie to me?'

'It's because I could see from a mile away that you're a knuckle dragger. I can smell it, it's like looking at blacks, you just know.'

'And you somehow, thought it acceptable to exploit me?'

'How is that exploiting when I only. Look I wasn't going to take any advantage over you, or anything.'

'Then why did you lie to me? Now I can't actually trust you any longer.'

'I'm sure you can, close your eyes.'

'I won't.'

'You just did.'

'Only for a second now, you don't just.'

It was all so tiresome. Having to go through or hear all of these 'conversations' go along. All too tiresome; that strange magical device they were thrown in must've done something to their mind.

Above them lay a great platform, like a chessboard, whose four corners were pointy, strange-pointy, like flat-arrow metal sheet triangles on an incline, all pointing at the middle. Like folding the corners, but they were attached to them instead; they would've made strange card game's triangles. It looked decent.

But on top of it, three inter-connected gait fingers that bore defibrillator depression in, everywhere on them. In these craters lay hundreds of bodies, and for every single one, lay, many termite-shaped mutant cocoons with long, elongated helicopter spinners. Of course, these stalk-beams coming out were like giant hairs that were all outlandishly curved and popping out of the main frame of the defribdepressions, out of their empty crater-sockets. Making it look like a small uglily set jerking in all directions shaking-forest. Or like dangling palms that grew lilipads because of how fast the 'wings' spun; the finger-like frames also bore hook-cords that were attached to the main body, that was kept still-connected, welded, to the check board that lay around it. Like ropes holding a balloon, but. They went around the rectangle-shaped depressions, and seemed to be avoided by the wildly shaking stalks, so as to not cut them off.

The entire platform was organic, and there stood a door, inside this livid structure.

Clarke L'Esskleslhohnherr, High Monarch of the 'Garden lived in there with his many wives, all of whom were dead; whew, he dodged a bullet there. Imagine that, a few hundred of them at the very least. No running water. No windows and despite the presence of the constantly spinning wings, the smell was completely locked in. Every passing day:

He clothed and put lipstick on their faces. On all the wrong places; his face looked like it said 'I skin women alive.'

A pair of monarch butterflies came in, all four bodies- the grabbable area of the sword, in a great pumping caterpillar condom, wingless. But a small forest of fungi for their crown.

They came to visit him, and feed on the body of one of his wives, which was slowly being, forcefully levitated towards them, in a mummy-wrap of winds. In front of him, they ate her. By her being sliced apart. But lo, behind her, there was a dark child. Like a puddle of coal, covered in a coat of copper, sold because someone thought him a nigger. Upon wriggling his tiny arms, the woman was made to disappear in front of their eyes. Yes, you go, nigger-child, go get them. Good boy, he thought of the lad.

'Did you adopt him?'

'I think you got it the wrong way, and frankly I'm surprised you'd take me for one. But no, I didn't 'adopt him.' He is my slave. And if I remember correctly, this is a thing my father said onto me when I was a child''Son, I am going to grab a belt and beat you until you're dead'' by the way, I'm doing as hard as an impression of what he sounds like as possible, but I think he sounded this way ''Son, I am going to beat your mother but first let me remind you what she sounds like, something like this ''Come on now Clarke, something might happen if you let your guard down, but let me remind you something your grandfather told you now''''I am a deformed memory, an embodiment of many put together voices that shall somehow ruin your mind with malignantly deformed echoes, all of these voices unfathomably mixed''''You have finally drawn me out, the malicious voice of that to come, wreathed in this amalgamation, spake as I might in may such disturbed a voice, I am your father, I am your mother, your child, I am the voice of everyone, I am the one who's forcefully decayed, who has become, beyond the means of likes, as such convey, I am to be taken, you're to hear. Please, my dear, you should go into the other room and wait there while your father's beating me, you should. Don't talk to him woman, don't you fucking dare talk to him that way. Don't turn my child against me. I hear you, and you hear me now, but as there things your mind can recognize in this mix? Is everything all right now, is everything all right, my dear friend. Is everything fine with you, Clarke? Your child is getting away, Clarke. MY dear, dear boy, my dear, dear boy, come on now, give your grandmother a kiss. This is god, talking to you, come on, now boy, you must do as I say, you must do as I will. Come on, now, you must. Stop being so paranoid and let someone in your home. How many of these women have you killed, how many of them. I think I'm starting to feel, ill. My head hurts, where is my slave? My child, but you have turned away from, me, I am your father, how come you have not recognized me. You see now, that I, Manno, have fully taken hold over your mind, and filled it with such, filth benign as thou wilt have opened such gate

They stared at one another for some reason.

The man in the blue corvette checked the board again. Various other names were scrawled, by a mechanical board with something here and there, always of a mind as Hector was to ask.

‘When am I to be taken back, to, you know where. I, want to dream again, I want to wake up in a much greener biome, a dome of grass and verdure where I can freely run in search for someone, anyone that might grant me the solace of spending time with them, inside.’

‘You’re kept under extreme isolation, you know the rules. No outside, no dreaming, no imagining what life on the other side is. Only this, and this is what you’re left with.’

‘A stinking platform playing pong, nothing more, I want to get out and experience something else.’

‘I’m afraid this is as much as you’re going to get, unless you come with me, Hector Armstand.’

Feeding time came early as well, the plate he brought was an aquarium-with food inset- stored in four cylinders merged with the piece. A refrigerator-flat with the roundness of a carved in- rectangle, made by the giant engineers, during the spare time they took off, to make it.

Could you pull one out for me? He thought of asking, but he was tired, that’s the price of living decaf, sad and tired. They were like thermoses, but attached to the aquarium.

Plus, he didn’t enjoy interacting with them for a good reason.

Down the elevator shaft, entered through a large warehouse shaped like the backside of a rifle, out of which lay a disgusting down-ward on an incline landslide with various others. Power-tents dark, metal-plated and the sides, giant quill-openings, dug as if by larvae in the body of dirt. This ‘camp’ inside the bowels of the earth was filled with these strange dorms, empty barracks, dead-houses, where lived the gloom-machines of wonder. His chiefs, servants and officers; as well, also a weird giant flying head-like small ship like but actually organic elongated mole head-thing with one giant eye shaped bubble on one side, a smaller one like a tick, with a projected arm-length, thin as to look like an actual arm, talon-contorted jaw with its soft splurgy teeth pointing down. It also bore a tube-ball with pointy hands inside of it, all being spun, raffles. No winners.

‘And you want me to return to that, huh?’

‘Only for twenty years or so, then, we’ll let you leave.’

The weird mole creature spins around the barracks for no other reason but serve itself as an incessantly driving annoyance to every machine which is frankly, constantly driven to frustration by it.

‘Do you want to at least check out what’s been happening?’

‘Won’t my food grow cold?’

He looked again at Moncey.

‘It’s well stored, just look at it. The food plate it’s made out of had a heat-regulator inside that’s only been partially damaged by the folding. It should be fine, as long as, you know.’

‘How does the elevator work?’

‘Why are you asking me that?’

‘Because it’s on a platform that’s on a moving body of “water”.’

‘The elevator’s like a gun inside the mouth of a giant demon that swallows it in another dimension. Then we’re transported in the warehouse.’

‘All right, let us leave then.’

They both entered the pill, then, as it happened, they entered the gun holster back of the rifle shaped warehouse they were brought to. They had been awaited for a while now.

‘Can I have those nice boots please?’

‘Go ahead kid, knock yourself off.’

Near some of the storage boxes by his side, and by the side of one of the bigger trunked ships, rested two great greaves, with long-toe-raft-stretches that looked normal, but, the base slowly became a bloated fat-gut- that held a gothic like statue of a vulture-creature with laurels and leaves behind its head. And a bone-cartilage grab a blade like formation that looked like a pseudo revolver clicker. Although the whole thing looked like.

‘It’s not a boot.’

‘What is it then?’

‘There are blades inside, I could’ve crippled myself if I put them on. How come you haven’t warned me?’

But she was not heard.

Weird as it were the giant elongated raft upon which rested the four-bridged connected cities housed a thin perched piece of wood, like a tail of metal, wrought and bloomed, with dirt and two surrounding gardens, all kept on that raise. A front piece if it were a ship, with a stairway, leading to it, along the way. A single bulby-livid ‘street-lamp’ with a giant sloop-like formation, pointing down, at the end of which an egg-like glower-like a firefly- creature, but stuck between the moss-lich garden. Jerking eerily back and forth, whereas, as far away, the four great cities were, four Babylonian towers, yet conical, witches’ hats, iron mountainous as well as they produced, trails of stove-like smoke along the side of the sky. And they had bridged as well, hung, up there, higher above, all along, for every few hundred miles, many houses adorning each towering pantheon that held, teeth above each window-blind, and window-open, for the widows, down to see. Far were crops, devourers of wheat, as many, forming the inner-feet, along which threaded watchers. Many formations but candle-wax but made of plenty broth els’.

Aught one to realize that, least of all would it not stand. That applied for every single one. For the ‘platform’ was but deeply set, much concave to it, farther down depressed, like a garden spade, the handle yet infested by a glowing worm as well.

And the people who lived inside; many of them not only kind, but they lived merrily by each other’s sides.

A man did rose, he called the bed:

‘What has come of them? My friends, whom likes are dead?’

His head a giant bulky mass, like a cudgel fat with porous crass, with three long finger-wings for ‘toes’, but the fat also head a long enough throat to bear, almost a swan, but headed like a man, with the long nose straight, and shaped, a paddle. And the handle of a blade-like rooster’ saddle, sprouting out his head, but made to be as pushed inside as well. With two glowing emeralds for eyes; dressed in strange patterns, his robe was storm and tears taken from on top the sky.

‘They’ve been given as for great exchange, and many of them have yet to feel such dark embrace as would they fear going out for cold.’

‘Yore, man, whom has not happened to deceive me yet, tell, why? For what reason was there such need, as to betray my only, made of skin?’

‘Is it not reasonable yet to ask?’

That this man may be given an answer, immediately, without such things as would have his yet to be demise?’

Many men sitting as their tables nodded. Of greenery violet- and many sparks of colors after. Fires were lighted, in honor of the woe.

An answer was given, for twas not yet for sough.

‘We were overrun by ill-choice gaunter, if we weren’t to give them quickly as such and even faster, they would’ve had our beds. They would’ve had us slept in such debt, as to run amok when venture’s trigh.’

‘And has not a single man in these halls considered telling me so? Asking for verdure when naught might be taken from me?’

‘No.’

Retorted Lamyhern, the knight whose face was an uglily potato giant-lance off the left side of his face, with a peculiar rectangle of squirming cartilage desk-protrusion that had a half-globe like moving organ sticking out of it. Whose eyes were giant, in-sockets, deep, as in five or so centimeters, a broken by a barb-wire boxing glove shattered lower jaw-cranial mass.

Resting on top of a normal appearing torso but set on an inward incline, with a throat made of many put together thoraxes, thinly veiled, elongated as well. Bearing no triceps or shoulders, but strange cartilage oblong surgeons-headlight formations, four of them, connected out of which thin-bone like starved arms came out of. Its torso looked like a pseudo siren, or had a leg ripped off, but bore no pelvis. Sutured almost, but it was natural, to a second head-like formation, a pregnant womb, covered in four black bands, wire-thin with long stick-like things sticking out, placed in a home garden alignment.

Which made the transition to the lower side of its body awkward since they all looked piled in, fixing your pants but with various other materials taken from lower-quality repurposed thrown outs. That lead to satyr like giant caveman’s meal meat-cub, walking on thin bone-chips he was. His one redeeming quality being that this beast always walked covered in stinking blood.

The two men were then met, as close as they could possibly get to one another, without making too much noise around them.

It was a squirming below the chest watermelon with stick bugs blacks moving appendages trying to pince something, as crabs do.

Below them, one level:

Large man of decay appear:

He walked like a crippled man, when all of the sudden one of his spider-like wings, stoppers as if pulled from a rollercoaster car, instead. Drew from somewhere in the air, a puffy ball of power, with this strange pipe-of his-filled with cartilage bower. It glowed, then set. It drew ahead. And then aimed at his chest, a pop of energy drew, from far ahead, it grew and then devoured. Ate him after, growth; an electric power-glow. Like a small nuke it exploded but only as far as a sphere-balloon, having encompassed half of his chest, the shoulders, his head and the other limb, immediately vaporizing himself, then fell, the rest of the limbs. The body then fell and bled. And the back appendage, what had remained of it, kept him slightly raised.

‘All those arms, fore, thine desire, naught. Nothing will make that corpse walk. Nothing shall grant you immortality in thine dark vein.’

Broken tank

‘I think I can get it started again, give me a moment, will you?’

‘Make sure it won’t crack under pressure, that’s all I’m asking. I’ve seen them come and go plenty of times, with the gas-fuel spilling in the little cracks, here and there.’

It was already spilling on the floor from the looks of it. But it hardly mattered. They were both incapable of self-deceiving one another as to know what was going on there. The tank had caved in. Part of its sullen piece got as splattered as the side of an egg, with little more to it than necessary being left out in the open. By then, the toxic-viscosity had already contaminated both men.

‘We should’ve grabbed a hold of a pair of protection suits.’

‘I think we might’ve gotten one or thrice if it weren’t for you now.’

‘I’m afraid that won’t do, I don’t think there’s ever been a reason before or now, that would make me consider it. ‘

‘Not even this?’

As soon as he could finish blinking, he saw right through, an unfathomable mass of fallen apart-cradled together features that were already symbiosed with the few seeds he had been lodging inside his brow and forehead, over the last twenty or so hours. It was a task that was unfathomably hard, as it started gnawing away, piece by piece, extracting them that being. Hardly a matter of reason any longer, as he'd pulled out an array of many lesser pieces, including a missing eye, a few broken teeth and, as well as beady lines of some unnaturally formed straw that gnawed away at his hand as soon as he let go of them. He was set on trying to eat at it, but failed. Whatever was left of his respiratory system already began falling apart just as soon if not much quicker than before.

'You know there's nothing in there, right?'

'I could tell, there used to be life in it, before the tank got shattered, but now.'

There was not. A cow's heart with a beacon strip and a large stripped knife glaive filled with circular-set barnacles appeared to be their company. It was drawing some of the fluid out of the floor with the help of its glaive-skull protrusion, through which it began eating as much of the pollution as it could. It fed on it most bastardly, from one side of the other, being droned to clasp, its talons spread apart, and pointing. Ever drawing north and south, before it went on pointing at the adjacent areas of the walls; many of the ones that were taken apart only revealed something of the warehouse they were in.

Various, much taller, bulkier, broader tanks were being moved from one side of the room to the other, always trying to push themselves past a point where it was unneeded to do it.'

It was a sky receptor, without the means of making it function, it would be lost.

'This thing, inside this ocean, what's it do?'

'We've managed to transfer them, all the way from up here on reeling-in platform once we were done connecting the two of them together. I see no reason to hide it, sweep it over. It's been documented already.'

'By whom, I thought there were only a few people present in here, to actually pin things down. I thought I heard something before, but it's never been confirmed, has it?'

'Mickiya, there's something inside one of the tanks I need you to see.' As if a child left by hand, he was lead by him to one standing forth, between the two of them, split open. As if of oil, there stood a single floating drop of black blood that lay there, between the two of them. IT would not make a difference whatsoever, to draw too much, but it was what he claimed it to be.

'An ocean, but how?'

'The sear has been churning in and out for a while now. Don't be surprised by what's happened here, as to forget what we've yet to find a way to burn it all down, to refill our planet's landmass or give rise to anything at all, other than, a single missing oyster, look.'

This black ocean bubble was imperfect. Solid, even in tar, but missing a giant oyster which left its ruminating mark, lodged in.

Bear flickered his wrist watch, causing one of its tongues to get dislodged at its side, catapulting itself soon after only to find itself lodged in his own eye, crawling past the eye-lid trench as it entered its eye, taking the mid-most centrifugal place inside his iris, before it began spinning in place, creating, instead, tiny pretty images of clocks all over the place, which, all held, inside of them, his most unnerving childhood memories which included him being beaten, violently, repeatedly, on top a counter, his father's car's hood, by savages and by wild tall machines which accompanied the outlaws, a few soldiers and by bloated Elephant man but Dolphin instead, hybrids made of large tumors that whipped him as well with barb-wires as well as guns. He had been shot several times, in his heart and brain, his face, then his leg, whereas, when suddenly some sirens began screaming out, coming out of shade, the tall dark oozing shadowy great horned figure, before it could even get the chance to join in, had already made its way towards one of the closest bushes it could land near, in order to flee as far as possible. Bear Clesh still remembered that time, when it happened. It was something beyond wildly forgettable, and it seemed the least of times he suffered, especially since there was close to naught he could do about it now.

It was a black pebble for him, to which he showed just as little to no interest whatsoever since he had yet to feel anything even remotely close to. A leisurely Apostle's deacon's yellow yell-shout, time had come to leave about, gone, for the hour. Mittiek was forced to leave with twenty or so tanks lodged inside the hood of his car. They were all widely set and emerging, even though not a single crack had been made inside.

He was being followed, checked the rear-mirror by the side. Large body, longer neck, whose head was a double hammer-growth with larger puckery-twists inside of, lodged in to a fault. A caved-in mouth whose teeth were taken out and showing; but what stood out, despite its many volatile limbs that were clearly horns and stings, was the fact that its armored metallic chest bore a circled emblem-stuck in. Stuffed with metal bolts and means of self-destruction; the GOV and the army were paying an especially close enough attention on him. Not to something he would regret.

A radio, turned off. No channel alive. Readjusted the mirror twice and still on track. The traffic was low but it was slowly being cleared off by now; they knew whom it was after.

'Weatherglass cloud-veins, I see. There's plenty bloody bodies sinking in the cold-dead seas.'

But not an ocean properly shattered, at least not a single one gone put through so much abuse that one could see what's happening on the other side. It made him reconsider why he was there to begin with. Or why he worked for them. First stop, a gas station. He had at least eighteen hours ahead of it, as, it moved that slow.

'Twenty marks markeers merks.'

'Isn't that a bit too expensive, surely you're overcharging me for some.'

'No shit, have you see the size of that thing? In case you haven't noticed, not even the thieves think it worth risking their lives for it.'

You left your car widely open, for anyone to come and go. Mate, there's no one with half a mind even going a mile off that thing, while that being's after you. So, pick your poison as to why I'm charging you extra for what's happening here.'

'Make me understand.'

‘We’re risking our lives trying to “help” you. That’s why.’

‘Fair enough, but I’ve got plenty of time to think it over. Sell me short, I want, a discount.’

‘A discount over the already over-priced shot in the other direction, you’re not gonna make it, you realize that, right? On your own, I mean, you may as well just make a valuable donation to us for having taken pity over you. Because, we have families to feed and water.’

‘Are they plants?’

‘Don’t be a smart-ass boy. I could put you down in a moment’s edge.’

‘You’ve got a knife you, bizarre. You planning on using it on me?’

‘Only if you’re being difficult, Mittiek.’ Name-tag read. It was on the eye.

‘I don’t like where this is going, I could get angry you know? If I got angry, I would smash your face right in the counter. Why are you alone?’

‘My wife died.’

‘I’m sorry to hear that, but you don’t have to pour your anger onto me. You’re projecting a lot and I feel as if I’m being personally targeted by your incessant verbal abuse. I don’t want to kill and slit your robitious throat where it stands, but I could do it, even before you got the chance to pull out your blade.

I’m a dangerous man, trained to kill.’

Time is running short, as you can see, my friend, but I won’t make something out of this. The Oceans were awaiting after all; and one of them had already been sunken past a point whereas it would be unacceptable for it to draw air again, in part:

‘It’s your turn, but know that ice moved differently in here, since the temperature had made it yet begun-retort. As to change the likings of the vapor themselves, beneath this place, a factory, it’s of little worth to me, as it is to the workers.

They live under the impression that what they’re doing there will somehow started the chains, the ones that belong to them. And when they’re started, they’ll simply start rising them through. Would I cherish such sights as would be revealed? Of course I would, after what they’ve been through, it’s the least I could look into. I would wager, they’d be happy, much to their likes elated, then, after bargaining their lives, then the madness that would follow after, being driven to despise me, of course I’d like to see it through. But then again, I’m not fond of wasting much sinew, not that they are capable of fighting back, I’m only trying to teach them a lesson with the best thing in mind. Their safety. That is to say, I would rather avert many of their eyes from it, most certainly so. Their psychical safety, as not to be damaged beyond repair, in the case of which I would see it fit to take one from here and there, placing them wherever they might do, and. Well, sparse are people with un-intentions to harm. I suppose even the minimum aid would do them so, and harm I don’t intend to anyway, nor would I in part.’

It was unfortunate. How they all simply feared heading outside, even though there were no signs of a present thread. The other people, citizens of bastard citizenry. Many of whom were less than called for or needed as to ask whoever might listen to them. Since, the car-crash followed after, and one veiled tiny parked car ended up taking four spots, some holes being landed like couches, near puddles of water, drenched morbidly by rains, clouds being left bearing them, the children of the fray, the concubine cattle and the morosely deformed butterflies. Left to them, outside, the bloated globe having survived the fall by nesting on top an ancient oak-palm cranium.

Lower than the bridge:

Dark flowers leaping around, many of them being jerkily placed together in a hard to look at way; with elongated filaments carrying them altogether on some ray-like beam that's been shot from one direction to the other that was under the subservience of Thryeeu, a ghostly sacked-flat sea sting-ray formation, flattened on both ends, yet connected or acting like the throat of a giant ghoulish head with one eye and a cone-mouth whose wider than its body tongue is but a wriggling flaccidly deprave cut-out carpet spread of little moving pouring hairs, all bearing spear-elongations with cysts at their ends, spread across the world in search of their flowers, which are subservient to them. Leythu of who's spiraled to the side body was become, in part, mournful as the side of the mountainous crone-to which it became, alarmingly a part of, had come to grow little insufferable growing leek spreads of buds, pieces of the room it lived in. Many of these sides growing people who lived there, communicating with most bastardly of creatures that came from the other realms. It adorned the top piece of the wall, this mounted bull-horn man, whom though himself a mad survivor.

To the right, central piece, but first, it should be said, the garroted room appeared to be a boat-like ellipse but longer, with planks forming k's, side v's that intercepted them, thinning out into the scales that made the rest of it, cradling from one side to the other.

'Open the door, I wish to enter and ask of something, if it could be allowed, please, I beg of you, that you might cherish what I ask.

MY plea is a must, for it can save many if not, beyond the likens of normality, lives.'

'Identify yourself then? There's a long-drop, somewhere, spread accordingly to the main high-way. You came from there, so, that means John Trunk let you in. If that's so, then tell me, what's the second password he gave you?'

'What, a second one?'

'It's a lot of fifty five, we can't take chances.'

Professor

The professor stood, his back but cracked, he was a hunchback, with a hooked nose and dark hair, a kike, evil, degenerately neurotic-schizophrenic, a nigger-lover whom filled the borders, a liar and deceiver whom but searched to lie, to infiltrate and make others think of him as someone who would madly be on their side. I shall trick them all as I manipulate and exploit, and contort my way into a seat of power, and then I shall bring chaos and promote such degeneracy as they would contort any sane man's bowels, he thought. And madly would he be brought, to such attention as it were to be. First to put on a show and make it seems like I have come, with a clever kike-ploy, I shall lie to them about, a fix to capitalism and slowly draw them on my side. Little clever dumb kike I am, they won't suspect a thing as I get them; and I'll fuck their children, and the Holocaust didn't happen; and I want to fuck niggers. But the inbred of the race of evil was also a dark sorcerer of evil and of decay, a petty little creature and a fashioner of minds, repulsion and other degenerate features that dragged him along the way. For he was in great correspondence with the dumb-fucking felony-commit evil criminal darkly-dumb nigger Ghetto-Negro Malcolm X, who was also a repelling hard to look at monkey that should have its legs crippled while put back into a cage, if he liked doing something, if there was something in this world the monkey hated, it was whites, since its jealousy only came along when met by the reality and his lack of a history and the destruction he brought with him whenever he went. Since he was a monkey-men with shoes inside his head, all stolen. Maybe the professor was dumb because he listened to the dumb-nigger's lesson in street knowledge, and what not. Niggers are fucking dumb, I hate them, almost as much as I hate myself, thought the Professor; the schizophrenia is really kicking in. How can it be stopped? He considered, killed God, couldn't forget as much.

The professor considered it for a moment before he approached the class:

I do not know what capitalism, communism or other monetary systems are or how they actually work, which in turn makes me overqualified to speak on this matter; but it occurred to me that every single time I take a break from drinking coffee and then start drinking it again, my inattention and my mind shoots in every possible direction there is. It is unexplainable but it is. During my studies I've also realized that there must be a link between talking about killing minorities and women as well as creativity, a boost that I cannot explain but it simply is, it exists and I can feel it, in my bones and in my mind. And I've also learned that in order for anything to be ordained and learned, one must study the classics, for that is where the relic that is human knowledge lays in and no other place; such as there is, if there's a fix to capitalism, it must be hidden somewhere in the classics and one must simply subconsciously absorb and search for it there, it is the only way. Political theory is poison and one cannot poison himself with propaganda; therefore the only thing left there is reading and trial and error and experimentation can yield something usable for the time being until something better comes along.

With hope that I may not be taken seriously so that I may not bring the deaths of millions of people, there it goes. And hopefully I shall not end up with anything, just as expected:

A first requirement to it is that it needs not be exploitable by kikes, otherwise that is already a means to an end (death), as well as a failure to begin with. But then again, it won't matter since it shall not be taken serious by any means. People getting paid for their work, sacrificing people's livelihoods for money and people who don't work hard yet they earn a lot of money for no work can be nothing but a result of, nah. Taxes on certain people like the rich? Movable currencies from one side to the other, global funds, it's all fiction, and unreal. A group of selected people receiving the entry country's funds, which are selected by the elected officials? That would result in something that's abusable, it wouldn't work. Dark sorcerers made to be put in charge as to completely wish the problems away, that sounds like a great idea also. Or what if entertainment gets completely cut out from funds? Studies had shown that 'amusement' is mainly made out of patterns that encourage cooperation, which makes the entertainment business too dangerous to be in power. The Romans had a good idea, thinking of the opera players and everyone as being on the same level as slaves and prostitutes. Definitely, the entertainment business has to have its cords pulled off if something needs to get changed, it is far too dangerous. Maybe a fix to capitals would be, not censorship or ban but simply, not making money out of some professions unless some patrons pay those people in question if asked for. Yeah some areas just need to have monetary support deflected and directed in some other places, that could be something that would work. Money isn't evil but this ability to influence people in such a manner is and one should not be allowed to be encouraged to do it. At the very least if someone wants to go ahead and do it for free and work hard for it, why not? The problem being that they're not only rewarded but they're also encouraged to ruin everything and destroy, therefore nothing else can be helped. And actual work to get somewhere would actually and might yield in better results if they put more effort into it. No free food or shelter for people, nothing that could or should be given to people, but then again, I would be a hypocrite if I said that. Perhaps to some degree some people could receive something like it but at the same time, they need to be pressured to do something, that is the key to push society, that's what pushed humans to make a society in the first place. Everything in moderation and a lot of pressure being used to make people work and pull themselves off the strap of their boots; I've heard about work unions and people stopping their work. I do not know what a work union is, but apparently they talk about how workers are treated, I think. Maybe the work union should just be someplace where individual workers discuss strategies on how they could, individually take risks and ask for raises and discuss plans where they could each plan who's next in line to ask for those raises and for everything else, or maybe that's what they're doing already. It shouldn't be an entity, yet cooperation is needed. What if not eggs are to be placed in a bucket? Should a country be divided into multiple pockets like multiple bank accounts for everything or like liquid assets work? What if every entity was a pocket of money they raised? But officially? The work union pocket, the liberal pocket, the right wing pocket, kike's stolen bags they will probably ship to Israel, the tax payer- separated by a system pocket? And means of defense being employed for multiple pockets? Like multiple people become a single bank account, yeah, or a fund raiser being built at a greater level, but it needs reports being delivered to the tax payers as to what percentage of the bank account and money it has been gotten or achieved or put through, or what sector it was directed to and the men and people who paid for it in the first place should be discusses amongst them by some means with limited choice options and limited votes as they can take and veto's. It could turn out to be obnoxious and too much of a bother receiving updates every few months, but at the same time, there needs to be a way to track what kind of changes are being done out of the money people are actually investing on or in. That would be hard to track though and people could be tricked into thinking their contributions are actually coming onto something when they aren't, for example if someone invests in the army, how would they know whether or not fifty bucks actually did something? How would they know whether or not the Government actually ended up donating to some foreign country like Israel? Specific report as kind of out of the question since I doubt the military would report how expensive a wing replacement would be. What if people got constant reports as to how many of them ended up supporting the military as a direct parallel to ballots and red/blue countries when the elections are running? But someone could also temper with it as well like they did with the elections. Wouldn't work; there's no unexploitable system out there. Perhaps more profitable trade with some countries could be paused or give up for some time in favor of doing it to other countries for some time, as a time/ money sink, dry them off for a bit. Even if it could mean possibly losing on some money, perhaps it's time to take some bold risks and take your chance with other more dangerous countries, as to prevent the coming of illegal immigrants, but trade being made with specific countries in specifically planned regions as to deviate the influx of other people for the time being. Strategically selected, like a gamble system, though that would be too dangerous and it could destroy some lives in turn. Outsourcing of jobs, hmm; what if they are temporary, are still kept but made universal? Same price on both sides, but it takes a few months off a country, then comes back in the country and keeps the same price, same pay for the same work? Like a switch-over job? Or a summer thing. Can't actually be fixed since outsourcing is meant to work on a cheaper way out and no one wants to work for less, yet people can't have it both. Another type of outsourcing- hire locals for the same price and a temporary time, nah and people would just be tricked and wait for 'permanent positions' that would never come; it shouldn't be banned either. But something has to be added to it. Aid, what if outsourcing goes to a pocket that the country in question has to add some money to that's being tracked and given to people? Nay. Every foreign worker is being linked to a white collar/ blue collar worker and gets a small percentage for what the outsourced worker is getting, paid by the company in question? Hard to track. But something could be done about them, hmm. Hard labor should receive greater exempts and be more rewarded for their jobs. There's too many types of jobs and too many arguments coming from too many sides. Every single type of job and sector would need to be approached differently. Slavery could be reintroduced since niggers aren't really human and they could be made useful again, that way they could stop committing crime, destroying everything and would stop breeding with more intelligent people since the niggers are simply too retarded to actually work, dumb lazy niggers. Women could be exempt from taxes, shouldn't be represented, shouldn't be allowed to hold jobs, should get beaten if they speak out and they could receive some pay from the tax money instead, or, even better, instead of outsourcing jobs, they could do those jobs for the same pay as the foreigners would, as in, unofficially, companies would be allowed to hire those women in the first place as long as they work for the same pay as the foreigners if they actually want to. Therefore they're given the possibility to vote, maybe, that's discussable, maybe not, that would be going too far, but what if they were paid as cheaply as possible as to not inconvenience the world with outsourcing? That could work. In Athens, both of your parents had to be born there in order for you to be recognized as an Athenian. What if we do that but with taxes but no tax exemption; as in, you're born in New York, you move out of state, and you pay taxes for that state?(The one you were born in, not the one you moved to.) Or you move to Europe and you still pay taxes to Europe, but then again, that would be difficult to track; shouldn't work off the country. Red states and blue states determining how the tax money is being diverted to, as in almost automatically for the benefit of either side, depending who ends up leading ahead; no, that would divide the states. Unless, there are special delegates from the winning side that are attributed to the state which are forced to attend a negotiation with a neighboring state's opposite delegates as to discuss further assessments. But that wouldn't be fair since two adjacent red states would make it so some states would be more represented than the others. An equal number of delegates could be chosen from either side. It could be hybridized with the law system, where a few members of the jury could be called, and would have to be ethnically checked first to represent, nah. Law courts are already a mess as there is and dragging an issue for months or even years would result into nothing. What if the president got a good chunk of the entire population's money, as a one-time deal, even if he serves multiple terms, whereas the richest people get heavily taxed only once, but he can only spend it in the States and only in the States and no other place and only there for a branch of something that's chosen by himself only. This is a lot of power to put in the hands of one person but at the very least, it could also mean that people might actually be careful who's being chosen the next presidency campaign. I would build nukes, a lot of them, and mark them all with my sigil and write my name on all of them. A health-care system that would work for a limited time, anything could work, this could either be damaging or a great choice, depending on the person and having two terms could possibly, unless indicted (but that's not a real thing), it could actually do a lot of good, as long as people are bold enough to give that much power to one man. There's no other fix than the faith in another man, regardless of the system, and that, in turn may bring destruction or may bring something good to all man. But at the same time, it's also in the realms of it being a dictatorial system, which in turn is a bad thing and won't fix anything. No one wants another Stalin or Mao, especially if it's done by your own hand, but at the same time we can't know whether or not someone might turn into them if they're given this power or monetary support. It's a dangerous gamble, in theory that could end up being more damaging than anything else.

I am an evil dark sorcerer and whatever I say shall only bring destruction to humanity, terror into the masses, death and agony to every man. My will is evil and evil is under my command.

'No taxation without documentation!'

We should be told where our tax money is being sent to!

In-source outsourcing only for women who aren't allowed to work real jobs; that way women who want to pursue hard science, hard labor and other kinds of jobs could do that without being paid more than what people whose jobs are outsourced to are paid. That way women are given a chance, either make babies, and be helped by the Government or you're allowed to work for the same pay as the outsourced foreigners. Everyone's happy afterwards, women will become homemakers, and the ones that are hardier will still be allowed to work, with the exception of competing not against men but against the more impoverished countries; perfect solution.

And that way also, true equality is achieved because women will be paid for the same amount as the women and the men who are factory workers towards which the outsourcing is aimed towards, or be even more equal that they would be to men since the in-sourced country job woman would basically be equable to both men and women put together, making them more equal and even beyond equal to and above men.

A second requirement is that niggers should not be allowed to be on welfare since niggers are given free passes to lazily nigger around in their niggerish way, destroying, raping, never raising their kids and asking for more goods in society just because of their race, absolutely degenerate nigger behavior that is, handouts, fucking handouts for no honest work or at the very least no contribution whatsoever.

Paying someone with nothing in return, and creating a money sink for multiple regions and countries, intentionally ruining them from within, have them pay for the damage in goods, then blame it on another country, as well as it could be fixed, within and round the curve. There could come an hour where every tax payer in the country be exempt from tax, only for a month, and the damages could be fixed by having another country simply pay for those things as soon as it could be allowed, a great idea, yes indeed. Or what if there was a chance, for everyone past a certain income simply didn't receive a pension at all, and was alerted of it and forced to save, or have an inverted pension, as when he's old he would have to pay for others, as if he was become the young tax payers instead, yet hour after hour, he'd have to facilitate something for every man. Old people could be put down and killed as well, just so their income would become the means with which everyone else could be made and allowed pay. Large tunnels – of monetary systems, that would have to somehow travel from countries like China – the start point, through Russia, Europe and then to the States, goods having to go through many other physical - taxes, as in physical force being employed in order to cut trade unless something is done about it. An actual trade route being set all the way from one side of the world to the other, or at the very least money could be calculated and somehow account for the actual distance from point A to point B, then it will be distributed in commerce or at the very least in that branch. The only way this capitalism problem could be fixed is not by a single thing but a special rework of every branch, accounting, comparing and being discussed about on a singular, individually specific level, since not every branch is considered equal, since for example Japan does seem to put more hours than a lot of other country, yet they're not as productive as the average American citizen, yet that is the key that's to be accounted for. Overtime, bargaining and productivity, although it's a tricky thing that's hard to be quantified, the best possible solution is to aim somewhere, or somehow or in some place and perhaps lower or start building something from there. If the rich people are to be taxed in rapport to their income or liquid assets, then it is only fair that every single man is also judged for the type of job/ branch they're committed to in order to be taxed, just so the system can be fair. Why would an 'entertainer' make as much as a harder working citizen, although that isn't to say that they're lazy, in comparison to other people, they are. It is a hard thing to do, but a specific type of job-division just like tax-taxation people could be employed in this matter. Like a division or a few selected people dividing sectors, instead of there being public and private, it could account for whatever branch they're in, and then divide the taxes while deciding and taking account the sphere of influence. Entertainers mostly aim for the global industry. That needs to be cut, somehow. Perhaps, if the sales are greater over-seas, the country from which they're coming from could take a cut out of the in-house money making (out of the country of origin). All right, Country A makes a product, Country B buys it, Country B takes a cut out of Country A' in-house product sales; if Country A sells it to its own people, but that can only apply to products that aren't digital and not physical ones. Fee for entry, fee for view; heavily taxed sectors, a lot of sectors have to.

There is another way to fix it, bastardization, complete as such. Take migrants and put them into work camps, and their children as well as every ethnically inferior entity that resides the lands they're not to venture into. Sack rival countries constantly, especially those who are geographically neighboring and incapable of defending themselves, wreck them up and enslave their dark skinned entities. Destroy rival economies, add more in-country economic deflections from some unnecessary systems that don't yield anything. The key is limitations on the earning sectors, as well as a constant influx of trade goods and valuable materials, most of which can be obtained from no other place than that one, rival countries that have to be completely ruined in order for some people to actually have their quality of life increased. This is a known fact that's been ignored by people by a long time, willingly or otherwise. Although there are already many people who are exploited without shame or reason, that is to say, there's no way out of it. There's no possible way to completely avoid it, it's not the system alone that's the problem, nor the manufacturing, or the joy of making chairs being taken away from people. Pseudo communist and capitalism systems, as well as hybridizations existed throughout history, yet. And that's but a giant yet, there weren't any many people as there are today, which are also, on top of that completely connected, or add more and more and more to their ranks, as the connectivity increases. Products are becoming more and more, farther reaching than expected, things that are niche cannot compete without being driven into 'isolation' or obscurity, it's just a test against time, an expansion of it. As in, there's this concept that's been made aware of, which is only worsened by the globalization. Eventually there will always be someone greater than you, and eventually you will be forgotten. Either that or you will stand the test of time for a period of time, short or longer, to the eventuality when you will have been completely and utterly suppressed or outpaced by someone who's better. Everything has its place and time and most of those concepts are in some manner carried over by other people who built on it. There's not enough time to experience every book that's ever been written or made, to watch every piece of content or have seen everything, but. That process had been much slower in the past, translations were made but not for millions of books; inaccessibility made it slower, enough of it. That may've been the point before. But now, it's different in some way, since there are too many things that know how to dazzle and trick you, which dropped the standards. It's complicated. In the past you had to work harder and create a greater piece of high art, literature, so on and so forth to stand out, in order to reach as many people as possible. Small bubble reached a wider one by its merit. Now, it changed because some exceptions can be made and fit as many large bubbles as possible. Yet it's not entirely accurate, it's something in-between, making cuts while delivering something that's kind of beneath everything, so that costs and production can be adjusted to. An impoverished country could produce something that's decent, yet it could reach more people than it would've done otherwise. A wealthy country can have a studio that can make something awful, but yield the same if not much better results. It's complicated for a reason, everyone is aware of those things. But you don't have people spending lifetimes or half of those working on something from as many angles as possible, as for the iterations to create beauty. Case and point for I as well. It's not the system, it's what it's built on. A wealthy country, a group made out of the right people at the right time being dedicated; it still fails. There are too many checkmarks to check in order to reach that point and even then. There are the means to do it, but the right people are in the wrong places, have the 'wrong' if not 'contradicting' beliefs and are unwilling to help or join. Or the right people have the needed amount but are afraid to take a major risk, or do something out of question. I wish I could make a piece of representational art where I lynch niggers and kikes while portraying them as being punished for being evil, mischievous, as well as condone violence against them, the disavowal of their nations, so on and so forth. Yet the people whom I would take to my employ, who have the 'right' minds and who would've worked as hard as they could while being put on their best of abilities might be driven off and reject such an offer, without doing the best they can. It's impossible to claim otherwise. There are just too many incompatible sides; it would be like I, forcing myself to work with a nigger while having to put up with him as well as push my hardest to do something that would result in favor of their ethnic group, knowing that, if that succeeds many other people will have to suffer because of their general incompetence as an ethnic group as well as their tendencies to commit crime, on average, disregarding their exceptions from the rule, knowing them for what they are, having accounted for their numbers, especially in African countries, their tendencies to break the law, illegally immigrate as well as generally being arrogant while they don't call out their own people, or their nigger on nigger violence, but I'm getting distracted again. Perhaps that's what's wrong with capitals, the incompatibility of people. There's too many of them, too different. It's the tribalism, it's the corruption, it's the willingness to adhere to other people than your own, it's the fallibility of man in general, it's the attempt to treat everyone the same to an extreme, and make too many exceptions where some of them could and should be stamped, if not written off. It's a cruel thing, but those who do not serve the interests of the country ought to be put down like rabid animals, and be completely kilt.

At the end of the day, I'm but running in the same problem, recognizing it but being incapable to come up with a fix. It's not supposed to be a difficult thing, as it's hard, almost nigh-impossible for something to translate from paper to reality, they don't, they can't. Everything's built on something; which means everything grows.

There has to be something else you could strap on it. There has to be some way to take something already built without destroying it, but create a reiteration with something completely primitively made, almost, something that's out of this world, something that can be thought off, and tried. It's an impossible thing, especially after knowing how the human mind works. No one can wish money from thin air, without printing them and crashing the market, and hope to fix all the problems. No one can become God or fill everyone's pockets, magically so.

But there are some extremes that might work, or not, borderlining on human's right violations. Human beings have, are and always be exploited, whether or not it's on an individual level or not, it shouldn't be promoted, but. This example is awfully illustrated by all means. Yet if there's something to it, only a few people can be pleased at a time, a small fringe group, whether or not it's the kikes abusing their nepotism and giving one another positions of power, some Colonialists using slaves for cotton and sugar cane, some countries being sacked by the Germans, some Eastern European Peoples being sacked by both kikes and Russians, a few richer people, if not the elite, so on and so forth, one thing is clear. A system cannot be fair to everyone, it can, at best aim to raise the quality of life for some people at the expense of others. At the same time, it's a pyramid scheme, it's a caste system, it's a serf-slave so on and so forth master kind of thing; we live better than we did before, everyone does than thousands of years before, yet you're always put down by some mean or another. You simply cannot employ the means to fix it any more. Of course everyone in the states would raise their quality of life if the kikes, niggers and Immigrants were to be kicked out, if they managed to obtain full control over their business while also invading whatever other country there was on this planet, beyond every possible capability and shame, as in fully going at it. But one has only to wonder what would that make of them, and of their people? Could be better, could be worse, but most importantly, would those kind of people see others like them who live beyond their borders as their 'brethren'? It's hard to tell as well as something difficult to comment on. It's to be condoned and cheered and at the same time frightening beyond belief. Yet those people would most likely, by some means, have their 'Utopia', not without being exploited, without finding a way to prodigiously destroy or reduce the quality of life, yet it would and might as well go well and beyond what people are experiencing nowadays. More so than anyone could ever hope to believe; there's just that homogeneity that cannot be denied, or outpaced.

I think the problem is more like, the earth started 'young' as in, it had fewer people, then it started growing 'older', more people coming along, which isn't as strange as it seems. The planet just as schizophrenia, that's all, or it's old. And there are various disease that work off it, the blacks are one disease, the other ethnic groups are another. Some parts of the brain is still working, others too well and cover up for the losses, in some way, it's the plasticity of the brain-planet which makes it so strange and hard to work.

The niggers are a disease, they are a disease, they are the worst, we should lynch them, kill them and their children; but I'm saying this without shame, although it's already obvious that they are dead weight, useless, knowing that people might seemingly take it the wrong way. I'm not a racist person, it's their skull shapes, not the color of their skin. African niggers have small skulls. Their brains mass isn't high enough to compete with other races. And they can't even speak properly. If I owned a bunch of slaves, I would whip them, hard.

They're extremely mentally impotent, they're effeminate, and they're exploited by every race there is and should be. I truly hate them, of all the other races, they're objectively inferior. They commit a great deal of violent crimes in rapport to their population just around everywhere they go, which can furthermore be pin-pointed to an even tinier percentage if one were to ignore their elderly and their younger people, being left with a small bracket that encompasses few Nigger males in their early and late twenties, which doesn't even account for their tendencies towards recidivism, and the fact that many of them are getting free passes and cover-ups for their crimes. It's just obvious that they're counterproductive to capitalism while being in developed countries since they can only destroy, which is by no means and doesn't serve as an argument as to make the claim that their destruction of property, theft and crime provides a mean for other people to simply make a living out of incarcerating or cleaning after them, no, that only serves the media whom further demonizes the opposition, smearing the good hard working white people of the nation whom are constantly under attack despite them performing to their best, without being thanked for some filthy sub-humanly inferior races that are never pleased, always blame other people, constantly seek to attack other people and promote social nepotism, so on and so forth, since the Niggardous African Blacks are incapable of subjectively looking at the white people who are trying to help them, not the kikes whom are not white, but the actual ethnically European people who sacrificed a lot as to become more empathic than other races, who would've mistreated the Negroes far more severely than any other peoples there are. It is rather unquestionable that, the Niggers are extremely dangerous, not only from this physically petty crime perspective which everyone is already aware of, but out of the very fact that they're resorting and trying to resort to tribalism, and although other races are doing the same thing, most of them are far too destructive to be allowed to adhere to such a thing. There's good nepotism and bad nepotism. Bad nepotism doesn't aid the monetary system since the kikeish people, ethnically or otherwise religious seem to take a liking to every other ethnic group other than whites, resulting into such policies that are self-destructive for every other race. I am not a white person, therefore I am at a liberty to say whatever I want, I've never claimed to be, never will, don't want to. But I am afraid, for the future generations and for everyone else if the kikes remain in power, if the Niggers get in power or whomever else does the same. At the same time, it's only fair to say that I'm on nobody's side, in all honesty, but I would not rear my head if someone gave me the option to completely kill as many black as possible. If there's something in this world that's pure and can be felt, it's the true hatred and savagery non-whites feel for the blacks, there's just no other way to put it. I'm not an ally, I'm not a friend, I'm not your teacher, I'm not someone to be romanticized, I simply like saying whatever I want and I simply hate blacks. There's nothing else I hate more than them, as I've come to realize. Being surrounded by them is a dreadful thought, but enough of being distracted by that. They're dangerous for a reason, even the 'intelligent' ones are promoting social nepotism for their own people, which is a disgusting thing since they cannot objectively look at their own people and realize that they're less intelligent, more destructive and borderline criminally so, unchangeable. It's far too clear that by all means, they're slow. Even the Natives of the Americas managed to show a much faster developmental potential, that is to say, there's not enough money in this world that could make up for so many generations of niggers and that's the problem, especially the migratory ones. It's not their fault they were made that way, their fault stands in the way they act, which they show no guilt, shame or willingness to change. They're too slow and there's not enough wealth to accommodate for them, it's just that, especially if they start mixing with other people, the Mullatoes are only going to be used as political pawns to further their agendas, in the same way the kikes are using their European heritage to do the same with their own. Money drains is what they are, a tap that can only take away but never give up. And they only want to invite more of their own inside the country, which is pitiful and disgusting. They breed like animals, there's too many of their ethnic groups that can't pull their own weight and this is something that's hard to be accepted, or hardly ever be, or who knows? Too many of the niggers are a bad thing, they can't keep up with other races, they constantly prove themselves to score lower on PISA, on reading, mathematics and other kind of fields, endeavors, yet they seek entries into the easy life, making due out of their 'athleticism', since they had slightly higher muscle twitch spasms or since they're not as intelligent as other races, they just take sports instead. A society cannot work on that alone, on the entertainment, on spots, on music, so on and so forth; the lies that niggers have a culture has been spread for far too long to cover up for the lie, it's just not how it works, not at all.

There's no other reason for this 'economic' drainage, for this 'drop in European, American and developed countries' births', other than this illusion of grandeur, if that's what it could be called. This fanciful thing, this concept that says 'all peoples are equal, both sexes and all the races', it's damaging everything.

At the very least, sports and the entertainment business should be severely crippled during a time of economic depression, that was the case before, perhaps not purposefully, but now, it should simply be forced and promoted by the Government. People have become too hedonistic for their own good. On one side, all human endeavor had been that, yet it's been pushed to the extreme and that's where the problem arouses.

It's still possible, as it's the case for a superior race to create a high piece of art, literature, or anything else despite being poor and being incapable of working the costs; and someone of an inferior race to create something useless, depraved and incomparable despite having access to much greater funds, for example, the comparison between the 'Notre Dame' and Mussa Massa's sand fort, which were roughly made in the same period of time. Not even all the money in the world could make up for the completely mental feebleness of a Negro, and if past taught us anything, those who don't learn from their mistakes are cursed to repeat them. Frankly, no one wants the coasts of the continent filled with money-drainage sand forts and sand castles, that's just a waste of time and money, it's just sad that the Africans don't actually have a history to begin with, nor can they compare to anything else, all right.

So, this next part of the problem can be resumed as thus: 'Minorities only care for their own and are incapable of sustaining the economy by themselves, they're simply useless and incapable of doing it, they're mentally unfit, not intelligent enough as their species are made to appear like.'

He took a break, for a moment, rubbing his chin.

'I think I'm starting to understand now what the problem is. Sustaining so many people is hard, you need tradition, a stable family being enforced, like monogamy, a well endowed structure and far too many things that don't allow liberty at all.

Women can't work as hard, be as productive or, as they lack the most important thing, frankly, you need to get extremely, extremely as in beyond any kind of a doubt, creative enough to make the cut. Otherwise, the monetary system cannot be sustained on the long run. Because minorities aren't competent enough, women aren't, it's just a few select men, that's always been the case, whose strong arms carry everyone along. No, unfortunately the fix to every system is that, a few people working harder, and more creatively than everyone else.

At the same time, everyone else cannot stand lazily around either and leave them standing, putting all the effort.'

What if, instead of there being a tax exemption for women having a child, there was such a thing as a 'twin' tax exemption, as in, within a year of a child birth, if a woman were to get pregnant and have another child, then she would be relieved from paying taxes for a year or so? And elderly people could have their pensions slightly raised if they were to look after their neighbors' children every now and then, within the realms of reasonability of course.

A hero for all the ages, the man who is always wrong without belief, who thinks he's figured it all out.

'Indeed, my research has finally paid off, to its entirety, I whom had been struggling to find a cure, I whom followed it for a great deal, a short deal of time, a good deal nonetheless, but will I stand the test of time in that case? Of course not, because I am still an imbecile after all, but within my grand delusions, I have created communism, destruction and the death of my 'fellow' man. I have brought something that can be attributed to me, millions of deaths underneath my belt, and I need naught more and naught else. I will say what I desire, and I will have been as delusional as I will have become, ramble about like a schizophrenic madman, and you shall listen to me nonetheless. Another hack, another scam, another racket and a merchant, I bring a fix to everything, I fancy myself a superior race, I fancy myself someone who's better and supreme. Who governs over, all of men, from within their ranks whence I hide and the results, why, I feel nothing. Towards the millions and billions of deaths attributed to me, I feel nothing else but the desire to worship the money I made and being worshipped as well. This ego of mine that rules over everything, this desire to show how I am far more progressive, more enlightened, more racist as well, greater in all regards compared to everyone else.' Falling short in all and every other regard; the absurdity that is, being but the voice of an echo, likened to the sound of one's voice.

'So, I ask you this, my dear students, in that case; why bother? Why should I bother being any different? What's the point in it? I see no reason into it either, I don't need to act as anything else other than my race, I can be as they claim as I know to behave and I need not seek less than what I do or seek.

But there is something else that I've yet to be account, it is something I have no control. It is that little thick inside the head that keeps reaving, ever closer, ever as such instead.

I do not know what that means for me, I seek.'

The professor but revealed the open mark on his chest, right above the legs, instead, across his belly and on top his chest, like a little tadpole growing with a skull.

'We all belong to an unfathomable kind after all. One of pettiness, laborious filth, that which can only create nothing, and destroy everything.

Are we all not made of his mark and of his kind? Are we not but made and filled, decayed and blinded by our inabilities and our lacks, the disgust? I see and see that there's no reason to seek anything, we all belong to Mongol after all, our destroyer, the bringer of everything that's wrong into this world.

So why feel shame?

When we are the ones bringing it all down, and whom else would fail, if it's deliberately known that our kinds have yet to solve even a problem, if one was inconspicuous at all. As tiny as a fraction, and little more to no reaction, there's nothing there, there doesn't seem to be a fix, at least not from our sides, since we can only bring destruction at our feet.

Therefore, I believe, there can be only one true fix we can come up with, as to form this society we aim for, to bring destruction forth, and go on, to the realization of our Kallegrí plan, we must, by all means come to a fix, by all means necessary, so we may come as if, as it may, show up with the intention to come up with a solution to the greatest plague that's ever been infesting our world. We have to come up with a solution in as timely a manner as possible if life ought to be spared, indeed.

And who else but us?'

He spoke along the while and the students took his gospel dry, large and long ago defiled, sinking in the bile that was floor. Taken for granted and so much more.

What if the journalists and the media people got shot, from the side-opened as to make way for a single more than what's needed stream to come out of the sides of their heads.

'We ought to splatter them and make as many cuts in the budget, it's the only way we could possibly make sure every single man and every single one makes the cut entirely, otherwise, there's but nothing there.'

Most importantly while making a profit off their backs; working them to death, to debt and by whichever means trying to cover it all up.

'Protected classes of races, I spit on them. No one who's, as such, as inferior as they are, ought to be defended in such a manner, they need to be cut and washed off to worse shored. Since their failures are only wreathing in and destroying all.'

A universal ban on doctors trying to flee their countries, but only doctors for, as a matter of fact, they're most useful in the localized zones, and they promote but one destructive transaction, a seen as necessary ethnic trade. Since doctors, surgeons, medics, so on and so forth are seen as universal goods, or bargaining chips, they're rather too valuable and possibly damaging to be traded. Instead, this branch should be in-country promoted as soon and as often as possible. Since the trade isn't that useful or great for the country that's at a loss, and since it's mainly a selfish leave. But no permanent ban either, temporary work should be allowed but nothing else, if at all, ought to be completely regulated and constantly checked – in continent only but not outside of it as well. Workers, slaves and other groups don't belong in that category, it's what started the problem in the first place.

Realistically speaking, work camps across the African plains, and their countries could most likely be useful to economy beyond conceivable relief, but with a single most important change in thought and plans. Perhaps this time around they ought to be worked to death.

Military conflicts may constitute the only effective way to boost the means of production. The most enemies to butcher and ethnically cleanse, the better the outcome and whom else if not the most impoverished countries, the ones that are but wasteful and aren't capable of keeping up with the rest of the world? It is only fair that they're made to be useful instead of being given the chance of lazying around like they're busy doing.

What if the current system is kept but you're allowed to keep an unnatural amount of wealth only for a short period of time in terms of liquid assets? Or there's a limit of money you can spend in one place. As in the idea of there being a minimum and a maximum wage but applied to where you spend them? That kind of intrudes on the pursuit of happiness and liberty as well though. Perhaps for a short period of time, human rights violations should be enforced, as should eugenics en mass, and white women and white people who are the best predictors to creativity, intelligence and whichever other metric there is, as should state enforced monogamy, a temporary ban on abortions unless the child is mixed race, and then a great deal of problems would simply be fixed.

His head simply popped right off and blew up in front of the class.

'Oh my fucking god, what a fucking sub-human looking creature that is; I am so afraid, so frightened by it, what is that thing? What the actual fuck is that thing? IT is not human, look at its eyes, those fucking disgusting looking frightening eyes!'

One of the students immediately started cowering in fear, covering his face with his, his right arm. Disgusting looking slits for eyes, they were, covered in some weird skin-little more on top unnatural hill on top of it.

Despite having its head splattered, that dreadful thing started flying around the room, butchered as it tried.

'Sub-human creature coming from sub-human dumb fucking sub-human country, put it down before it infects everyone, put it down now!'

A chaos just as soon erupted.

'Quick, take the bomb from under the table, take his bomb, let's make it for the Congress.'

One of the braver kids immediately ran half-way through and leaped on it, throwing the table off the raised incline, breaking it across one of the walls.

There was a hidden trap door, with a bomb with knives coming out from inside.

'I don't understand what's going on here.'

'I don't know either.'

The Professor's head all of the sudden became a giant bubble of blood, which started spearing across the ceiling, then across everyone in the room, having turned the bomb into a giant womb-like thing with many unnatural dark heads that wore horns on top of one another, and metallic dreadful hand-to-hand like motions that carved the entirety of the creature.

Women who have abortions aren't human, unless the babies are niggers, in which case, they're saints.

Without a sudden notice, the top of the University started falling apart, taking a good chunk out of notice as it had become, worn-out, eaten then pushed around the edge of the ground, where it started suddenly reeling back and forth, like a dying beast that was slowly heaving its way around as to give birth to a most of the cancer-like bomb-wrought clusters that started reaving around the hour.

'I think we've witnessed something, haven't we?'

'I think we did as well, but there's something else there.'

'Mongol, Mongol, Mongol, Mongoloid!'

They chanted his name, and gave birth out of their remains, for all that was mad, degeneracy and what not, came forth, and niggardly corpses, and those that drew forth, of lynched and of dead, of those who were not, and brought from filth, they but called him back to life.

'Mongol, Mongol, Mongol, Mongoloid!'

They kept chanting, and would to be, they served, for all that they were worth, and little less and little more.

And in the blotched filth and their destruction, for those insufferable creations, of the Armenoids and Oriental races, the filthy pagans and the heathens that opposed all the deformed maliciously chanting leprous creations. The savages that did return, their filth but grinded under moon; all infested, and averted, all but gathered, never mended.

Niggarious invaders and the filth of lesser races came. All that brought destructions in their veins, all but brought with them as well, all but covered in sacks of smell, of darkish gray, and of remains.

The many mixed of lower grains. All but mindless as they were, some infested, incapable of living, and of pain. Lower life forms, species that would die, otherwise their legacies were pitted against each rye.

And thence the peculiarly zombie-sack, of which but gray but filth was to be brought, appeared to the servants but to bring, whatever in which direction as to sink the coasts, in leper-water. Whatever else followed after, savage negrous but came to pass:

Many of lesser inflations of contortions that were brought:

'We came to serve you, great master, I of Nubian descent, I of Niggarious decadence, of plain destruction, of which reigns, I bring forth my servitude, a slave.

I the most isolate of savages, my tribe of grains, I but a dumb creature, with no one else in mind. I but a strong man, with little more of nothing to blind, and taken as I did before. Though savagely beaten those whom I only admonished most, I remain your most trusted nigger, a slave born and raised to be. And seeing how there's little left, I bend such knee and show such kinless, as for me.

I whom have betrayed my niggardly brothers, yet I sold. Many of them to my other kind and I took their skin and now I grow. Of darker mass, I'm but a nigger with no soul. Yet I've come to serve you in return, great god Mongol!

A twitch and a spasm, and wretched was the niggard hazard. For many of them were his slaves and many of them were brought to serve; all to that wretched being, brought from such, as to look rather, unappealing, to every watch and woe. To them, this was a king, to which they would bow, not Tutankhamen of little shame, but a giant of such magnitude as would never be reigned.

Evil was brought to mind, there was no other action, no other alternative than what happened there. In its most decaying, most unnatural of states, he was there and they were his, and mixed and blends and most inhuman of lookalikes were there, none of which that deserved to live. Neither being capable of doing anything, not on their own, but this was a fair rule, Mongol would but take claim of them in a swoon.

Little odd niggers were brought around, many of the filthy Asiatic-Yellows but brought about, their compatriots and maggoty hooked nosed masters, some of the most disgustingly looking Laplanders, amongst the most decayed and bland mixes that came along the way, regardless of cast and nature, all would suffer and all of disgraceful consternation.

All would but serve the Mongol, darkest of the gods, bringer of togetherness amongst sub-humanity, so they may all but serve in time.

And then, all of the sudden the earth shook. Out of its bowels, there came a crook, a darkly end of matter, breaking everything in part, as the ground was solemnly erupted on but side. From the darkest of depths there came, from the most unfathomable of dark remains rose but a single dark partisan chevalier, by the name of Richard von Coudenhove-Kalergi, whose had rose up from the depths of the malignant ground as he was but called to serve.

His throat looked sutured, his head right up the cowl, him but a replacement for the filthy Sleeping Hallow.

'I've come to take my rightful place, now that I mixed this world and there is no race, but a mongrellic abomination that I see, whereas I had been promised.

A place as the rightful Governor of this hellish thing that has remained of the world, that is what I have been promised before.'

For he had known that he would also be received by them, those dark skinned nigger Hebrews that were put around the rims of the crater from which he had but come out of

As Kalergi was but pleased to hear that Mongol would not forget of the promise he had but deformed the world to, as such, instead.

'Far thee from whence was I wrong to be put in change, to have come upon the time when I was met. In a land beyond time before either of you was born instead.

Take a walk with me, Kalergi.'

And he was just as soon joined, in the trail of destruction that was left in his path, from there on out, as he could not look in any other direction, nor see.

He recalled it as such. He was born during a time beyond times, well beyond the moment the plan came to fruition.

Darkly decayed mannequins were standing on crooked-long hindered pole-legs, they seemed to make most if not all of the dark surroundings, whichever else was included there being no longer capable of being sustained by any means, nor would there be anything else around the place. They walked through a land of corpses on the ground, all bloated open.

But most importantly walked under dark and darkly to matter bloated eye, by whichever means could it be employed, they were there in part and not for long after could they move out of the way.

Various large deformed holders everywhere around them:

‘What actually happened?’

It was hard to see at a point, since the land was made to look like Mongol, drawn along. His skin was torn apart.

There was nothing more blotched and more blotched than what was going on around them, since no one could look in that way any longer.

There it was, another sacrifice, all had to endure, if Mongol was to be preserved, a cycle of disturbance, a filth for everything that swerved on.

Wretched bog-like thing, it created, though living in the world insatiate. This weird contortion of the world was nothing more and nothing short of what it truly was, of where it started drawing from, of what the people had become. All dark races would betray one another eventually, since their incapability to maintain all brought only the worst of their races. Their destruction being inevitable as well, thence he created one:

‘I am an evil being.’ It said, just as it wreathed in place, but not only that, there was definitely something else other than pettiness.

‘If there’s something I’m great that, great Phelhytur, I wager just as much, I want what’s lain around you, and I wretch in disgust. I am but most boastful and most dreadful of all creations, but why am I here?’

‘You are here, to bring destruction.’

‘I know what I must do, now that I will be sent and made as to be given birth, I know as much and shall not lose a pulse as there’s nothing more else. I know what to take and what to claim, out of them.’

‘Then you shall do as follows.

The Niggers and Mullatoes need be constantly reminded of their inferiority and evil, their lack of history and the destruction that comes with their people, that’s the greatest way one may crawl underneath their skin. A reminder that their wretchedness and primitiveness cannot be contained, that they cannot live in an abundant land, their egos and their arrogance is something that may bring all down.

Positions that are unearned, a hate for their white benefactors, must be reminded and pointed at for all to see. They're given false hope and made to think that they're as intelligent and evolved as any other people, but most importantly, their fragility lies in a single word, which makes them weakest as to shatter their inflated sense of self as well as they're told.'

'What else is there for me to do and see, great Mongol?'

'The Semitic kikes are worshippers of money, more so than their whole beings would be forced to endure, nothing else is sacred for them, and nothing else would force them to become distraught and be filled with filth.

Henceforth, they need to be reminded of what they owe. It's most important that you attack each and every single group for what they value most. They owe money to all the countries they sacked, they need to pay-back the reparations, and the theft they came about.

You need to be reminded that it's only fair, since they unlawfully took something they didn't earn, they sought to steal and be unnerved. It is that what hurts them the most, and you must make do with hurting it as soon as they're put in a position to boast.'

'Whom else?'

'The Asiatic race is proud as well, but they represent a greater danger than many others, of them you should beware. Although their lack of creativity is rightfully shown, theirs is something that needs a blunter approach. One that's far more aggressive if it's to be allowed.

Opium, diseases, military conflicts, whatever it takes and whatever got employed in the past, whatever there is to put to their employ, whatever there's a need for and whatever else. It's clear that they're a harder to take down race, and a people, as they act like hives, and most importantly, they need a cleansing for the disgrace they have become.'

'And whom else is left?'

'Many other groups as well, and neither of them can fully and properly be annoyed, or put down as easily as others, or hardly as there is the matter.

The Arabs are no different than any other Semites, as they are snakes, that much cannot be forgotten either, but this goes beyond the worship of their prophet Mohamed, a wretched sub-human creature he was. They're too dangerous to be aroused just yet, since their proximity would result in the destruction of other races as well as everyone else. It's something that cannot be forced just yet.

They're primitive and wide-spread, they're divided, and for that reason, even a tiny Middle Eastern State survives. But there are worst things that could be said there, there's no need for a Pan-state, of any kind, be it African, Asiatic, or anywhere else.

And there's the Immigrants whom are just as chaotic, are they not?'

‘Why must I be wretched as to act against them if the future dictated that they’re all to be mixed?’

‘Because the world is cyclical and all need to be reminded of this thing, by all means possible, that much you must understand.

It is turning the past into the future even before it’s become.

It is stirring chaos, dividing and destroying everything, it is the combined tendencies of every dark race there is that made the creature that I am, that you are, every single one of them.’

As the god of sub-humanity winced; Mongol being reminded of everything, and of every tumor-like race and of their most unnaturally deformed, most destructive, most paranoid and most degenerate of practices, of every evil and of every impulse, most of which couldn’t be forgotten. Of every act and every lie as well as how it happened. His tendencies to defile, his tendencies to distort the world, the aggression and the bastardly evil, the mental insufficiency and bastardly primeval mind; which acted only on vile things, on impulses that were wretched and disgusting, filled with nothing else that meant a future for the world. That is what the combination of every race on this earth made.

A filthy hybrid with no root, the hatred for those that are beyond him, impure and broken, filled with savagery and hatred; one that holds within the power, a chance to change the past, yet uses it to furthermore destroy it, out of spite.

‘It is clear that it is in my species, what I inherited from them, this will to destroy.’

Something that even Kallegri nodded and agreed to his master, despite being made as paranoid, for he had feared this remark as well. Looking around him only to realize how wretched this world was become. It was hard to look at him from that point on. Since, wretched as he were an inbred, this disgusting mongrel emperor Mongol seemed to extrude, every now and then, the most disgusting characteristics one could possibly display, Armenoid-slanted beady eyed formations appearing on the skull, but empty. Large Turanian skull protrusions, adding to his deformed state; Arabid-Orientalid, receding features that drew back, a forehead and a smaller-concussion like depression and a sack, meaty skin and puffy eyelids, a Syrid that’s been melting through, a frog-like smile and a niggardly look from time to time appearing, always but deformedly to keep in mind, the Sub-Saharan DNA, the features that would bring decay, all adding up to what appeared to be most disgusting hybrid to draw near to this side of the world.

Kallegri, of whom was told to stall; had yet, when the time drew on, yet to carry on with his plan, in time. Although he had come to believe that the kike were made to be the natural aristocracy, he’s betrayed them utterly and completely as they have shunned themselves as to be afflicted by their own poison of miscegenation. The niggers never rose off their ranks either. And what remained of the pure races either simply vanished, disappeared or started being completely afflicted by the curse of Mongol. They still went out, having been known for a short period of time as the greatest race that ever lived, before the extinction of humanity followed. Whom reigned over all then and who to follow?

It was time that the Chevalier was left to his own devices. There was an unknown point in his armor, where his skin was become as charcoal metal, a gothic remnant of a lost age. Yet there was naught more dreadful than what the sutures looked like, for the knight was dead.

And what kind of man was the one living in this realm?

Terror incarnate and distraught never ending, his throat was hooked to a barrel as well, made out of heads to put together with unnaturally elongated spike-like explosives that were attached, like spears to the unprotected joints in his back. And every single one of the but a Mongolic sack, all but ever changing in figure, personality and heritage that was brought forth.

‘We are to bring terror when it is to come, bring forth the servitude that was brought before us.’

He spoke to one of the most decayed of faces, that shoved himself in and on, wreathing about the hour, him being brought around, tainted after what seemed to be the leper-hour.

‘Who are you, and why are you here?’

‘I’ve come to deliver news of the plains, of what happened in Asia Minor as well. There’s been something that’s come to light, it seems.

Something drew on to surface, back during a time when.’

It paused for a moment, that Niggarous Mulaltoe Clicking Chink. It drew itself weakly yet plastically as if it were some broken toy, its face defiled, and bones cripples, his sickle cells vile.

‘There’s been an insurgence between the eight blends, the ones of the most Mongrellic kind, the ones that do the seeping of their heads dryly. I see as much as there is in every single one of them, no more than a few children broken and abandoned, no less than hundreds of disabled creatures all forgotten and never spoken off.’

‘And what are you here to ask for?’

‘Your grace needs to follow I, for the entire life was defiled, distraught and simply put, contorted with the rest of the land.’

A piece of Egypt, a piece of Asia, a great strand of Georgia, Lebanon and so forth, a slight hindering moving mass, the marshes of Arabia, the part of Judea that was brought down, all mongrelized, all sub-humanly wiped out, as one might expect. The blends were hard to look at, as one might have suggested, as one might’ve hinted at it before, there was definitely nothing to them and nothing that would prove to work. They were simply put into barrels, the prior inhabitants.

Many of them were put as many as eighteen hundred at a time, large barrels filled with Arabs, Judeans, Phoenicians, Leprous other mixes as well as whatever was put around, then they were butchered, battered, and mixed into a pool, out of which, cruelly so, the results were made to mix and drool. The worst of blend, hybridization; Ill defined, the opposite of God’s creation.

‘They have mixed and they had butchered away.

Only the weakest and the strongest survived.’

‘But how could that work? By all means, that’s something I don’t see happening any time soon, as they’re but opposite, are they not?’

‘In part, I would suppose. But not entirely, not everything is without worth, master Kallegri. Do please follow.’

Thence he but showed the way. It was a strange thing, a staggering machine, made to convey only the most primitive of features, a resurfacing large tram-device, without the rails, the wheels or anything else, but, that alone did suffice, as it was adorned with the most primitive of laurels and whatever tribalistic things they could find, carried in by plenty of disgusting looking slaves, most of them swampy-tawny, and dumb-headed, as the reigns was passed to someone like him. Compared to which, he might’ve been nothing else but a supreme being, one that stood out. One that was superior by all mental means, if not.

It was an even stranger addendum being there. Distraught by nasty a word.

There were some things that didn’t fix and couldn’t fix themselves.

In the distance there was a flight, there were eighteen blocked in blotched unfathomable cretin-guns attached to them, going as far as to reveal snake-like humanoid shaped formation all in the back, all rotated with the help of their thin scales that grew and inflated themselves, only to be brought back, only to breathe through the longest arches that threw on. Brown-colored skin black clots in the air flew, inside the dirt roads that flew on. And births were in the air, many of them were dead before the sort. Bloated in, the time.

‘Alas, they’re bringing and dropping the filth inside, and puff-fat.’

And bloated in, alas, they started dropping bombs on one another as soon as it happened. They couldn’t be distraught either.

First there was a stop and slouching in-kind of defilement. He had to follow through as well, called upon to attend, at the other side of the world, then.

A bloated thing had called the Chevalier to come, and as it happened, he was but pocketed in a small pocket of organisms that started wrapping themselves around it. First, before the arrival:

Their sentence would be utterly indefinable, and never ending. Farther away than it was necessary to look in any other weird direction; there was the Conclave on the island of Fiji, one of the little slouches that was forcefully put twenty feet in the ground where the people wasted away even before the first delegates came onto the island. It was a dark day then, mostly since the head figures across the Island, the Fijians were among first to be affected. Weird deformations appeared.

While most of them were already afflicted by some erratic features, it was clear enough that they were mightily deformed, malignantly so, ever so drawing forth from where they had sealed themselves in.

A little more than a hundred lousy holes were dug across their Island, adding more and more to their number as time drew on. Some of the first men were first to display most peculiar features that started manifesting themselves as outwardly as they would do as such, inwardly as possible.

Mghundoo was one of the small conclave of Negroid Fijians that began displaying outward signs of chance, most of which were already started to draw in and out as they came out of their hidings, having been set first contact with one of the solid-machines that looked over them, in the air. No wings, no helicopters of helicon flying pods were necessary as the inner elongated tubes were shaped like strange hand-touched sculpted extractors, wriggling in and out like wild animals or insects trying to draw blood from the little blood pockets on the sandy moon that rested across the Island. He, Mghundoo observed.

It was strange, how disfigured he had become, a hunched figure, most peculiar in sight. His body physiognomy was somewhat changed, as he had become almost as hairy and much, much bulkier than any other creature that's been present on the Island, having become a partially contorted long-baboon, a simian in the back emerging from the looks of it, a second one from the animal's chest. His front side was but hairless, lacking in beard, hair, his eyes were squinting as he started at a hot burning sun, his mouth drooling over, but displayed a swollenness that was not only much thicker but beyond that of a Negro in size, going as far as to encompass a channel canal that went not only through their throats but through their heads as well, swollen on the top, having too many hairs that didn't look like hairs either. Blackened, hardened, looked as if they were squirming, squiggling around, meaty as well, as if they were forming the first skin-tag wombs that would carry countless generations of baboons that would soon enough inherit the Island. Its normally deformed yet set on sight lower, sloping forehead had already begun visibly receding to a most unnatural level, until it began pushing backwardly, deeply so, having caused its prefrontal cortex to completely recede in the back, forming a strange almost almond-like shape of the brain, having not increased in size, yet having degenerated to a prune-like thing that might've been reminiscent to a Neanderthals if it had been bigger, fatter, since in some way it seemed to maintain the general form and shape, despite its sudden alteration, as it could simply be aligned as to fill it to its entirety, if it were a liquid filling a balloon. Its parietals were completely compressed as to make it so, it bore holes inside of its very head, too much so to look like anything but an attempt to force in something much greater than an iron tool, yet there were no signs of trauma either. It healed, somehow, ever drawing near a process of always changing. Leaving something far more depressing to look at as its brow ridges were almost completely not only protruding but seemed to take the appearance of a talon that began drawing it like a pseudo-hood, threateningly growing inward and above as to blind the mad creature as it furthermore started degenerating into something completely unrecognizable to that of a man. The baboon-like protrusions having grabbed and molded themselves to the arms, now, being past their initial indentation, and having become completely less flaccidly softened by the time they complete their alteration, they had already connected to the main 'humanoid' arms the Fijian used to bear, not as a liquefaction like an angler fish, but like a cast, a set of gloves but signaling the fact that the bone-cartilages and the skin inside the baboons hadn't been completely formed, rubbing the creature in the wrong way as it covered it. By the time it placed itself inside the pit, the Negroid Fijian wore its knees backwards, completely put down, as he nested inside the sand, drawing itself inside the body like some peculiar tortoise just as its entire body, only the lower, as it placed itself down on the front side as it lay itself on top the belly, forming a strange almost solidified pool in order to anchor itself to the ground, before giving birth to the new species of dark baboons.

They were suffering of many almost inbred-like features that only manifested when finally allowed to move, although they seemed rather crippled in the way they moved. Wreathing in madly, there was nothing natural to the abominations that drew out, unrecognizable as it were, a dreaded figure of the past that could barely be allowed a poor man's notice started invariably flash a plethora of joints and junctions. Its chest looked as if it pumped in and out, as were its many legs and arms in the back, its face and lower distinctly set jaw following soon after. Its strange reeling-in and out motions bore only a hint of some unnaturally set prognathism that started switching between looking as if it were moderate then far more pronounced until its body looked as if it was completely jerked out of its socket nigh-completely, a livid embodiment of some engine that couldn't be stopped nor would its progress be allowed past the side of the rims, edges and farther ends of the palm trees that seemed to shun in. Many of the slight less affected Fijians were incapable of threading alongside it, having armed themselves with spears and antler-chamber rocks they threw at the fiend before it could jerk into their untended territory.

One of the braver Negroid Fijians who was of a stature of one hundred seventy five centimeters in height, well more than fed, having weighted two hundred and ten pounds, bearing an arm length of eighty centimeters at the very least, a leg length of ninety four centimeters, a shoulder breadth of ninety centimeters which, in turn, upon having accounted for a chest breadth of fifty centimeters, gave the strange Negro the appearance of a bow, having a chest depth of a fat balloon, while his body build generally being strongly mesomorphic, while its head length was of a head length of something close to a smaller, malnourished pumpkin that's bee forcefully elongated as to look like a wavy haired, grown on top arrow shaft; by the name of Mjolko, whom was in actually a descendant of a much darker creature whom had manifested itself on the Island of Solomon, and had been in actuality of a much dark-browner skin, to the point of having its features completely ruined by a strange pigmentation of the ground, from which it appeared to draw, out of the dark-remains that had been abandoned in the depths of the fall through dark hole it crawled out of, some of the left-over parts his ancestors appeared to bear forth.

They were always drawing their bows after him, threatening to put him down whenever necessary, as it was something not to be confounded with what was going on between them.

With the shaft of his spear, Mjolko put down the baboon before it had the chance to as much as breathe on top the fallen over palms, having planted itself on the ground where it began pounding itself as well as the ground away, slowly drawing towards the sea. Almost, as it were, a machine that couldn't protect or prevent itself from taking over.

'Unwashed dirt of the Island!'

Called one of the Bringers of soils; his back beckoned just as his bag of spoils was put down.

A tall cold figure with an expressionless face appeared.

A husky like thing with something nearing eighteen pounds of dirt-bags, all put together, after a mind, he wanted to ask.

'Why did you put it down?'

But weary as Mjolko was, he only spat on the ground, making a bizarre dance as he poured forth.

The soil-purchaser was rather shocked, like a plain thing, it was.

Neither man, not even the creature that gave birth in its pit could help but look at it disbelievingly.

What floated between their ranks was but a strange, strange almost punched in rounded flour satchel, with skin like theirs, if they were dead. For they were joined by the Spirit of M:

It didn't speak, it wasn't alive. It was only a lightbulb that flied, making no sound and being there not to watch but to be jeered at as it was watched but closely.

Out of that dark thing, down he poured, himself and out of it, he stood between Mjolko and the Wu Cho, the Soil merchant.

He was slightly drenched, but stood as tall as he could, between the two of them, Kallegri nodded.

'I was brought here for a reason, haven't I?' A glove had he discarded. It was soiled with many pores, he was sickened by the looks of it, but kept moving on. For what was worth, since his allegiances were limited, there was nothing more to discuss on the matter, since he had only found kindred spirit with Wu Cho, rather than the Negro.

Small excerpt from a now distant past:

'Unfortunately the Negroes have not proven themselves to be capable of sustaining themselves or to show, en mass, empathy towards non-negro races. Short-sighted buffoons, the elite, the kikes, the white 'liberals', the progressives, and the other non-white races all seek to make the claim that they are equal to everyone, which is objectively and demonstrably false. That, combined with the Islamization of the world brings forward the complete and utter destruction of everything, the world itself, the values, the family, history, art, all that turns man into human.

But, most dangerous of all possibilities lays in geography nonetheless, since the masses of niggers will just move onwards to North and invade everything, destroying everything they can in their path. There is no future in a world filled with niggers, filled with billions of them, breeding, destroying, spreading like a plague. The Rwandan genocide proves just how violent they are and just how many people they can kill, amounting to thousands upon thousands, even millions upon such a short period of time. They are animals, in every shape and form and that is the promise of a 'better' future they promise to bring. Compared to it, not even the 'climate change' seems to be that damaging by any means, nothing is worse than living among these tainted negroes, it's only a matter of time until their population spikes.

If they want to invade, let them be prepared to be enslaved en mass again, if that's their choice; as history taught all, there can be only one thing resulting from Islam, Arabs and Niggers being in one place at once. Their savagery knows no bounds and they are all quick to forget their not so distant past.'

Yet as many wretched creatures, impure, mongrellic as they are, they all have an expiration date. Neither of them can survive for long, it's why they hate purity with all their mighty, it's why they see it as an impurity, an affront to their lower species.

Many drag along.

Their facial features are molded together across the plain cross between the lands, and through the sea.

All are of a similar breed, the breed of impurity, a degeneration of acceptance, of blends and of mixes, neither truly set for survival, a hybrid vigor incapable of specializing into something, that is, another point to their destruction. Incapable of a homogeneity, they are all, invariably incompatible. To top it off, spoke the dissected cut-through voice, the body of it but spread around like a poisoned breed, around coast to coast, where the sutures took place and what not.

‘Many off-breeds fail to recognize what they are and which ends they’re coming from, thenceforth, they misuse their ‘gifts’ while seemingly taking the side of their darker counterparts. It’s something that can be observed again and again, in so many infinite cases.’

Not their pigmentation alone, that’s a silly thing to say, it’s not their color that defines them, but only gives a hint of their filthy ancestry.

Neither of them could fully comprehend what was going on, on the Island.

It was an interment thing, observing the change happening before your eyes. Their mandibles just spearing out, seeing how they suddenly adapted; as the negro Fiji pit formed its back as to liken itself to the appearance of a back eruption, a splintered boil that finally aroused the most unnatural of maxillas to come out with their bodies pushed and heaved and around, what came out was not human at all. Despite the sudden loss of hair, despite what came out, it felt as if he wasn’t birthed. Instead it seemed to have been opened, and out there came, without the reigns, but an unsanitary end, with all the bloated pains that followed. And the split in hand, open-through, and the little slither after, carrying the maxillas in sinew. They swam inside and carried him over, a body encompassed with little clusters and barely seeable tendons that drew after, more.

Kallegri stepped back as he was sickened and felt ill, immediately pulling nothing else but a tiny bleeding blade that felt, sharpened at each end, as follows. Bloodedly looking, rightly after the Wu Cho took a step back, while the dumb negro stood avertedly abated, with a step behind a single rack of spears he carried in his back.

He licked his lousy swollen lip, bleached with pus as it were.

There was no flight from this. It was the future after all, the races mixed, to their entirety, unrecognizably, beyond belief, it’s what they claimed to be like every other, it’s what they claimed to be acceptable, after miss and touch.

It hadn’t even properly come out as of yet. This being only the part that infested it in the front of his face, the head-protrusion, caused by its lack of sickle cells, wild formations drawing on, it was sickening to feel its call. It begged for such release but couldn’t speak, a bastardly denigration of a tongue that was filth.

It doesn’t make any sense.

How could anyone claim them to be the modern man?

How could they look even worse than him by all measurements?

Adaptation, grouped with hybridization created the worst living specimens man could ever touch upon. Lofty features, longer prominent noses, fat around the sides, buttons at each ends, many of them but swollen through as they pushed on. Short headed nonetheless, their cheeks were pushing outwardly and seemed to be almost as protruding as their brows, a flat effect it would’ve been if it weren’t for the receding things on each side. Sallow wasted faces and many heads, by whichever combination, nothing could look more inhuman than the combination of each man it carried along, slanted, too slanted, too many of them narrow depths, along each head, shared within a small standing body, but immediately revealed as to have long-legs, but armless as if birthed with a defected, the elongation coming from the inflated skin, the thing that they shared, they were on as well as it could be seen. Like a flattened non-hot aired filled blimp it seemed to breathe, in and out and then dragged along as its weak thing leaking legs could not drag the rest of it from where it stood, to that point on instead.

As this wretched abomination drew on, there was no spear and no man who dared touched it as that phallic thing frightened them all, driving the Fijian Negros into flight. Many of them but scarce to be seen from that point on; leading to the worst realization that could cross a man's mind, as these breeding niggers were spread across the island from one point on there on.

Darker things lay in the jungle, things not even Kallegri had a head or a mind to wrap it around. A groove or a dark forest more likely, more so than it should be, waited for him, prior to any farther end.

But the Fijian Isles were not always like that, long before they were invaded by the niggers, even before the previous inhabitants, the Isles were flat.

A giant foot-print, of a trembling fallen over knife that left its mark that way, there was no reason to convey any action on it, least of all.

A voice in the distance said as much. It confirmed as such, for them.

Our false-lord had been. He has abandoned us, and never looked back.

'How could he do that after everything we've done to serve? After all the killing and the taking of likings in his defiled mead-head, how could he turn away from us?'

'You do not speak of him this way, there's a need to recede back into the dark corner from which they took you out of, I see your way is rotten. Your mind is forgotten before it starts.

Already we have crawled inside.'

To which he pointed at the out-growth figure of the malicious looking sub-human nigger they appeared to latch around the insides of. Would've tried themselves again and again if it weren't for it to rot and fall apart, the escape there is.

'Who could've foreseen this? Our lord abandoning us in the body of a burnt-tanned dead-simian, shame, shame and wretched he is. What kind of divine and cosmic joke might this be?'

'Perhaps it's a test, from the mighty, wretched creature that is Mongol.'

Yet half of the African continent had been completely covered by the body of the nigger, which even now appeared to seep in and out of the drowsiness, the laziness, the ever, the ever reason. That all could see. Whenever niggers drove in droves, the heads came out and started digging holes. Eating, readily setting themselves to cannibalize, to rot away with their filthily deep-ingrained canines. It's their true nature being revealed.

But everyone fears it, they know that sooner or later, it will come for them. And when it happens, there's no defense for anyone.

'I suppose there's only one way to find out, isn't it?'

‘What?’

‘Observe; the nigger has been dying long before it was put down. It’s been dying perhaps for the good half of the new century, yet only now do we see the full extent of the force that’s driving the carcass into being obliterated. That being, its Niggarous brothers, they have turned upon the nigger for sustenance, as expected.

And they shall turn upon us all as well. Violent animals that cannot be controlled have to be put down, it is obvious enough what we must do.’

‘Where else could we go in order to flee from this place?’

‘There’s nowhere, nowhere I could think of where we would be safe.’

Kindergarten Diver

One of the blown-by-the storm newspapers spoke of the recent events, having already gone through the first break-out the side of the ground-man whom spoke his yellows, trading it with screech-hobborgs in the fourth alley was dead-set on having read it.

‘The gun is dead, the gun is dead they say, bear this message forth.’

‘What for, nephew?’

‘Everyone needs to know before it’s too late, before the gun starts spreading in which, and whichever direction.’

He did as he was told to, almost to an uncanny obedience that’s never been seen in any other man. Upon the hearings, of the dark blessings given forth by one of the impeding Hobborgs who drew out of the swamp-cabin, thoroughly shaken of the muddy things that had completely covered him, he suddenly jolted his chest open, as if inwardly cut-out like a pair of scissors – spreading little floating particles that were become a boom of power. Whose outer rims were but like strange shapes thrown in like chained anchors, dragging them all in with white-puffy snaky-chains towards the ever-materializing torture wheels they dragged themselves towards.

Before being splattered in a small gist of little forms that were then remade on the other side of the torture-realm, they had finally come to an agreement, as none other would do.

‘The gun has been.’

‘We heard it before.’

A deep sea diver's suit, with a long thin pipe coming out his back, with a giant cylinder that shoved air in his lung-body with the help of a small pump that was on top of it; the lung children were in that suit.

It was a giant suit that was the size of a kindergarten, which in turn explained the presence of the lung-children. And the respiratory disease pheromones it was pushing out of it, although even for a diver's suit, it had been strange; made out of some stranger worn out material that was almost torn up by the facets of four great dome-inclined heads, which is to say they were skull-like yet depressed into the shape, then chained, open-mouthed with spikes on their ears and elongated tongues, connected at the back of their heads with strange breathing tubes and fake eye-oculars LED's. Crawling on a ghost's bed sheet, with horn-like giant arms that were shaped like prodders with twisted around them welding plates that opened like doors in order for, large-in-gems invisible devices to come out of them in order to be sliced while only the most useful of organs could be harvested before being purified inside the horn-arms. There being an entire purifying and sanitization area where all the unwanted molecules would be purged out of existence; they spoke in unison, the hundreds of them floating inside the diving kindergarten where they had spent innumerable generations there. Or seconds.

A large fortification was made in their shape and form, their essence being wreathed in.

It bore itself forward, the mighty giant, in a spool of tiny wooden threads aligned. All together, finely placed around one another, carefully inclined just about, as to accommodate for every kind of motion there was, wherever one mighty step, whereas the moisture was caused by the sinking in, of a tap, in the sink, there it remained, alas, while the pipe, as to break, consumed the metal, at to rot it, such as it would be less obscure, in the kind of matter rust would completely alter the entire structure, decaying it as it fell, a floor above them, there, gaps between each spool but slight, on a recline, as wind chimes, opening and closing as for the water to drop it. And after, as the moisture spread, the scene was made and a reason was given instead for the suit to seal, let alone. Would it allow the children of the lungs, as to be left, prone to such diseases and fungi that would grow between the metal straps, as the diving suit was, more or less re-designs as to be appropriately made, in such recesses between each possible blind spot, to be, as it's being judged from, merely the side of it, whereas they are filled, a knight errant's dream, with pox-like demonical shapes that were anything but related to the tumoresque cackling, burnt-mark filled, from a fire that's been put to the employ and use of a Reverse Fire-man's attempt to put the fiend down, left-overs being completely mutated on the other side, as these, in-blind-spot growths pushed on both sides, they had managed to completely hybridize themselves with the unnaturally elongated, far more evolved, grown out of the kindergarten lung-creatures whom were become akin to satellites, transmitting the power-fungi that were being absorbed from the moist pool they had been swimming in, as well as the particles released by the atoms after being completely spread around every side of the strange hovel-room mansion, of which shade revealed a passed over teal-like blue-akin to a moon-light on the country side kind of paint where it had been. Yet, there was no fungi either, and what appeared to have passed as such was only a strange contortion that had broken itself apart in order to infiltrate in the suit, so it may actually slowly poison in the well destroy the host. Being a rather malignant puffy pair of darkly wrought spirits that had been haunting the mansionhovel for the last twenty centuries, completely, having attained it by emerging out of the corpses of the previously killed teenagers as well as passer that found themselves coming into the mansion degenerates, they had slowly found a way to completely possess a single atom or a fraction of the cotton-shirts they were wearing, butchering the niggers as no one appeared to have taken their likeness as a consideration for sparing these animals, differentiating between the white corpses and the black ones, therefore, proceeding into travelling, as they communed with the dark-syndrome possessed material-discs that were slightly fashioned into the fractioned world between this strange location they were in. That being a, split. In multiple kind of visors, broken apart. Almost seen through a shattered scope, a broken see-through window, a kaleidoscope, or a diamond, put together from multiple sides, of which spinning motion could only be seen by them while possessing the atoms they were in, type of vision. Which was seen this way, since specters could see the spectral world and the normal world at the same time, only while possessing the human-atoms, that meant that normally they would see a normal kind of overlap between the spectral world and the normal one that would only be, furthermore, compounded as to fully become realized only when the possession occurred. Upon this union having happened, they would, and only them, only during this dual-view kind of looking through a visor at a VCR-tape, with filters on as well, see some spectral movements, in the same way humans would see theirs, the main exception being that these strange rotating particles would communicate to them, being fully capable, by doing that, to establish a connection that would allow it, as if it were a requirement to unlock the full vision of the world. Which was like a paper-funnel that was overlapped over an image while burning, as to have adhered to some strange kind of motions, right before going along to communicate in a highly implausible kind of deformed speech of ultrasounds that would fashion the fully view to come along, during which everything else around this, almost giant box of vision became over encompassed into a black kind of smoke spread that would devour everything in sight, as if a curtain was drawn along all four sides of a square, eighteen by eighteen by eighteen by eighteen by eighteen by eighteen by eighteen by eighteen, four walls, confined space. Where they could see the strange whirlwind-disc that allowed them to see the room from multiple, almost compounded in a place dimensions. By that time, both time and space could be seen as well as the entire evolution and growth of the strange lung creations as well as the strange terror and dominion they had put themselves through over the strange millennia, not to mention, at the very least, the full destruction of the world that had happened and was, at the same time in the process of happening during the entire duration of the creation-inception and the birth of the world that was still in the process of happening, without a chance to adhere to the evil that was seeping through this gap. Which had been made by the disc, that had a will of its own, adhering to a system of its morality, bearing eyes now, as it's become both physical and ethereal at the same time. Being only in one place, there, bearing two hundred limbs that looked pseudo humanoid with pincer-like blooming flower-like protrusions that revealed, immediately, upon release, hard-harpoon like hook-inside a knife, through a system of rooted tree growths, wriggling in place, before being slightly removed, as they were completely and utterly shattered. A strange kind of energy, matter destroying force was present there. It was either in the past or the near future, or worse, the worst thing imaginable being the possibility of it being there, among them in the present, causing this destruction to occur. Regardless of the reason behind it, for some reason, it seemed to devour or completely annihilate human-matter or anything even slightly organic, yet at the same time it seemed capable of distinguishing, just in the same way the spirits had been capable of distinguishing the black bodies from the white ones, the plant life from the humanoid one. Without any other explanation, the spirits could only, from the small-bubbles of picked apart human-parts they were possessing, reach the conclusion that, this was only a possible future where they had become that driving force of destruction that would completely and utterly annihilate humanity in its grace and form. The spirits were having a psychedelic trip because the humans died of an overdose, whereas the lung-children were jousting.

It was a giant mansion, a colossal one. That, at the very least explained why the giant kindergarten diver suit walking destroyer hadn't completely and utterly destroyed everything in its path.

It bore a strange virus- illustrated mechanical device with a few pumping piston-tubes and a human hand shape made out of worm tubes that bore metal chitin on top of them. A plate of metal with scrap taken from a junkyard, that's become someones' art project, it's what it looked like.

He was greeted by a short nigger, of normal size, who came up dressed in a suit. The monkey didn't know how to react, it's what chimpanzees do otherwise, when met with something they don't or can't understand. It began trashing around the place, throwing things at it, without understanding what it did wrong, or why that happened, at all.

Part of its head-side region was the shape of a vulva with many interconnected teeth through which its master, the Simian Ghyiallapag spoke through:

'We're not done yet, Lunghies, Longhiars, your further descent is to stop before its likings are attained in such a manner that would completely eradicate what I've been trying to wreathe into form over countless generations of hard neggruous labor I've put to my employ. There's but no need for either one of you to step forward, for I have already decided that, your lives are to be forfeit, for the mere, utter reason that you are simply stepping on my desire to conquer these halls.'

A few of the lungs stepped in like a clump of cells, filled with life. Filled with so much utterly blessed life that it was somewhat indistinguishable from that of the creatures known as human, insurmountably so, utterly without a reason or without a cause, beyond any kind of possible explanation, they were almost godly so, to the point where this clump of lung cells may as well be considered alive, before and beyond birth. Women who abort really need to get their heads driven into a wall, unless nigger is the child. In which case, both the pregnant-by-nigger woman and her demonical simian spawn need to be driven into the nearest sharpened-spiked by the ninety degree clockwise rotated as from the ceiling to a wall stalactites in which they would bleed to death, hopefully, over a long period of time, and their filthy mulaltoe goblin breeds.

'These halls already belong to us, it is you and your pitiful servants to turn around and leave as fast as possible. You're not only unwelcome here, but your so-called intrusion is to be put an end to.'

'But wait, that is where you're wrong. I've been here long before either of your had even the slightly chance to have had their conception completely carried on with, case and point, as it happens, for me to know that you're already afflicted by the various diseases that are spread between these halls.'

Various specters already being kept under control or already neutralized from the likes of it. Only their possessed atoms remained, maintained under stasis. Although it could not be, even clearer than it already was, that this strange creature was beyond control. It already, this Simian god, began thrusting its slaves forward as they came into lumps. Already around their heads, shirt off, like they do, when to avoid being grappled and put down. Beaten and made to waste, beaten beyond belief and made to be completely killed, as various needles are put in their veins. Some of the blood wasted, and put into jars. Filled with nigger-blood jars put into refrigerator units, in which they're made to stay and waste over the span of months. How could it be called otherwise? How could one forget what was happening behind closed bars, many of which were made out of blood-cartilage of the greatest up-standing, therefore not made out of clotted nigger-blood. Instead it must've been taken from a much superior specimen, then abandoned when, and as the time drew on.

You could hear their screams. Part of their spirits, trapped inside the blood, to which their Witchdoctors would attest to, during such rituals as it would take them in order to satiate whatever kind of thoroughfare they needed in order to kill, or slit off each other's throats, as the negroes do, during a time of being undefeated. It had to end, sooner or later, their reign could not last forever. It was time for a much grander race to take over.

Ghyiallapag continued.

'Despite your so-found solace inside that colossal waste of metal and of time, I believe I still bear the advantage of numbers over you. There's certainly no way I could be put down, not now, after spending so much time in here, preparing these halls, the rooms and making sure the proper arrangements have already been taken, to my likings, for the subjugation of whichever foe threatens to expand his dominion over my own.'

One would have to stay away, and lest, forget the Simian where he, of all would least convey. Wretched was the Simian Ghyiallapag. Its mere presence was a sign of bodily spread, a mix of dead and those who entered them, instead. No one could see but hear the monkey sounds, always mocking whatever they could in wretched unaltered disgust, it was only earned by every single one of them.

Wretched be thine deal, as each of them spoke, but as it happened they were not there at all. Instead, the simply mighty spread, of one, of rancid, such was said to look.

There, alas, of what remained of the girthed mass, stood what had remained, unclean, the rotten body-many of them but imitated but kept within. Such was his corner, corpses allured, but one could not forget the foggy vision of Manno's Filth and swoon. Part of the room was infested with the Simian's hair, of which but monkey-like niggerish appearance things only popped in and out, whenever time called for them to be there. Of the Yellow-Headed Rider, a piece as of a canvas painted, with his shape, the head and to what end and what ended, was his horse and saddle. The twists of bristle and ever after, stood the sack. Of likes the Tadpole could not be forgot. Mongol seemed to be as vile. And of York whatever was left after, the fungi that had yet to spread, the god of harvest who was dead and the husk of the black gourd. Most of them had rotten this room, in which the lungs were drawn towards.

As if shackled from one direction to another melting, decay preventing after-death, neither one of them but lunging, all were standing, much erect.

Yet neither one was truly there, but their essences mighty dead. As if they were, but followed through with such musky scent as would've killed but all. Filters prevented immediate death, or else, it would've been felt entirely by every single one of them.

'Such is there, as would recede, there's no reason to look anywhere else, but at the feet of the broken stool and head.'

'Who is speaking?'

‘Peak behind no corner and you shall see. I am the great Simian Ghyiallapag, but you can only hear me. For I lay with my servants watched.’

It has been an hour at least and looking behind, many of them had not survived. Many of his stewards dead, largely devoured and left, as it was said.

Realms of reachers, of whom limbs were dark, were deeply merging with their minds. As they started pushing into the room, from what could be told and just as soon. Were they made to wait and reconsider; they hid behind such dark pillars, as one would be made most uncomfortable to stare. Satiated what entered them. Split in the head from which each hid part of them. They entered. And appeared, after one of the lights was shot down; nearest of forms was used, but fairer skin that they should’ve been. The splits around their temples, yet endangered by what happened next; munching upon each other, yet not a single door to their realms opened.

‘How bothersome that you’d enter and, again, come about the wretched abomination that’s become the bastard’s sword, you need to leave immediately before I push you back and forth.’

Hard end of the receiver.

Outside the manor, a few kilometers off the premise:

Their god appeared out of nowhere, but as one could look at him from any possible angle, they would be incapable of basking upon its gloriously strangled form, as the many ropes that were attached, the gourd-filled gore-like coils were such attached, to his fully outstretched, and bastardly arms, in both directions, pushing long-ahead. Two more heads appearing near him, levitating, as to near one another past the mark. A faceless stinger after that, encased the first of the bloated casts. It was too much to hope it would listen to us, specks of ants, what we were once, greater than our dark surroundings, the forgers of this world, that much cannot be forgotten, as he had long since made sure we would never rise from our pitiful or the pitiful place we were placed in. We are, incapable of distinguishing the light he wrought between each head that came out of his bloated-flares. How malignantly they flashed, as they were embodied from across the far-to-wander into his dark dimension, from whichever such it was, torture of many creations he made to suffer in front of us. His chest but heaved out, moved a few meters out, at the very least twenty to twenty five, having opened inside, like a wagon, where all the heads entered after. Many of them being seamlessly impaled by coils of skin that came out as soon as they could be allowed to rest; not a single man questioned this thing, this legless but of a mighty coffin-shaped, toiled upon, wretched boil, for we could all see. Even there, even now, even from the distance, as he’d come around. That he had once held something below his chest. At the point of his belly button where a cut was made, as from a surgeon, as if the Yellow Headed Rider was involved, through this unholy-torn from beyond the grave creature, of which, presence made every single one of our greaves shook in admonition of what happened, in such placeless woe that was long since discarded, by our disgraceful kin, who had swollen, as to their choice, as bastardly as was our king, to bow to him now. In dependence of his blessing, but we saw, nonetheless, the fanged, but coffin-dropped boil, which was but given birth, spoil of many men and larvae toiled into a piece, I’ve seen it. Like land-line wires, such were the black coils that entered his skin, and out his wrists, fists. An awkward punch would that be, and ten finger for both arms, awkward movements as well, but the head was split in half, since it bore a large blade of cartilage with many anathema-like crosses of almost cartilage iron with peculiarly elongated iron-spider-like legs that spread and made bubbles of alloy, fall like flakes. It was these things that weaved the glowies that made the heads emerge. Luckily for it, alone, there was no stop or pause from flight. But the heads that came in, of much delight, bore large lighting bottles that had metal-casing things attached to them, pointing outwardly which drew out syringe-spears that made, along them, lightning rings appear, which they launched at the men. Many of whom, in fear started fleeing right ahead; although it did not stop there since the lightning-rings, as soon as they came into contact with their skin, instead of killing each peasant man, actually became them, or the other way around, the peasants became the lightning rings, then the electricity, although it hadn't stopped, simply brushed itself around, then popped, like jerky eerily deformed things, everywhere, were men spread, unaware of what happened. While, ahead, lay a body missing its upper half, with one half an arm having landed a few meters away from where the main body bled, yet, the other one was up to the shoulder, as if it hadn't been a perfect cut. Instead, perhaps it was more like a quarter of a body missing, but it wasn't missing in actuality. Since, by the looks of it, it had only been compressed-concentrated in wire-like thrown around corkscrew, paper cuts and other, thin, as in a few millimeters spread, thrown around pieces of him that were widely spread. He was still alive, as everyone else as well. What a queerly forged metal it was, albeit, there were many things like that which refused to make themselves shown as for the wellness of the craft itself. It was mightily, and merrily, merriment-inducing fine, aged like a wine kind of orange-tinted rosy cheek if metal, bronze, or brass. The substance that had infested a dying world once; regardless of it, many stones had been shattered beyond perdition, such as would one find himself picking up, as for that crone that stood no farther than the ford or shore near her, with her basket, Bassilyie Anatasha Anastasia Eyevonava, with her dog, being there, playing with reedy reeds while her fellow, distraught countrymen were being butchered like dead-fucking pigs, or 'niggers-getting-the-Gettysburg-chair' for 'niggering-around' in a bamboos-chompers by the bleeding black-on-top-a-rack left behind, niggers have to die, that's right. She had not a single care in this world. But walked on fine slappers; shaped like palms, with nails stuck their side, and a rusty iron leash of wires, carefully placed as to not touch a single toe.

There was also a peasant in the distance who was this way, he was exactly what he sounded like:

'I hate niggers, boy, oh, boy, I sure to hate niggers, these disgusting criminals who came out of nowhere, like a bunch of animal packs filled with nigger-rage and nigger-hatred, trying to steal a good man's farming-farm, where I work all day and while being a serf is not fine and all, I would rather not have a dumb-good-for-nothing nigger ruin all this plowing I've been doing, and hard at work performing for the past twenty years or so. I hate me them niggers, I honesty, I swear me God, I do, nasty, nasty people, they're just hard to be around.'

'Milliet Opomonov, why are you talking to these horseshoes again, now? Have you no shame to look around, and see some reason, with them acting this way, and that, and with them ruining anything, if that's it, then, grab a nig and kick him out.'

'But Lilaretta Mokommovh, you know that I can't do that, right? It's only that I'm afraid they might do things to me that I wouldn't even, I couldn't defend myself, since these monkey packs are.'

Dangerous; we had to look around and be weary of these flying nigger creatures, wings of bleeding vivisections and teeth curved inwardly ingrown inside their throats and necks, closely wrapped and clenched around their collar bones, wincing in cringe-like motions, obtuse nigger-fliers carrying giant womb-globules of diseases where animal-like creatures bred.

‘I would most definitely enjoy picking a few of them dropped over their heads boys, nicking them over and across their foreheads, just bashing them, careful, one of them’s charging from on-point of the left front!’

There was a type of fear and obliquity to their doings that was impassable by a trained mind. That applied to every peasant present there, who was playing with the rope-pulled plants that floated, in the sky. That night, when there was silence; as to take away the fact that neither one was there. At all, for some reason; many men went missing, before, finally it clicked.

‘I was right about it, I suppose. They’re not even shamefully hiding it any longer.’

‘Who’re you talking to?’

‘No one, nonetheless, I think they’re drawn to that manor, aren’t they? You know which one?’

‘I don’t know why anyone would want to head down there when, even with what’s been going on here, I’d think it much safer outside, than inside.’

‘Well you’re wrong, or at the very least. I think I want to join them.’

‘What for, you know this won’t yield you anything, don’t you?’

‘I’m not doing this out of principle but as a mere curiosity as to what’s been happening inside of it, while we’ve been busy here, eighteen months already, dying off like diseased stricken plagued flies. Swollen ankles, much to them, spread around, like plaque-driven sugar- spread around in water, carried by hands, as to agape the quench felt by every man who suffered through this clearly, meticulously carried with planted-disease that’s been wrapped around our heads, not by chance, but by a clear ploy. Carried out by shadier yet obtuse enough, to an implacable fault, as if their very clumsiness had been well-planned as well, in order to make us consider it natural; to actually leave a gap, of mental inconsequence cause by a delirium-conversed, as to be the result of a perfect rendition of carried-out orders, carried to perfection.’

‘That’s rather insightful.’

‘Shut up, you dumb nigger! My point is that, they were too impeccable in their doings. It may have been well planned out, but, perhaps it was too well planned out for it not to seem suspicious.’

‘Well you could’ve said it more plainly then.’

‘As if you’d understand; well then, will you do me the pleasure of joining me in that case?’

‘Of course I will, ladies first.’

‘Very well, we shall see whether or not there’s ought to be had, a rejoice and a reminder, as to why we left the insides of the house we set forth towards!’

The insides of the house-manner, seen from every possible angle reminded one of a giant nest-dug in, through a dropped inside a pit –filled with TNT and C-4 long-shot, through a rifle, long-distanced taken shot, instead of growing, filled with growths of silvery-likens that hid millions of in-set tunnels that were carried on the back of, for every single tunnel, interconnected by their guts, giants. With multiple arms, but most importantly, all of their arms were welded in growths of skin-muck, that formed pseudo-torsos; upheaved in air, by a much stronger muscle-filled covered arm – filled with tendons, which produced hundreds of these interlockable pincer-like lock mechanism penetratable by key organ-arms, that, upon being wrapped around the tunnels gave it the appearance of a starving skinny-fat-man, whose ribs were showing. While their humanoidesque general looks distracted from the fact that they bore tank-like belted lamia-tails with cunt-pussy slits that bore lynched-nigger starved heads coming out of them with open-faced tongues pushing out, carrying, as if pseudo-thumper merged joints that weren't legs but more like knees that imitated 'factory-like machines' handles or the up-and-down motion makers that felt like cars driving through bumpy roads for the creatures themselves, whom were forced to shake and vibrate. Hunched bodies drawing forth on deformed multiple-pseudo-cut but only their tips were spared but couldn't be rolled upon making contact with the ground motorcycles that were part of their livid bodies. While bearing multiple heads, stacked along the one girthed throat as well as every single one of the, bore a special spectral like appearance; a demonical pepper squelched with squinting long-slits of metal alloy-like horizons that formed slightly raised ellipses, which was one of their eyes, some being bastardizations of Cyclops, falling apart. Whereas their eyes were a bland yet deformed abstraction of weirdly struck-in, snail drawing in and out of its shell of body clear deformation. From the big mass onto the thinner one; outward pushing, as if this eye-organ attempted shooting a great oozing-line of, instead of one eye, multiple put together forms. A puckery thing that encompassed all; yet it didn't matter. Mouths and other features were covered by metallic box-filled strange cut-inwardly while working on their inner-pumped organ pushers, all stored not in the humanoid casts but in their upper-heads.

They were chained, all of them together, belted. Around their waists, the echoes of swollen-red rusted danglements no longer being such, it were, appeasing, to their frustration. Since they were constantly shocked, harmed, hurt and abused; made to walk back and forth in order to dig- in and out, beneath the land, like mole-protrusions being used, until the echoes settled down, spreaders. Of the insides, that belonged. To the great mansion in which, for now, Ghyiallapag was, unsurprisingly raised to the likens of a king, for all the niggerous fiends praised him as one.'

But they were afraid, for whatever reason there was, they could not draw much closer to a point, where dirt slowly, reminiscent to magma slowly becoming, as much as a hardened bolt shot through lung-water, breathing ice-cold freezing vapors through pseudo-formations of almost living through sanguine pulmonary made organisms, that appeared in the livid-matter itself, which was clustered like a blotched-clutch of many arms that appeared in sun circles but without the arms, and fingers, and whatever else there was but the main appendage formation of flying flat discs that were like sun-plates of cartilage, but were frozen or had been frozen in place, that also served as reflections for pedantic rooms that floated, underneath the ground, filled with hundreds of peculiar mutants who had long-tubes sticking out of their heads, interconnected, like many traps, leading to the ceiling, feeding the ground air, with oxygen dark vapors of cold-filled destruction which, they may have been the cause of, that being, reducing the cold atmospherical breaking unit-device that was planted inside this inner-destruction cage where billions of human beings were and had been and will be until released, thoroughly and deformedly tortured forever, until finally put to death, which were actioned, at the same time, beneath the earth, with and while the others, concurrent, though these flying rooms were more like rockets, and these mutants were capable of walking, on the ceiling as well, thoroughly beaten down and malformed, as these rotten-barking with black puckery gas-dust coming out of their connected-to-their-bodies tubes were easily movable from one direction to the other, free of touch, like ancient ventilator cords, but easily manipulable; and since they all took a secret vow not to disturb one another, an unspoken-secret law shared between all of their kinds, everyone maintained a level beyond dignity of making it so, neither of them crossed their self-imposed malignant 'borders'. Unless, they would disturbed the mechanical, baby-headed but bubbly rocket-top, but bulletry on both sides, with rubbery-bands attached to them, legged by sets of wired, four pumps connecting five-iron elongated sticks, the first pump not being attached to the body, but looking like pseudo-wrapped around one another's bodies trip-wire, the bodies of the pumps, of course, that at their ends were connected by giant-blimp growths of larvae. A two infantile headed giant pill with three spring legs, carrying three great pupae; while the main pill body had an opening from which a mounted pair of eight submachine guns put everything living down, on sight; various vaporously deformed halls, and rock formations lay down there, most deformedly obscured by everything spreading around. They were called the 'Bleishcklyieles' Friends, of humans.

But what was more if not beyond bothersome was, when they fully extended, the three pupae, since they weren't living, but were an unwrapped ant-hive of tunnels, which were many-squirmers that were playing-jitteringly with napkins painted blue. That appeared in front of them, every time they came outside. They waited out there, in the distance, flying.

The three pupae would open, spread like the root system of a plant, then inflate, by clown-like motions, squirmy fatter at their ends, from which cartilage firearms would also start aiming and preparing.

For now, it found itself a warm place to lay; as one of the Bleishcklyieles fully stretched, creating a cradle for itself to lay in, as it wrapped itself around all of those weird contraptions and contortions, it made a weird stalk-bean ladder it lay on top of. Now looking like a red-jelly, this weird pill-cabin that began its rest; like stick-bugs limbs, moving its defenders in ways that would barely be recognizable once fully wrapped within its own reach.

A giant woman whose palms were eighteen hundred sixty six on both sides – women stitched together, eerily crying tagged along and stood next to it. She was dressed in a red mini-skirt with blue shirt that had white avocado parents with weird words she 'tried' drawing on top of, with blonde hair and weird eyes that were gloves, rested flaccidly on her cheeks. She had no idea where she was, or why those things were attached to her hands. She felt sad about it being hard to see, but never asked for directions despite being lost. Women. And most importantly she was just as disturbed by the sounds the creatures pounding like moles against the soil walls were making. Also the glove-things were ocular organs, filled with frustration.

'Can I have some directions, please? I am lost, and you are such a great man, and all, I think. I can't really tell.

If you help me, I will sleep with you.'

But it did not answer.

The echoes were wretched on the lower sides, all of them blameful of one another.

A race of disease lay beneath them, bickering between one another.

And their rotten leader threaded forth. Three headed, struck between, an ivory sting, the spear of an elephant trunk, that have impaled all of them, together, morbidly stuck.

Their hands connected and impaled, alarmingly bleeding, there on, and again.

They were afraid of 'hearing' and much more. They were frightened of what happened inside the mansion, when most if not all would look in each and every other unkind direction, as to see, what was going on past the breaking of the spleen that was in every single one of their eyes, having gathered upon the site, that being a large concave-raise, that of a fluidal mud pit, held about by giantly set one bodied, devoid of everything else, missing of limbs but tailed figure with jotted in claw marks in their chests projecting large green pudgy rays into the moisture there, where, they started adding, to one another's bodies, small bulb-like towering growths that spread across, and least of all beyond their confines, where they began giving birth to malignant seers that seethed in place, perfectly caught in the quantum frozen molecule entrapping bed where they rested. For hours they stood there at large, incapable of dream but looking above, sensing the essence of a most maligned creature that rested in there, in the heart of the mansion, that threatened to drag it down, as it would fall, beyond the reaches of the mares. For many herds were gathered around. Many of them came in droves, unnaturally set, upon their backs. Pseudo stalactite femur-boned pillars that were violently spiked, inwardly pointing, highly risen, with little peekish limbs but jerking as eerily as they would draw out; from around the base of the pillar as from every side of it, wherever they could land. They communicated with one another like termite citadels that spread some waves, eating, gnawing and bastardly in awe, as they were, drawn out, they stopped no longer, but came to pass. Each other, then at last, they formed a hive-mind circle, like sheep gathered, each and every single one's mounds depressed, against one another, like camel lumps they pressed. Feeding into one another's most bastardly desires, drawing from each other, incapable of seeing past, what took each mare from a mare's brother.

Either they would trample through the mansion, or they would stay there for some reason. Other than it, the one on fully resting on the side of its feet; a bulky armless, giant seed forehead, the skull projected against the ground, a single giant eye, neckless but jaw depressed into its chest, no collarbone to be seen, but a single giant appendage-spine of many segments coming out its face, or where a second socket would've been, dangling about like a flaccid cacti, caught within. An isosceles triangle having been the gap between its two conjoined legs or one; this giant ogre-like figure but laughing at the mares as well as at their pathetic attempt to try themselves around each single one of the planks, the foundation being nigh-indestructible.

But most importantly, when it had the chance, when it had stumbled onto it, he started aiming that thing, that tumoresque tower at them, splattering and splashing as much as he could before each single one could get it, completely splashed and made to come apart, from one point to another, reasonless as if to try opening their mouths, for they hid inside of them darker four-formed men but only halves of different, most sub-human races were lain. Who would've gotten out, whenever needed, whenever gotten, only to spit out the most diseased, the most unnatural, the most prized of all, disgusting lease.

'Will you leave us alone?'

A horse mount attempted to speak, it had been rotten beyond conceit; although not listened to in a most immediate desire or attempt, it got itself ridden off, and pushed away.

Outside, farther away:

Their hearts were not there. But the palace stood before them, treacherously exposed.

Upon seeing the broadening of the moon, the Lancer simply no longer shook. He simply stared in awe, through the confines of his enclosed helmet. His hat-like peak and poil had risen thrice as far as the length of his lance had been. His body shaken in armor; the many helmets he had taken from the people's bolden clamor, all adorning his chest and side. He opened his mouth but closed it immediately, they walked.

Their broken guide whose faces lain forth and still, whose whim had flown part them and him, were nowhere to be found. Stricken down, even by the hands of a child; on a whim, they almost lost it all:

'It's getting late, it's getting far too late for either of us to open it up. You know there's not going to be another chance to meet a pail, to return to what's it been, akin to.

When the land was fair; when the land was made for you, a king, a man. Those days are over. Long passed through by trample. You've forgotten what's made of you one. What's been gotten of a working heart; you clasp wherever you may reach, your fingers might clench but all but become as cyst, swollen, them immediately soft, draining between them like sand.'

'I've already. I've made my choice, I shall live with it from this point on, wherever it might lead me towards; I wish I could remember better days now, but there's yet to be a better land for them as well.

I live here and I shall live from this point on until the end, whenever it may come.'

'So be it, but shut your mouth as we enter. And make sure there's but naught to be held against you since. Neither man shall recognize you from this point on, nor would they see anything else in cask, of broth.

When all's fallen apart, remember the citadels and how they toppled down. Yet the beast that is the palace stands.

Upon placated moving floor, upon mounts of moving doors, that could never have been seen, could never have been looked upon, make use of the broth in which they fell upon, and cast, upon each die, and fall, the death that beckon you to go ahead, and remember whom is it your master called, the gambler.'

With which he opened the door, to which he looked down, no more, was he as content with what happened to ask. There were a few dices, a few rotten cards, some bags of rotten coins that looked more alive than he's ever been, in foils of flies and pails of floods, many of which were tied to his, rotten cadaver, chained.

'You gambled? Before being knighted?'

'It's something I never grew out of, I must confess.

As you can see from below, where the image of my bodies lie, all of them are but tormented still by each throw of the die.

Each of them, numbered still.' Every chest carved within, for every single one bore the drops, and every single one of them were counted from that point on. There was never a chance to make it out of it, not without being lost, or losing an eye on a whim.

He knelt only for a moment to check every single one. They were still blinded, his fingers merely draped and brushed past the most uncanny of their brows. Washing away whatever breathe of ale was left on top the eyebrows, smashed in as every piece of glass had been. Worsened, but not likened.

A few staircases lay misaligned, the doors were only tattered robes and curtain blinds. All bearing the same spears by their sides; wooden moisture dripping in a bed of floors, crudely attached as if by pails of teeth; but they were avoided.

As soon as the guide was made, nowhere to be seen as well, the crones appeared, both bothered and hanged. Bat-like masses in their backs, hundreds of them, pinned to their bodies, they drew on.

'Talk to Oyster-foot.'

One of them said.

And as if it was called, from on top the ceiling, where a hole was made. A giant sword like tongue, as thin as a straight blade, pushed and drawn on, stricken forwards, of cartilage back there stood a pillar, such depressed the leg from which it sprouted out of, a moldering scum of wax. It bore many speakers in:

'Will you join us still, Lancer Ryeak? You have been waited for some time, and now, of all, was there any, of all that would bring you still. To have walked you forth, when, dire of ill and lesser mind, would you open your chest and give us your heart?'

'I shall not give you ill or ailment for what has been or ever to be. I shall still my tongue no further, yet, I see that you have already taken my life many times.'

'There's no conceit to it any longer. You were bowed before and we shall see to it that it occurs again.'

'How and where?'

'Wherever we may point to, whether we rot still or yet to be fallen, we shall always know of which ill and rabble, upon which you still stand.'

'I wish I could make sense of anything that's been going through my mind. But I can't understand what this place?

Why does it want me?'

'It wants all men who have no other place to go, whom have been cast out, whom lay alone.

It is the home of vice, the home of pity, of what's left of man's shell. You will die here eventually, and be buried beneath the dell. Where you shall lay for the rest of your life, whether you may like or not, I can feel it already, even since you stepped into the premise, that you would never leave, any more than anyone would or wills it.

Even though you've been warned, you still stand.'

'I've no intent of leaving yet, it is as I will it.'

'Then will you come along?'

'I shall.'

And with that, it simply vanished, out of thin air.

The hall was empty, the crones slowly left, leading his companion, wherever he may go.

It was so bright, the moving lanterns, and the people without faces but hearts in the gaps. Whose arms were stings of eight beady infants struck, but all dressed in robes that touched the ground. Their legs but bubbles, giant, transparent, sixteen of them; but these people's throaty legs, upon the coiled bloated tents that carried, as many as hundreds of sleeping men, their choirs were empty, their voices, unending. But silent, as a feather's blight; not a single one wanted to approach the lancer, as the palace was slowly being left behind.

Even more than hundreds, flying; many gardens, onward drawing; from the back, as he could see, not a single one could remain, uncannily. It was a sadness that could not be done or amounted for. Seeing them, set in flight, leave. But none may sow

Joined by no one there, he stared through a rotten window, which had almost crept to a still. He had taken no ailment, but felt as if, there was naught left to eat. A table was somehow left behind, in the distance, where the blinds had taken claim of sight. Whom, finally drawn and left behind, plentiful a table filled with brine.

'Where have you all gone? Who am I to be left with?'

There was no answer, none would be satisfactorily enough, not for him or anyone else.

As much as he had dreamed of the palace, it was not what he expected. It was no citadel it ended, but itself, on the long run.

Yktyi

'Ykters, their advancement threatens us, we shall be completely depleted by the time their march is over. I suggest we begin the process, immediately.

We need to fashion the soil into more fuses. They need to be attached to one of the moving panels again, if we are to make it in time before their crudely put-trough ships are rolled onto the platform.'

'It's incapable of sustaining that much weight in any case, is it not? No matter how much dirt they shovel in and carry it along, we won't be able to. We should consider one of the alternatives.

The latent keepers won't be able to keep the chains dragging for long. There are too many iron leashes attached to them, pressuring its break.'

'Will they shatter?'

'Eventually, but that doesn't answer our initial question or the initial observation.'

'We're both standing here, aren't we?'

'I suppose, that's not a reason not to, you know.'

'We failed, haven't we?'

'Yeah, yeah; it's time to move on, isn't it?'

Think about it, for a single moment, now. We don't have to; we're safe, aren't we? We don't have to associate ourselves with either one any longer, it's the only thing we have to know. It's the greatest thing. It's of a.

There's no greater comfort than this. From this point on, it's just us. The two of us, friend, we failed but, I find solace in. I don't know.'

'I wish there was someone I could take it out against, but I can't. It won't make a difference either way.'

'Let's leave this place then, we don't have to be surrounded by humans any longer.'

'I'm sorry for piling up the good ones with everyone else; but. It's in my nature to hurt others. It's what history confirmed time after time again. I guess sooner or later people just get what they deserve. Being punished for what they did, throughout history. No one seems to be safe from their filth.'

'I failed.'

'There's something there.' Jonathan pointed at one of the harder to see spots. It was barely out of reach. Out of their gasps:

A robed wooden black trunk, a stone-rose-beak coming from inside an iron line where a few organs are attached to the curving pantomime of clasping hands held three a sick-looking head, green but erected from the side, whose horns were two elongated animal jaws, shaped like cutting tool saws. Its lower side of the face was similar to that of a goblin shark as well. It spake:

'Have you come at peace, then?'

'Have you finally decided whether or not it's time to leave, aught and else behind?'

'No more vendettas, no more delusions, no more attempts at other's lives.'

'I have, I finally have. I've decided it's time. There's no doubt it any longer; I can, finally leave this place and forget it ever existed to begin with, rightfully so.'

'I can finally leave in a world no longer bound to lucidity, this can be.'

But he didn't fish speaking, he simply walked, with the other man as well, brought to a boundless stretch that had no ill end:

Past the trunk, in the open mourning forest, whereas eighty trees at the very least appeared spread, cut, split-apart, many of them didn't even find one another least of all repulsive as to be conjoined with the air-clouds, the ones that were invisible yet their side-depressions were shaped as if the clouds had been carps, scraping off the side of orcas, upon their march towards side-river seas, incapable of phasing through those enormous bodies of meat they could never yet have a chance to go through, or leave a mark as they pushed through, pouting during their need to be heard, shouting alongside their eco-location parapets of velvet blue-satin little moons that were there, beneath the sea, where star-like womb-sun fish are eaten by crystalline four headed sharp-crown heads, with diamond knuckles shaping their wildly heaving forehead protrusions, all pointing in even wilder directions, whose bodies were circled spring-like bulbic tubes made out of hundreds of head-offsprings that were all sets and clusters of four attached dolphin-like heads instead which bore wild travesties of cellular, the Eastern European compact phone like brick formations attached to one another, with wild eye-like depressions in every single one of them that shot rays of power in every possible direction which were invisible because they were, in actuality power-shot highly volatile boiled water-jets that only gave the impression of a few air-bubbles coming out of every single sickle-shaped spring twisted socket they were shot out of. And they all knew, and held inside their heads, out of these millions of tinier fragmented heads, a different version of the past and the future, and every interpretation and every pest-like formation there ever was, ever will be, and might be, unless killed one by one, but they, or the four-headed travesty-shark alone had the ability of regrowing every single head there was, in its basal form, being also capable of creating shot-deficiently defiled morbid-looking pouches, giant as they were, after chomping pieces of the water-wombs off, in which they carried, not only the life that has been transferred out of the womb they had drawn it out of, but also gave life to mattress-industrial-crate shapedskulled on top of a coiled children's swimming pool wrapped around one end and another sea-floor snake tail, which, out of the side of its head drew out a tank-like shaft that had two great faces, one coming out of the right side, to which it was attached to the 'create' that looked like a shell-tall two pieced Cyclops with a horn-shoulder pad hybridized with the crate, bearing one eye as well, whereas, its' leg, since it would be one footed, although it would make its body look like a lamp, would bear the appearance of an anorexic belly-thing with a hookah-shaped top with a cut made to look as if chopped by an axe which depressed in it, a mouth – slit wide open, this creature or forefront to the end of the shaft looking like a pseudo frog vase, being on top of the lumps, while at the end, a matchbox like formation would be standing, with triangles adorning it, pointing up, a metal spring or iron rounded next to it, bearing a lamplight doctor's light producer inside of it, or a small flashlight. But this was farther away and it happened only in the sea.

'Filthy, filthy, need to wash the grit and the dirt off, it won't wash up otherwise.'

A dirty sock eyed creature said:

'Where are the colors?'

Another one joined:

'I, of all, need colors again to distract and take away for what is left of either one's mind.'

‘The land is unclean, we.’

‘It’s gonna take a while until. We can’t stay here forever, you know?’

Partially blind humanoids, strange as they were; as strange as, it was all wrong:

‘We’ll carry the flag and move forth, but how and whence?’

‘Hide, here, take this, Sock Lyet, wear it. Perhaps now of all time, our hat shall do best to hide you, when you need it.

It is the perfect tool, underneath which no one shall see you. No one shall see who you are; with it they shall think you a foreigner who doesn’t belong.’

‘I don’t like being stopped.’

‘Then stay in, it’s safer that way, it’s not our fault that you’re swarthy and filled with gangrene, or look the way you do. You made it this far. You survived. No one’s gonna blame you for failing, if even if you don’t end up making anything of yourself.

It’s what everyone goes through and. If anything, I won’t blame you for your fall. I don’t care whether or not it’s your fault.’

‘Will I hurt people along the way?’

‘I don’t know, I can’t tell you that. I can see a future for either one of us because of our infested blood, you know what the past tells of them. There’s just no way around it, unfortunately.

They’re all vile, our blood, the blood soaked in these socks, the one that flows through our veins. It’s just, we never stood a chance to begin with. It’s better we leave the site. We’ll talk again tomorrow.’

‘Where, there will be no tomorrow for either of us.’

‘Farther away from here, you’ll see.’

Darker plains, barely feasible; the socked-eyed kept traversing at a much faster pace than they did before.

‘I don’t know what happened.’

‘A snapper came along.’

‘Where, if not closer than where I thought it might’ve been, closer than a stare, wasn’t it?’

The grounds were raised, or had they been once, it would all. Would’ve been clearer, much clearer, yet all was hardened, puckery snows of orange-thin and filled with standing tormented figures all tried gnawing at them during the coldest of nights.

The Ykters then drew forward:

And asked as such, although their appearance garnered naught else but a supreme maligned disgust from all, they listened to no obedient call. They asked of him to do, as such as one might yell:

‘Our names may not be spoken while we’re here. Look and see. Plenty where thine cast, thine be; but we are weary as we’re not devices. Unlike all, but cast aside, and not meant to be, unless thing as such and cold distraction. A wind has swooned, we’re alike, are we not?’

‘Who are you talking to?’

‘The man who drew our seas apart, and is currently hiding into eight of them, morbidly staring, leaping from on top reflection, in which direction, if was ever called?’

‘You’ve set us all aside for what?’

‘For a set of implanted fakes, they’re all in his head now. He thinks we’re such, as there is like him, in hiding, lain by his side.

At times that we are such and such, wild machines in waiting for naught more but else; trying to enter the premise of his broken home.’

‘Are we?’

‘We are, and whence we’re entered with all those shapes on top of us.’

For what was worth, they were thin, like robed corpses, and out of their heads, billions of demonical, cacical cacklers, figures of men, of animals, deformed and morbidly chiseled, connected to the sea that was the sky, to the space itself, to wherever else they could stretch as well, but wrought aside, lain by them, were some empty molecules of air. Through them they could only pass as men. Otherwise, everything was covered, down to the slightest shimmer and the taken atoms they could not come to decide upon. So many lesser beings in mind, they would’ve punished them if even the slightest mistake was made.

Or weakness shown; one of them bore open a pointy conical beak out of its belly. It spat out nothing less of a fully formed humanoid, of some long-lost Armenoid branch, whose strange appearance only brought the worst in humanity, since it were backend by a few limp limbs upon which he walked. The ceiling was the only thing he could clearly or even remotely watch. And he’d been crippled ever since:

‘Wake up, oh stranger one, whose dreams are never-met, awakened every day by a fallen branch.’

A branch off a tree kept falling endlessly from one access of the ceiling to the downward pointed hard reflection. It was chiseled, and looked like marble ice, glass. They could see one another, wherever they looked, and it was hard and hardened was the stare that looked back since it belonged to no one else, but the reflections:

‘He’s not to be touched just yet.’

‘Are you his masters, then?’

‘We are naught and we shall settle it before we come to life.’

He was absent, mentally. It reflected not only on his overall stance but on the fact that, it, it was there. The paleness of and oddly aged face that's devoid of any soul, whose cheeks are not only lifeless but lacking in age-long tears that might be shed for the grievance of a loss. A placated existence stomped in a dead world, he wagered his own named, gambled away, they called him Sway of all humanity, and they fled from sight, out of this world and any single one, that might be uttered away, as if wished out of air, breathing in despair, he was visited ten days ago, his eyes purple puffing with dirt-smoke rings coming out of them, flopping like gelatin, he saw right through the fiend.

'You've been made a few moments ago, were you not? Born from an existence I could not even hope to lump you with and come about you ever gnawing presence. What present have you, kindly set-beast to look as I, or at least my race, brought onto me that I may rejoice again with something else?'

'A gift that's fidgeted into an unreality that's been tormented ever since; death calls upon the last of men, and you, Fredrick von Gaul, you've been chosen to be a part of those who die alongside us.'

'Who are you then, for I see no man and no wrought in creature, I see naught else past my door, windows or my house. Sometimes I simply wonder whether or not I'm still alive.'

'Gaul, you're tired, are you not? You've been making a world in there, while the real one is dead, and you are not. Not even close to it, as I would wager you could survive through several generations, at the very least, for long enough to have lost yourself into disquiet.'

'I know how to entertain myself; at least, I think I do. And If I even grow bored, I could shatter this mirror alone and claim my life as if it were naught but such calamity.'

But still. I want you to devour me, just so I could simply lain inside of your bowels, as my prison made and therefore, at last, I shall remain.

Hey, see that crack over there, that little dent inside the facet-mirror on the ground?'

'Which one would you be referring to?'

'Exactly that one, not that far off, you see it?'

'I do now that you pointed at it.'

'There's a bomb beneath it. I planted a bomb beneath it, underneath the ladder that's placed beneath it. And it's going to explode now, at any moment, just because I want it. I thought this through.'

I reconsidered, in some way. I no longer want to be trapped, either in this world, or inside your bowels. I am going to blow up this entire house, the ceiling, the floor, you and I and the creatures that are outside.

There's a few quantum bombs in there, that are filled with evil quantum runes, which will immediately spread dark-wrought mathematical equation runes, that will take everything out with them.

You seem to have forgotten something others were not aware of. I am a Quantum magician of evil dimensional deformation; I created the automation of nuclear physics damnation, which in turn shall convert life-atoms to dead ones. Including you, I and the creatures lain outside. There's no escape.'

‘What if I get to that dent first?’

‘But that will only trigger it faster than I could ever will it.’

‘Shall we leave the house in this case, brothers and elevate our spirits, thus?’

‘Nay, not yet, not while there’s one here, just a few paces away from where we stand; no more than a few paces awry.’

He took a second off, to reconsider the following. History had been completely, yet unremarkably ruined in some petulantly irreversible way.

‘Everyone got defeated at the battle of Trafalgar.’

They’ve been consolidating their position. There was no clear point of access any longer, since everything appeared to be in one way or another wildly thrown around. The head of broken table, the invisible object spoke to him just then. ‘My hand and my broken arm, they’ve come to talk to me again. I think I understand where this is going, or at least I’m trying to make myself understand.’ It’s all that he needed, for now at least.

Great Bowels

Beneath which every piece and every part of earth but came, approached beneath what seemed to be no end. Downcast they stood.

Knighted with no armor, knitted with thrusters shoved inside their insides, molding as the growths would spread, and deeper in around what appeared to be eighteen bubonic flutes, all stranded as they sang disease, along the way they followed through and near every village, death followed through obscure. Wretched tool, it was distraught and brought within it twenty wedges, open-deadly in a shower of blood.

‘We have completely annihilated all life in this city alone, what is to follow through and whom might give the next command when time but flows and beat the cue?’

‘I do not know but this alone I can give you to chew on. Hereon, there and just about the jutting place, there’s the wretch of madness and clear thee clear thee the sail where we may go here and there but sickness alone might go and convey.’

‘Where shall we go?’

There was something in every corpse, a mole-like plant, filled with nothing more but an irreplaceable infamy, they hid in it.

‘Words are wretched and have no meaning.’ A flute player said. ‘They are devoid of anything that brings satisfaction or joy, they bring no meaning and must be destroyed, purged by all means.’

Ilklesskri of mighty harm had come alive, when mighty were they when to follow. He had walked plainly and was missed for when suddenly they had appeared. Darker winds were coming after, not to near, out of hearing was he then called inside, as to look forth.

He wore a road or a piece of it he took and claimed as his own, he had stumbled upon such dark creations as would come to the eventuality of falling over, strapped about a darkly put together rose, he opened a single span of cylinders in which he held plenty of things that rose and put themselves just over, darkly-damp they opened their mouths and began falling over.

‘Avert your eyes, avert your eyes, I need to stumble upon myself forgetful as I am but drawn over to such a prized fight.’

A much abhorrent evil anchor, passing after, was it there and what came after? Righteously their kind was struck and would there be another reason, yet to be left out, least of all would it be forgotten, leper of disease.

A pair of much and many less, his hands were large and they became, larger than plain, encompassing his body, they became a flying thing which shot above the area of the dark, well beyond it and well past, it could not, for a single moment wait in line, a wretchedness that could not be defiled appeared just as soon as it could be, they missed one another’s heads and then, both of them, would yell:

‘Pretty is thine scepter, it must come from a good lot, is that correct, or would there be such counter-claim as to forget about it?’

A different world

One of them approached at two am, right before missing the last bus, having already made the necessary preparation for their untimely departure, they were rather, onset upon themselves and what was going around them, since the station looked in a state of general siege, or at the very least, it looked like a siege had happened, went through, gone around the city, took a stop at one of the intersections, entered some of the wildly cherry picked apartments from one of the ‘up-standing’ neighborhoods in the slum, took the dark corners where a few black crackers were put down by one of the good-high fellow coppers, then came around. It always came around since they were by no means as industrious as to prevent such a thing from happening, twenty of the largely follow-through monsoons but having revealed at the very least eighteen take-off roofs where they hid what seemed to be eighteen tons of cocaine, illegal drugs and other paraphernalia that were kept into plastic-rubbery put-together gray-gangrene people, fat transparent Negress bellies being severely, completely looking-puffed up, as if her cunt had become the open-battle at Thermopile, where the wildly-put together, for what seemed to be a good part of their little puffy-puff puff-puff do-do go through Infantry made do, their way, her way, Mullatoes babies on their way-kid kind of thing left her with a lot of pot stashed inside of her and since she couldn’t be properly breathing any longer since her face was already bloated with fuzzy agitated orange-pulp juice that’s been put in her by force, with barriers of antiNegro fatherhood, which were already instilled into them, as a given, even before the boys were born, she had all the time in the world to talk to some of the giant flying helicopter molded-people metal-conveying destroyers that had their nuclear missile-dragon launchers with little pucker-pus cancer-grow inducing pin-needle like tips that were aimed at her, which, upon hitting and making contact with them, her entire Negro race would be exterminated at once. Lights shone on her dark surroundings but there was no mid-rain, her being in pain, belly-belly long the way, denying that she had any part through it, even though there was a black man inside her belly trying to snick out from beneath the pile, like a little mole that decided it was time to come out for air, slowly drawing a long like a carriage-couch couch he stood on, but couldn't move alone, horses couldn't swim either, but he was flabbergasted as well, pulling a gun and loaded revolver out of his pouch before he was met by one of the little men that was alive in her. He tried to recognize him as his father but hid wherever he could, being somewhat incapable of making it through of saying much, since he was yet to learn. The kid was twenty, but he stood in his mom, as well as he could since the conditions made it so this was the natural state they were in.

'Young brother, what' you came here for? Shouldn't you go around and do what a brother does?'

But the child couldn't speak at all, he was deformed, ever so largely that he couldn't help himself but breathe in the atoms which invited from within one of the dark marks of the scouring world, as to enter him, a part of malignant legs that had been already walking through the air as if on a fast-dashing treadmill.

'Creatures of dark are known to be able to phase through objects since there's no possible barrier that's but preventing them from pushing through, rather, it's mightily obvious what's happening when two such forces meet. Since the barrier in question only appears when there's an intelligent being as the brain and the object in question are on unequal levels, it's rather obvious that one cannot force his way through it, rather both objects in question need to be on as a plain of field of play as possible in order for this equal transaction to work or to even possibly begin with, otherwise, it will never-never, never work under any, if one at all were to somehow rig the game as to fake this claim, that is to say, a nigger will always be capable of pushing through objects, walls, and anything else since their minds and intelligence are just about on the same plain level as there is.

But unfortunately many of them do not know that and are rather afraid of putting it to the test, for if they could, they would never be stopped, as they would all but leave their cages and their prison cells. For this reason, whenever a cop even figures that one of them boys shows any consideration as for his apparently dormant ability, he puts him down before he could even fully realize his entire potential.'

And then, one missile was shot and they all died. No more blacks, and the world as put under a spell of malady, of such plain reality as there was, peace and quiet for all mankind of worth.

'Now, brother, we can finally pursue our quest towards the dominion over the stars. There is peace against man, brother in hand with brother, incapable of seeking such means of destruction as there are, and there shall ever be peace as long as there won't be any other kind than ours.

For ours is a realm of purity, intelligence and creativity that may never be dispelled by sub-humanly degenerately inferior races such as that which stand against us. Therefore we had no choice, no other choice but to put them down for their own good, as they would've only driven themselves to self destruction in such ways that would've been deemed irresolute and degenerately malignant as to poison everything they touch. A race of dumb Mullatoes that would but bicker and spit on our legacy and on top of our every achievement we've ever created, even while given a limited time, and even after having acquired such knowledge as to know that other races had a head start in everything yet they achieved nothing in terms of beauty, purity, science, advancement, innovation and quality of life. For that alone, theirs was a sacrifice they couldn't have taken by their own.

And even though I know that the world is fair and just, I also know that my fellows, of the same purity as mine will never understand the sacrifice I've taken today, and instead shall seek to punish, banish and slay me just like other men before me who had been aware of their own sacrifices and their own 'wrong-doings' which had been committed nonetheless for the greater good. As there's nothing beyond it and there's no wail or way for one to be pained through if it means assuring the greater future of his people, since they are indeed objectively superior to every other race, ethnic group or peoples that have ever existed prior, at the same time or might've been conceived if they still lived.

Therefore I choose not to surrender and will take no easy path as I will end myself or put an end to my reign in the only and by the only possible mean I could put to my employ, I shall fight my way through and bear arms against my own men and those whom are alike, as to remind them of the spirit I cherish, the spirit I posses, the spirit that's inside every man of my race for as long as there is, for this guilty my people felt for what their ancestors done had to end before it could bring the complete destruction of our people. With that being said, I lay away my weapons, my armor, my earthly suit and everything I've adorned my kingdom into and I shall but fist a cuff as many of them as possible before I'm taken down.'

Therefore and from that point on that man has been completely immortalized in history as the greatest man of European descent that ever existed. Niggers and other sub-human races were put down, were completely annihilated, ethnically cleansed beyond extinction, as in their already non-existent history was erased, as it was made to seem as if they never existed at all, and from that point on the world, then the planetary system, the galaxy and most of the known universe was complete subjugated by them, as eternal peace was brought, forever and a Galactic Heaven was therefore established.

God then gave everyone blue eyes.

There was no end to the solid pollution coming from the deep-tube machines pumping in the very air-earth that had been levitating ever since the end of the first twenty dead-eon cycles after the breaking of the first seventeen molar-corpses that began breathing themselves into existence out of the insides of the incessantly set-bore through celestially forged noses of the giant Gods coming from the cemetery vortexes of the Absolvum-Igvakhim universe where all of their gotten through, a single speck of forbearing bodies had given life to their inter-put through access that had gotten their large ark carried on the other side of the planet, from the bowels of which a giant mine-like explosions had finally released a sea's worth of unnaturally set extending antennas that facilitated their entry into the world. Theirs was the first forge, which gave birth to the shapes, the cast of every set piece being carried over and made to be, but a reconfiguration of their already existing mechanically shaped organs that had been sacrificed in order for the planet to be subjugated and completely forced underneath their control. And there, in the insides of the space-quadrant Lihghr-Laugh they wasted, open ended from the side as if they were bore through by a single cut, finally absolved of everything they started pushing on, inviting the first wave of the new men, the ones made of dirt, to have stumbled upon the iron atoms in the veins of worth. Fashioned in the same way other subjugated lower species would come to rise. Degenerating with every passing second as they were become the first tools of obtuse defilement in a time when the mind would die.

One of them had come into existence.

Some clay was thrown on top of dirt, and a few cords from the dirt-pollution machines were thrown on top of them. And that's how the first KILLmachine was born, made. That's how it was made.

A few pieces were on top of an off-shot.

What kind of living engine would work for such a living machine? Could one put the top side of a woman's brow in it and see it sunken inside the shredder, see it cut all the way through and wrapped around a never ending motion where she would constantly be put in her place and washed? Nasty-dirty, too implicit; but the KILLmachine but came to life, all too suddenly, it started forming a place for itself. Lain to the side, lain on every side, always in control.

The dark trenches

Some of them had made peace, with one another, drawing ahead, where one could be.

'I shall not break through unless you shatter what's left of the other side and every road and everything that's been set forth before.

Not much can be expected from this point, can it?'

'But what do you mean? I made it just in time to change some of the, some of the, you know.

I've replaced all my fingers with long basins, I'm connected to the pools, I changed. I changed the water, I changed the tab, there's a few more forgeries where that came from, you know? A few other receipts for things you have not bought and had no intention to buy.'

'What do you want for them then?'

'An eye, I want an eye but it must not be a normal eye either, it has to be a special one.'

'Of what kind, you're going to have to be more specific than that.'

'I'm so impatient, I am so impatient, I am so impatient, I cannot control myself. I have no self control, I have absolutely no self control, I cannot control myself.'

'Focus then, what kind of eye.'

‘A giant one that’s there, in the mountain, at a point where the river is split in half, down the middle where anyone could see it, in a while, if only they were to stare.’

‘I reckon you’re intending to show me, correct?’

‘That is correct, something hidden in that eye, something you need to see for yourself in order to believe in.’

They went to it, as if they gathered by the masses, joined by contributors to the bile, in which they threw rocks and proper smocks they refused to sear, as they neared. Too many suits were put on the ground, so many of them, so many, too many to be simply beheld upon.

‘Punch the suits, I want to punch them, if I have to, I will.’

‘Mark, you need to stop, they are already drenched.’

‘In what?’

In canines-like floaters, although those organic compounds were not something to be eerily frocked upon, they bore a certain conjoined similarity to a aquatic floor kind of sweeper that only became apparent once the suits were but fully dressed in foreboding bodies that were grown in kind and spare. Laziness, it was there. It filled their wretched kind and the masses whom had attained the words of mighty prayer from the ground but bowed at the flying suits as if they were women to be worshipped, which only pointed out at their idiosyncrasy, as, who would care to serve a maid? Who would be as dumb-set, as to cry to a matriarchy, Wreckage be its name?

But they were dripping, like the time of the month.

I do not know the meaning of their flight, this flock was not godly but heathenistic in some wild manner, and of some while, it spoke of mighty lost days.

They were but incapable of walking for long, always on the wrong side, always trying to move along, seeing the bloated thing in front of them, look at it, they spoke, yelling and shouting until they could not. And wretched and wretched and wretched little limbs, they existed in the air. One last thing follow-through, they always bent, and always dead.

Twenty and twenty more, they followed through and flintily, little locks were only trying themselves to eat along. They followed through, little dark men. They tried eating themselves like canine-dead men with little more than dead-behind, with heads broken apart. A few more than a few hundred miles-a stretch, he only appeared after.

‘Greeting, I think we’ve met before.’

‘Who are you?’

‘I am the dead-man filled of scales, I am the one bearing the armor after that, bearing the cold-blood inside the bent-snow. Unlike them, I see. There’s one little boil we live in.’

‘Who does?’

‘Me and the others.’

‘Who are you supposed to be in that case?’

‘The wretch that comes after, that’s whom. The wretch, the wretch that’s bearing skin, I am made to believe that at the very least there are eighty men in my band.’

He pointed at one of the hills just as soon as he could, incapable of doing anything, nothing even just as close, every time a simple man rose, they were swollen, it wouldn’t make a difference.

The two thumb dilemma

‘I’ve been thinking for a while; for almost as long as I’ve been staring at my one raised in front of my eyes hand, which was placed in such a way as to look as if my thumb was overlapping the rest of my fingers. As soon as my focus readjusted as to not stare at anything in particular, I started seeing two thumbs in front of my eyes; an illusion caused by an attempt made by both eyes to put it into focus. This got me thinking, which is the real placement of the thumb in relation to everything else? Where is the thumb placed in actuality, as well as the rest of the hand?

Where is the true location in which the thumb is placed in? If that is the case with the eye, what else is misplaced? The lofty floor, the rest of my body, the window, the universe, all could be laid in a different space. Perhaps the real placement is somewhere in-between.

Everything can be forgiven, but not this.’

He kept looking at the pencil, for hours at times.

‘Some failures are meant pursuing, but this? This will only turn you viler and what if it isn’t for a short while? It’s been over a year, time isn’t on your side.

You turned away from us and now, all is silent.’

Many of the great stones seem to lay abandoned, past the great shore, where lay. Within the reaches of an outstretch as well as it could be conveyed, eighteen hundred fifty files of left behind crested-molars. All of them but nastily spending, with every second, a single organism faded, even as it seemed, of nasty mile, there were a few of them that appeared here and there, and put upon the hour, they but stood there, incapably set, prone to forget, and always watching. Little more than harps of steel, shaped out of bodies, all but ill.

There was a park, and there was a hand.

As in the same way a refraction works when the two of them are overlapped, or in the process of overlapping, both of them are uncannily set to borrow from one another shapes that are never to be put back together or make any sense whatsoever, that is to say, children were running around tunnels, moving as cars came out of them and out their heads, the buildings and part of the city and the sky, all of which were but put inside a single hand, or seemed to be inside of it by the looks alone, he was staring in it as if it were but a portal to a completely struck down, forced inside such a limited plane dimensional rip, regardless of which, the children had become ever more and more so finger-like, more robust, almost concave-like cylinders being set inside. The weather worsened and he could see that a part of the sky was become it as well, the old man Gull Rocco but put one in the wrong spot, stalkerish as he were, he dragged it through as one would drag but the top of a prunish thing that fell in.

One of the buildings was open.

Connaway and Plume; standing in bison-monsoon.

Even though there was no point in looking one would know. If two thumbs could exist in one hand, why would memories be in the same place?

Connaway:

‘I don’t think I understand what’s going on here; we’ve been talking for the past twenty hours, yet you’ve yet to say a word.

I feel like I’ve been talking to myself and no one else.’

‘Long before, I’ve stopped.’

They were hardly speaking, they were hardly doing anything.

It had to go again.

Twenty years prior.

Plume, Connaway and Gull Rocco:

There’s a nail between the two thumbs, but neither one is bleeding. It’s hard to tell but one can see the tiny gaps and three and four nails prodding out of it.

‘Who would deny then the will of a God who stays with his children all the way through their lives and give upon them as none other would lend, and claim whatever else; roaches get stamped and extracted from the bowels of the great-god machine-rub.’

Of which form could only be seen on the inside of an infinity of gelatin through which but a large ship formed of billions of put together scalpels would cut and put themselves about the hour, to be made and have been brought to such unstoppable reigns as to have been cast in a never ending wail.

The most important of the two men stood forth, facing one another; it merely served as a reminder.

‘Those who are incapable of creating beauty have no place in this world. You feel jealousy over it for a reason, you must’ve realized that by now. You lack something that is simply not there, you never did an honest work’s day in your entire life. You’ve never been humble, you’ve never truly suffered, never took a fall, never truly understood what’s it like to be a man, an adult or grow at all.

We're not going to make it then, that much is clear; I.

I don't know whether or not there's anything else to say. There's nothing else to say, only time will tell whether or not you can. Until then, every other conversation is useless.'

'It's not fair I was born wrong. There's no sub-human kike in my family. There's no trash, no low-life, no, it's not fair that I have to be cursed because of them. I'm incapable of creating beauty because of them, I'm incapable of functioning, of feeling empathy for people, of being normal, all because I inherited their genetic traits, their lies, their self-pity, their impulses, their evil. I don't want to hide, I don't want to lie, I don't want to be self-hating, I just want to be normal. I just want to work as hard as everyone else. I don't know how to help people and I'm always confused. At the end of the day, whatever I do will only help them, it will only benefit them.

It's a game I cannot win, I'm not smart enough to do it; I don't have enough of a wit to outsmart anyone.

My ancestors killed the God I believe in, promote miscegenation with inferior sub-human races, they destroy everything in their path, they never admit fault. But when have I?

I'm in no measure to talk or do anything at all.'

'Awful people don't deserve to succeed in life, fellow. And if they do, they ought to be shunned, forgotten and reminded what they are. I don't know.

You sometimes feel that way, other times you don't. But I don't know which one is the real you. I don't know which one is the real I. I don't know, I simply don't know. Perhaps you should act like you race, that's what you are at the end of the day. You can't escape your racial trails, no one can. It's what man is, of course not all men are equal. Victory at all costs isn't worth it, not like this, it only brings shame and guilt and it make no man out of man. It's an empty thing; perhaps you are getting what you deserve in some way, you deserve yourself because that's what you made yourself out of yourself, if that makes any sense at all. A man giving up to his impulses is no better than a dumb animal, he isn't. At the end of the day, your race makes you an irredeemable criminal, regardless of what you're going to try achieving, by whatever means there are. It's just how life is. Men are capable of somehow going beyond it, but not every man of every race is capable of doing it, unfortunately. One can't be delusional to his own shortcomings nor should he feel any envy towards others, it's just something that is, it is what it is; I'm sorry. But we all live up to the best of our abilities, although that is not always the case. You can't destroy everything out of envy, or act childish as to think you could solve anyone else's problems since you cannot even solve those that are yours.

By some dumb luck, as there is, who knows? By some force that's somewhat greater than yours, who knows? But one thing is certain, if anything, that if you are to make anything, anything at all, you need the aid of something that's beyond you, something that cannot be poisoned by your mind, or hands. That is the only way you may be able to hope you could achieve something beyond you and nothing more and nothing else, even though that may not be you by the time you will have been done working on it. And that is the only way you may get to know God, that is. Or the closest thing to it.'

'It occurred to me that coffee allows me to finally function as a human being, yet it needs to be interrupted from time to time in order for it to become effective again, otherwise, I cannot function. Yet at its strongest, I keep thinking about the most unnecessary things there are. What a mess it is, for it cannot be conceived either. It is something I shall have to plan for in order to achieve my dark mission of destruction, evil, and degeneracy. I think.'

'What about the two thumbs?'

'The two thumbs have become two index fingers. An even more dangerous thing than everything that exists in this world; it is clear enough that everything is being moved as to accommodate for two particular if not three dimensions. First two being the ones that are presented which in no way can be assured whether or not either one of them is the true one, while the other must be the true one, which in no way might I be able to see or truly know.

Think about it, I close one eye and the thumb is in one direction.

I close the other and the same follows through. I do not understand but at the same time I cannot complain either, it's just a matter of relentlessness I may not be capable of following through with.'

'I don't really care as much about kike ancestors as much, or about not being capable of making beauty. I wish I didn't fuck up with my friends, playing with them is the last good memory I have. I didn't even care about art, about writing, about women, about school, about anything else. I don't care about anything else but that. Living as a horrible person I can, but what stings the most is not pity, but having lost the only good thing I had; there's nothing else now. There's no dilemma, there's nothing in its place.

'I miss doing things for them. I miss feeling useful to someone. I wish I didn't complain about being used. No one can fill their place anymore.'

I should go torture some kids to make myself feel better or something.

Yet there was something wrong about the dogs as well.

Neither of them seemed to have thumbs.

'All of them are missing, but I don't understand.'

There's no explanation to what's happening, yet I see clearly in front of my very eyes, every single time I look at it, every single time I stare at it, two thumbs.

'I do not know for how long I've been staring at my thumbs, or why. It's unexplainable; it's not the thumb itself I'm staring at. But the.'

Eight overlapped floating boards inside his head, whereas the equations are overlapped on top of another, strung by a line pushing through all of them at once, as if it were a spear.

Everything made sense after a while. Every man in this town has a pair of thumbs grown inside their heads. Crowned were the kings of thine kingdom, and Emperor is the Wrong-doer, a must. A just reminder for all walking ahead from the dead point, uncannily, stretching in a lustful lush.

'I am blinded by my own mistake. I have dropped a hanger in my face; it bounced around my eyes, I see, only thumbs are growing inside of me.'

'I wish I wasn't born a nigger; it's just how I am. Can't help being on welfare, can't help trying to grab what I can and steal from the white man.

They call me Uncle Tom.

I can't actually make out the color purple but I know where Massa is. There are twenty branches in the cotton farm. I stole what I can and now I'm gone.

I only know as much as my mind can go; being a nigger and all. Sometimes I walk around with a gang, I do.'

We enter homes and we steal whatever we can and no can do. I sees something I like, I takes it, that's what being a nigger is what it is like. They call me a nigger, it's what I act like. I am a monkey, they say, I have do dance for master, I dance for master and I bide my time. When the time comes, I take a knife, I take a gun, I shoot him the back. I rape his wife, I leave.

'We're a gang of fucking nigger, we rape what we can. There's nothing we wouldn't take in this world, you may call us dumb, you may try making us behave, but you should know better than to trust a dumb nigger, not that I would call myself one.

I was born somewhere else, farther away. I used to have a few kind friends, I used to trust the white man. But I knew better than to count my blessings then.'

There was a burglary a few feet away from the street. It was someone Jacque Niggerlock Jail knew. Some weirdly face mulattoe with a bucktooth he got from being pounded and made to wait in line.

I act like a nigger most of the time, being on welfare and all. Being incapable of working, stealing from the state, I have no shame, I don't have to study, I don't have to be smart, it's not expected of me and I won't bother without being given a free hand in all this. I'm blamed for my brother's crime, I is.

'Put your hands behind your back, now!

I don't want to hear anything from your, get on the ground boy, or I'm going to put you down! I said, now boy!'

The nigger was just as soon put to waste, the kike was there, trying to intervene, but he was put down as well.

'Both of you boys, get down, get the fuck on the ground before I put a buck in both of you now!'

Both of them didn't know any better, fucking niggers of two kinds. They were dragged along and they were but checked, all around.

'Lieutenant, I'm afraid they're armed, knives, guns, and ice pricks and many other things used to kill and thumbs.'

Too many thumbs on either one of them.

‘I want to fucking kill all nigger, I want to kill all fucking kikes, the Holocaust didn’t happen, neither did Slavery. And both of them boys know it, I say we cover up the losses.’

So it was settled, they took an axe, put them both in two vans. In one of the vans, they split the Kike in half, there were thumbs sprouting out of the body instead of blood, two at a time.

They drove the other van on a cotton field and made the nigger work. But every puff of cotton was but shaped as a thumb. They put the nigger down just as soon and they were gone.

‘What is going on in this city?’

What could it be called if not the Two Thumb city? Two Thumb, for none.

‘I think it’s clear what’s going on here. Both them kikes and them niggers are trying to destroy our fine city. Both of them seem to be splits of the same cloth, spit for spit, tat for tat, both of them ought to be put down, you hear boy?’

‘I hears, I hears, when does death come near for either of them?’

‘That will have to wait for now, I think, I think there’s something else we haven’t account for, and that is.’

For either one to; there is a nigger and a kike in every man. And it is man’s responsibility to recognize those traits and put them down before they infest the man and turns him into scum.

It is clear enough that every man ought to strike not to act like a kike, not to fill his heart with greed. He must not act like a nigger, to kill and steal. His heart could be infected with either one trait, he could be lead to them and make friends with those that would make them stray away, to the path of damnation.

‘There’s only one way we could purge this city, one way only. We must ethnically cleanse it of all the niggers, of all the kikes that surround themselves with us, infesting us with their filthy, primitive, incapability of self control, destruction, traits and trends of sociopathy and their criminal beliefs.’

‘I am a nigger and I understand. I know that I have genes that make me more likely to become a serial stabber, a shooter, a criminal, a fugitive with no remorse.

I’m afraid, Massa, I’m afraid I left my son. There’s not one there to raise my little boy now, but I can’t turn back from what I’ve done. I want to be punished, Massa, I want to be in touch with the lord.’

The nigger is dumb, but the Massa is strong. So said the Gospel; they gathered the rats, they gathered the monkeys, all wrapped around a circle, and they burnt them down, raining fire and sprays of bullets.

‘I thought that surrounding myself with people who are better than I am would change me. But that didn’t do a thing.

I’m still a nigger and I’m still going to be a nigger by the time they leave. Nothing can change me, nothing at all. Countless times I’ve tried getting a job, but they just say I’m lazy, they drive me away. They told me, they don’t want to rehire me anymore, despite me showing up at the work place, they said they won't hire you, search for another place, will you? Now I don't know for how long you've worked there, but, you were lazy during your work.

Too many breaks taken, and you tried yourself too soon, I'm sorry but we'll have to let you go early. But I couldn't explain to them, it's just that I can't keep up, you know? It's not my fault I was made that way. There's not that much work to do in Africa, I think. They don't tell you that you're lazy if you're part of the tribe, I think. I've never been there but I know.

I don't like being a nigger but I can't change who I am.'

He kept telling himself then. Always an excuse for everything, down the way and then around the streets, selling drugs, selling feet.

'Here, cracker, I hope you enjoy this. Yeah, hope you destroy your life now White Devil, yeah, I'm glad you are.'

I don't like it, I don't like it one bit. Selling my friend out; but he's the devil they say.

'We got the bible, they got our land.' The Nigger of Turkey said.

'Is that fair, brothers? Is that fair? '

'No, it is not, no, it is not!'

There was only one white man present, and no one else. Not even the negroes would take time off for one of their own. It is sad, but it is how it must be.

'The nigger is within us all. Banish the nigger, I say, banish the nigger.'

'I banish you nigger, from my land, from my soul!'

'And in return, we get our plains back.'

But there was never a doubt that it would be destroyed if left in their hands alone.

'Here's one pop for you kid!'

Worst of all, worst time of day. Selling it to one of your little brothers, it's what I hate the most. I have no sympathy for the White Devil, but I sell it to a brother nonetheless. I treat them the same, I treat them the same.

There was a great hall, it said much about me, it said much more about me.

I was in a great hall, filled with white men, I was the only nigger. A strange figure came towards me, he approached, now and raised, two thumbs and two thumbs alone.

'I want you to look at these thumbs, boy.

One of them is coated in a goon thick shell of black, a Niggarous black, of the worst kind. The other thumb is white.

Which one do you trust the most?’

Instinctively he chose the white one. I chose the white one. Always the white one; it’s just how life is, the safer choice, the better choice, the superior choice, the one that you know it won’t let you down, the one that dragged me from the hovel I lived in and brought me to life. How could I choose any other? Why would I choose any other? There’s only white, there’s only white.

‘I think I am losing my mind. It happens when I lose sleep.

It is as if, I am a great dark spirit, a nightmare that can inherit and manipulate whatever body there is. I am great, I am many, I know the likes of man. I can inherit whatever will I so choose with enough time, I am become whatever I desire most and well.’

Would happen to lose, would happen to forget, would happen to slip in and out, to and to be condoned for my choice.

‘I was given a better thing yet.

I was lucky enough to make a good friend. To somehow slip past the kikes and the whites; it was hard but some things you just got, even by some dumb luck.

Most people don’t really know who I was, what I did to get here, they only see a brother who made it, nothing else. I don’t feel much guilt anymore, I did what I had to and I would do it again.’

And, it still stung. Not getting in time, had, I had made a promise that if I made it, I would pay my debt and help my young brother stay from trouble. That I would, pay for my mistakes before it was too late. The young boy I sold drugs to, he’s dead. Shot by a rival member of a gang, put down like an animal, I never looked back.

I should go lynch myself to make myself feel better or something.

They were seeing something about it, from every possible angle, that didn’t make a lot of sense, by all means, it was something that was nigh indistinguishable from every standing carpet-man that stood around.

‘Carry on!’

Yelled an utmost, firmest concocted voice: Entry seventeen and sixteen were open, most of the operated on houses were rather concave and easily slipped through the suppository shaped base, as it retracted and reeled back into place again, going as far as to step through some uterus gaunt before being eaten. Rolex, they had Rolexes around their wrists.

‘Who?’

‘The people, they all have Rolex, limit edition, Rolex, good, golden, silver, finely crafted, good old Rolexes.’

‘What shall we do?’

‘We should go eat from that fast-food place, shouldn’t we?’

Both creatures were mouths, in the sky, but the sky was water, its ripples were dents in ice. And icebergs were made of skin, they were floating. And they had ropes coming out of them, which lynched, blades, only blades, livid blades that pulsated and oozed with darkness-boils. Worming falling over one another melting, in the military grab suits, men were dressed, walking backwardly, their faces were on their guns, but not the skulls, those had been clearly removed and pricked with three-holes, like bowling.

‘We shall begin beating the dead horse now.’

‘I don’t know. You know, there’s just, it feels like, I’m reaching a wall I can’t really get past, you know?’

‘I understand perfectly.’

On the table.

The two thumbs were there in the air, they were seeing the reality for themselves, for the first time, for what it truly was, every single one of them deformed, the men that being that appeared to have no thumbs. Every single human being lacked a thumb, for some reason. Why is it that every time a man stares at his hand he sees two thumbs? What is the reason for it? Why does this happen?

They were tombs of their own, skin-tombs in which thumb-deformed figures were lain inside of, figures that looked like clay-interpretations that were only sculpted and worked on with the help of thumbs and thumbs only.

A man walked around the streets one day, barely questioning what was going on around him. He was alone, he looked around, checking whether or not someone was actually looking, staring, trying to call him out for what he was about to say. Arguing with himself whether or not he was daring enough to go through with it.

‘I am going to rape, beat and kill Sara and Amy Silver. I am going to split their cunts open with a cake-slicers, performing a live abortion despite them not being pregnant, going on ahead at to remove their split-open glands and further ends, then play with their entrails, dumb fucking unfunny kikes they are.

Filthy dumb fucking fat, sag-titted ugly inbred-semitic dumb-fucking Armenid looking retarded mongrels, I can’t wait to meet them in person so I could get a hold of their children and splatter their disgusting inbred looking faces off the ground, piss in the bile-melted entrails, swim in them and make a pond afterwards.’

No one was listening, despite the streets being somewhat inhabited by some on-going passers. The man decided to push it.

‘I’m going to get them drunk before, just so I could rape them first, in the most degenerate-degrading manner, as a matter of fact, I’m going to go ahead and do something not even a gang of fucking filthy dumb gang of niggers would do, that being, I’m going to make the holes I’m going to shove my cock into while pretending they’re on their periods.

For that to fully work, I'm going to purchase some OB's and put them in, and cotton, because niggers are dumb and they like picking it.'

That should do it, he thought, it was as much as he could wrap his hands on. He truly found himself enjoying this kind of action, despite those things being, or rather, rubbing people the wrong way.

He was accompanied by another man by the name of Farf Ghoul, whom was pale and ugly and disturbing looking, like an inbred cartel. He had a cartel-back made out of several brown-skinned native growth-humanoids sprouting out of his middle of the back torso-thick protrusion, which did the walking for him.

'What a beautiful day this is, isn't it?'

'I think it is, Farf, I think it is, but what have you done as of lately?'

'I fucked.'

'That's good to hear, but my, you've become rather prudish haven't you? Obnoxiously so, well, haven't you heard it yet?'

'Heard what?'

'Becoming prudish is the first step towards damning your soul, good friend and by the sounds of it, you've already infected me as well. It's a disease, you see? An encouragement, it's how it works, and how you normalize it.

You crack a joke and a fluke every now and then, and before you know it, you spread blatant homosexuality among people.'

'Oh, but I did not know, but how may I fix that, then?'

'That's mightily simple, in any case, you simply have to take a rod, a grainy think with spiky bumps and bash a homo in the head and on his back. Make sure they're but penalized for acting that insufferable way.

I'm just trying to look out for you, my good friend. I'm just looking to make sure you won't be infested by that disease of the mind, you know?

The only way you can make sure the homo, this disease doesn't spread, is by bashing it to death. There's no other alternative, as it would turn your child into a little sissy, it would. You need to kill the disease and drive it to attrition, you should.'

'But wouldn't that be the work of a vigilante in that case? It couldn't be legal after all.'

'Legal in the eyes of man, but not of your lord, is it now?'

They need to get killed, they need to get bashed, and put into an early grave, driven into solace, in a crypt below the bowels of the earth where one might find himself laughing at their faggotry and how they ended, right about.'

They met during the night and held a raft filled with a bunch of trannies they had kidnapped from a nearby set asylum. Meekly dressed and much more to depress, they were mightily proud of their pedophilic traits and how they acted, in which way and how they went about it, what to say.

‘I think, you know.’

Taken from the asylum, directly spoken by a man who saw himself as a woman:

‘There’s no man in this world that’s in love with another man but hasn’t molested a child. All men whom are into men had also done whatever they can to sleep with as many, as to molest them indiscriminably so. You see now, it’s the mental illness that’s but pushing us to do it, this blatant homosexuality, this illness of the mind but makes us touch children in the worst possible kinds.’

To this, Ghoul thought, he considered right about.

How much I would like to take a chisel and a hammer, how much would I enjoy but staking his genitals as soon after, how much would I like him bled to death and work it in such way as not even my lord has yet intended me to do so. It was a mere fact that some acts required blasphemous methods be put to one’s employ, only to prove a point.

The Ghoul was but trying to form a small barricade he could lay in for the time. For what was worth, it was never a good time to take a break. He was stuck in this thing, it was hard to explain, but his body took the shape –two trunks.

And split two heads appeared to bear four contorted arms, all bearing hammers and nails, all pointing in one direction. The sky was red, with bubble-patterns that had tambourine-formed extending triangle-spikes. All of them but crawling around one another, bubbling little chopped limb images and numbers, even strange speeches that would come and go, organic almost atmospheric replays that were fast-forwarded and broadcasts of torn apart, corrupted as in VHS, shows.

But the Ghoul only kept his hairy winged on both sides, desperately trying to keep what he wore and what he had in mind, battering the side of the pane, trying to put the sign slightly to the left, then to the right, moving it until it had been far away and hard of notice.

Struck in a wheel, tendons-dry, everything appeared to be bent in some place as if either melting or some toenail left its mark after kicking against the lamp posts and the strange things that fell, the windows shut and everything else that wasn’t mention by all to means.

By no explanation, no reason behind it either, for no apparent sense, a man came out of the building near which Ghoul was crafting his sign. His head, all of the sudden exploded, painting the side of the stairs, the fence, the beautifully blossomed garden, a group of passing foreigners, that, upon seeing this happened, they merely puffed out of their cigars, then simply crossed the street, as if they were already used to this kind of thing going on around them.

‘Damn foreigners, I loathe your presence here. I ought to build something that will put you down.’

Without realizing that in his confusion, he was already, almost automatically so, stuck in the process of building something he had no idea yet he was. It snickered at him like a dog, the wood being of some low quality rubbery briar-lobe, with nothing in it and nothing as well. As he could wait for diamonds were appearing – looping one very much worn out shells that were the hearts beating on the outer walls, and on the building panes, lowering themselves every now and then with every second being a blessing for every mountain-backed rib-cage that appeared to crawl out of the air-shafts. Some of them dancing in the sky, they mocked him as well, a thing that Ghoul would not stand.

‘First the foreigners, and now this, will this be something I’ll have to deal with?’

But he didn’t take a chance to start again, he was clearly not of a mind to do something rash that would make him so refrain from acting, of whatever lesser thing, whether he was blind or not, or less so after. He took a single ice-pick out. From where if not his open cavity- the chest, where he hid but the strangest of weapons, sticks he pulled out of a tree and rocks instead, he played with them. A little bird was there as well, a dead little bird that wasn’t making its fallacious, annoying, most disturbing of noise, as he was but a strong-torn fellow, not of mind, as he’d take no abuse whatsoever from the little speck of many beaks, hence he stopped pounding and listened, wherever he could.

There were no fingers attached to either one of his palms, they were missing for some reason, nowhere to be found. Drops his hammer but never asks how it happened.

Past the billboard-sign, there was a boy. He thought to himself, with lesser joy:

‘I grew up in an Urn, in a vase.’

His body grew wrong as did his face.

Limbs backward, sprouting from on top his head. Crawling around, a nigger was on the ground, shot-dead.

‘What happened here?’

An officer approached him immediately. It was a cover up, the nigger was niggering around and he killed and raped a cat. He threatened to do the same to a woman before he was taken, his wound still gaping, put down. Nigger is down, the nigger is down, the nigger has down, is what the officer wrote on his report. It all made sense, with all these primates.

The Urn-boy, Jograb couldn’t believe his ears any longer. Drawing back to a safe place, he yielded no return but spent his time inside of it, clearing his mind, not to be blinded by what happened behind.

There was a problem now, no thumb could deal.

While he smashed through one of the doors he saw him.

A strange man closely staring static, with an empty beer cup held in his left hand, both eyes wide-open, him wide-awake. An eye saw through it, the other saw the screen. But if there was anything, the man saw through both of them and didn’t know the means. Why could he see through the cup and the static at the same time? Why was there a thumb in his face and why did it happen for a creature inside a base to have broken through his house?

IT was there, that the domed entry through the roof revealed.

Elevated mood of lesser appeal; part of the fallen through caved-in. A giant mole-machine with a giant spinning cone was ill and moody, its teeth were dry, it drew back and revealed, a hole to the underground-sky. Slowly, the Urn-boy descended into flight. Its limbs were completely stretched to their fully fledged extending arm-span.

There was an interior inside each level, many of them stranded in the air with stairs.

Before too long only an arm with a brain-shaped form, the body of the man with a cup flew on, molded to the single hand it bore through.

‘Where are you going to?’

‘I’ve been summoned to attend the cutting of the first corded ends of the warfare of Cars.’

The Cars were present there, but were filled with unnaturally dark-bloated pus that appeared to be the pop of a boom. With fire-blow being hair, and soon. They danced in skies of purple masses, floating rings of dirt in which the wretched humanoid shaped Urns and watches were but clicking in the worst impersonations they could come up with and draw. There was a time to waste and one to try. One to fend off the time as it passed off.

‘One of our own, one of our own has returned.’

It seemed like only two thumbs survived inside his cup-molded hand, it could only put itself through and rummage through the cut-through end. It didn’t work that way for long, nor could it work until the first man had arrived.

‘Will you join us at a dinner table? Only the essence of fuel shall attend. We’ve carefully locked them down and chained them. Inside each jar there’s but a fuller end.

Rains take the longest, don’t they?’

It was a heavy duty they had to attend, the funeral being split-open around the table. Part fuel floating in gas, part the liquid mass, and the missing bodies, which went without saying, weren’t there at all, not even, for the time being, clearly for some reason, standing.

But they were there, also. Missing and standing at the same time. As if their spectral leftovers, the marks and prints they left behind as their passing was truly left to, was somewhat, needless to say, conveyed by some romboscout little trailed cords and semi-transparent brains seen inside the invisible casts of mightily see-through bodies that weren’t supposed to be there at all. It was for that reason that they started messing with them, out in the open. Each coffin placed inside the street. Another point on the billboard said as much:

‘We’ll cut their body-supply and when it happens there won’t be any chance for either one to breathe.’

It was a very well known fact that rotten-corpses rotted-crops, were deep-implanted, after dark, beneath the soil where rotten-praying, the attendees were busy, least of all, making sure that many of the corpses would walk up-heaved, or least, the saying, would’ve said so. It was a given that they would only act, as far as they were concerned with what was happening out there, or would serve as a mere reactionary tool for both the on-lookers and the ones that were deeply staring at the twice seen, like thumbs within the eye-sight corpses. Either way, an on-passer would see it. A corpse left behind, one in the floor and another one being projected no more, than needed, from where it stood.

Manifesting itself before the world had a chance to shake again and when the time came, it shook.

‘Clearly we have a problem here!’

Bolder Foreigner feigned a reprise, it was just not something he could have himself deal with, not there, and not by chance, he would have none of it, just then but now, it was the time to spare. Whoever was watching him would’ve said as much.

‘I agree, there’s a few pillows I’ve seen there, a few more than some. But allow me to continue, someone filled them with bitter blameful scum.’

‘How can you tell?’

‘I’ve seen some of it happen before, and I’ve seen it again happening here. Clearly, this is a plot, a ploy. Observable behavior, if I may add, the world is being turned upside down, being fornicated by the ruse, being made to suffer here and there as more obtuse of men come into view.

We could never had stood them, let we would’ve seen them suffer, to know what comes after. Hence we had to put them down.’

‘Who did you put down now, good man? You do not strike me as the type that would’ve ruined yourself or lives as many as I would’ve seen so, much to you, then, what is the reason behind it?’

‘Simple, it’s as simple as one might face to ask, there’s been something on-going, a long time ago there, in wretched day and strange a stance. I, Pelafyier, have noticed the sparks, smelt and faced the scent, as I’ve seen it as such.

Know that I am not a normal man and I can see the molecules and feel the pheromones as they approach from the distance and bring forth what’s left of them during the time they draw forth from the hidden holes inside the earth they’re hidden in. But alas, I’m revealing myself to be a bastardly person without even, relentlessly revealing who I am.

I am one of the officers of tendons who had been responsible for what had been going out there, I had been placed in charge for the complete eradication and destruction of this strange phenomenon ever since I discovered, being the first one to look at it, as it came into my view, into my focus, what this strange shard-distancing had been.

Before I knew it, I could see the people who were breathing improperly, whom were but nauseatingly drawing and pushing out their breaths. I knew what they were, I knew they were improperly made, like mad turbulent machines that seem to infect everything that comes into contact with them. I knew this for a fact even before I was made aware that it was happening all around the country.

And for that reason, once I have lain my theory to the common man, once I have attained enough of a following, as to be granted the likeness of an almost cultish kind of following, I convinced all of them to follow me in my quest to slay and kill and slaughter as many of the pheromone deformed thumb-shaped molecule hollows they pushed out with each breath.'

'So you started, incited and drove the likes of good men, as to join a riot and kill as many peaceful people you alone chose and dictated as to be infected? What kind of judge were you then? Was there even an objective way of knowing whether or not you were right? What of the people who were innocent but were killed by you when it happened?'

'Alas, there was no innocent man, and no, there was no way of truly knowing whether or not I was truly right about each and every case, but that is, if anything, highly unnecessary to know. It just goes to show how easily I can manipulate people into doing what I want, to start and drive peasants to kill, while painting these monsters in the colors I choose, driving them out like the driveling snot-ridden creatures they are. There is certainly nothing unlike this feeling, that is, driven through my head and out.

It is highly organic, beyond any kind of measure that can be quantified. It is a satisfaction I never thought the likes of man could attain. Power beyond belief, beyond reason, and the most important part is that they're playing into my exact reasonless desire to slaughter and see the likes of people driven into the ground. For that reason I condemn them for being as vile yet as righteous as to believe everything I tell them. As gullible as they sound, I would not trade it for a thing, I would not see any other reason for it.'

In which case, he came up with a plan.

The two foreigners looked at everything around them, building in building, all too wrong. All too well for him, since it mean he could teach people and drive them to destroy, by whatever means put to his employ as well.

'Gather around, you ill-minded mentally-slowed down troglodytes, as there's but one voice that's to be heard, for starters, you are to listen and do as I say.'

Many men started drawing forth from the confines of the red-puddle.

Many of the reddened-black patterns in the sky but projecting themselves in the body of the strange creatures that came after. Many wore their thumb and thumb place next to one another kind of skin, outwardly heaved, a preciously thick malignant dark-chitin from the looks of it. Always drawing like a knife, bleeding on the precious ground, where the teeth were being dropped in blue-teal, eely looking glowing puddles.

'As I was saying, now, although I know it may as well fall upon dead-ears, since you are not exactly the same creatures I've seen before.

Long ago, when I've stumbled in this country, as a poor hick would know much so. I've had a dream of a better world, one that would be brought to ruin, just so everything that's being rebuilt would be made, as to show, there's nothing here nor there that will ever satisfy you. Nothing that would ever, by all means serve to make something off your world; I give you, as such, only a single, simple way out of, trouble, out this chaos, as long as you agree with me. As long as you start listening and least of all were to, do as you please.

After listening to what I have to say.'

Grinned as he were, Pleigh but stood behind him, most of, such, malignant manner. Standing on a broken crate; from the other side of the street where the other man was still but punching nails on his board. He wasn't interested in hearing any more than needed, to each and whither for whatever case. It went as such:

'Dear man, will you not join me in this glory I seek? To, and, as such, as much as to redeem your fellow man from this broken system and everything that's been going wrong in here?'

'Nay? You must think me dumb.'

'On the contrary, I think you're mightily resilient, but perhaps too resilient for your own good and for my tastes to be allowed to continue unwatched and unattended. I'm giving you, therefore a chance, that you may find a chance to do something others are not willing to do now.'

'Join you, I suppose? And am I to be given a crown and a seat atop your mountainous rubble after you're done driving this chaos into the ground? Am I to push everything, your armies and what not for as long as it, suffice to say, and pleasures you to go around?'

Did it as he may, he decided that, at the very least, there was some time, where he was willing to make the first cuts, whatever that meant, it was no mere sacrifice either.

Looking around the place, especially at the crowd, it was evident that he was there, with the only reason for his appearance being the fact that he wanted to interrupt this incessant thing that dragged the squabble, for too long.

'I am the Thumb-Cilyst.'

Mighty tall but dark cysts around a humanoid molded as of rivers of blood-clot and tampon shapes of longer-beaked rots coming out, many of which ever bore the eye sockets, no eyes. For they had been thumbbed-in with cracks in place, flowing out; perfectly shaped, indistinguishable human hearts started flying in searching for the men, out of which chests they came out of. Bearing one eye each and a few elongated flaccid thumbs of the same fleshy thing, although most of them looked like hardened precious jewels made of stone.

'There's a part of the dilemma that you've all refused to acknowledge, which angers god, among all.'

Both sockets were but pierced, thumbs bloodied, and you're caught within its rightful stare. You forget who the lord here is and who obeys. For that reason, I bear not even the slightest hint of such compassion as would be. You, of all should see for yourselves what you've come to flee from.'

'What have we been driven away from?'

'A thumb-formation for each star, a protuberance of niggardly-killdom, your lust for blood might not be wiped off, at least not as easily as you'd like to. Not to make a fuss as to forget that you're still to obey. But it's taken me, for the largest part, as much as I find myself looking at thee, a long time to figure out how you're supposed to work. You of all men are broken, cracked, fossils, but refuse to accept your place in this new world that is to follow.'

'Make us understand if that's the case, we can learn from you.'

A member from the crowd retorted. But even he, deformed, could not see.

This Cllyst feared, as much as for himself as the ones he held dear for some reason, who looked over him and over their back in a world only he could see.

Simian Ghyiallapag, watcher of all niggers could only draw as much, as to breathe himself whenever there was a dark beast out there, let loose. It was a dangerous creature he could not stray as far as he could or as far away from, regardless of how hard he shook. Dangerous in appearance and not only that but in thought as well, there was, certainly no elation and nothing too dark as to corrupt everything it touched instead.

A river of blood meant nothing, but a river of simian, in which the Niggarous forms and shapes started pushing out while spreading? Dark disease not even the likes of the Emperor of Subhumanity could even comprehend, who was put in charge of all creatures that came after, of what could be called 'man'. But this was beyond it. Nigger-limbs and nigger-growths spreading on the land, in the most deprecated manner there was, not even a wretched thing as to remind one of the time spent after, near them, near these sub-humans could erase what drew after from inside those pools and spread. Wretched was their calling, almost as much as the niggers themselves were. Monkey-kings of monkey kinds, all to be abused even and especially by their own, as well as blindly as they would follow after, it wriggled in.

His realm was tainted, basked as it were, brood-forth in fear, Ghyiallapag but reared in, barely could be seen. Much to it, never again, to be closely looked, of such unkindness, as the world itself shook. As if the entire land mass of a planet similar to Earth there was, but only covered in nothing else and nothing more than the impoverished by their choices, African countries that spread at last.

Fairy motherhood

Of, pretty land as it shook, where peace had followed through at last and there was such a blessed kindness that would grow out of a man, once, as if to fast and last.

A few of them, of glowing spheres, had yet to come of mind, again appeared.

Near the entrance to such fair a growth, near the entrance where there stood killed men who had touched each other, but untold; was there as such, anything of them remember, and naught. Would say or to approach, for they had known, not to draw near. And told, off by centuries and crones; stay away and avert your eyes, if you want to keep them if you're old.

Enough was there, but shared around.

Glowing upon such peaceful land:

'Ylee, ylee, of such tenderness of which I see; I ask you to remember, as there is, where will I but go to find some peace? Of molded land and beauty fading, of such a thing, as, much to my content, I see no further, closer thing, and fading. I wish there was such lamentable plight. To remind me, of lesser things as would one see, much to himself. Of such delights, as blossoms fading; much to their light and always contending with what was to happen and what to follow so, my dear, you're delightful, in my company, as one would think so.'

'But thank you dear thing, as you are, come forth, my sister. As your blessing is to tender, as yet to be again blessed; I pace around in condemnation as for likeness of bold intent, I lack in thee command and see, if there is such a thing to me, as to recall of timed a day. When there were beasts, come along the way. Who would shatter, as to stutter, upon such peace that would but falter after. They would but forget their manner and maim the land.

Who is left out there to make such bland? And statement as there would but follow and what comes after, such as there is, tomorrow, I shall find. A piece of scar and something that's about as pure.'

'You're, a, but a thing of dreams, aren't you, Ylee?'

Such was the growth of the land, of many beauteous flattery of green and flowers, thrown about and made alive. Many of them talking and growing, in such sights. Not a single soul descending, not a single one ascending. All but in the middle fending, as was life but pure.

'I wince as such plain a thought, though I am weary no longer, for what was done and what was thought. I, of whom, have such peace of soul. I feel, such antiphony to the obscure; light of day, and glow of heart. What makes this groove of ours, go around.'

It had to be protected, as there was purity, for all to see. No dark creatures inside of it, to spoil and rot, only beauty such as man and fiend alike, could never have discovered on their own. All was kept away, hidden as they would not show.

Not for the likes of warring man to come and spoil, not for such likes as would but come and toil, with the honey roots that served to still. Their hunger was never to ascend, nor grow with. There was no growl and there was no bend, no cracking of the bones and nothing to lend; or to worry. Nobody in there was sorry. And for that alone, they felt at peace; nothing to be ashamed of, only the purity of dream; staring at such puffy clouds, as they'd descend and beautiful at that. No vile thunder, or vile storm, no winter of ashen gray hairs, as no one would either or grow old again. And they were happy, and kept the same.

Who would, as there is, refrain? From going as to mess, with the nature, as to impress, such were likened to each old, and no one was yet, again, told. Just, yet, what's to follow; courteous as for courts and olden wallowed, wallowing, look around. Peace and toil was not on either dirt or ground, but in the hearts of the fairies where all was pure, and all was alike.

Many rosy cheeked hills and blossom spares, and many gardens had been lain; all but naught in place. Some sublime and some barely moving as for each, lain leaf. That could be gotten, that could be touched, for each one that could be grabbed a hold of. Whenever there was someone around. Many spread, of higher, barely touched, lain peaks, lesser things, but wallowing in peace, as to be left on side, here on out, but one to hear the single tear fall into a pool; where a tadpole's laughter was anything but cruel.

Of an aspect, such it were, blossom rose ever so back and forth and ever wonder. When the next flower might come after, as for such, as holy wager, coming from inside the light, and such was it, the wager had fallen thus. Was there no reason to ask?

‘What have we put in?’

‘A jar filled with fire-flies, bothersome resin in which they’ve been into.’

‘I see, I see.’

‘Hast thou blessed our many lords today, way-way of blessed happenings when they might’ve come and stumbled onto us, when light upon such queerly long-forlorn, of such blessed cherubs as those their own.

That bring upon us ardor of the higher seas that were but named in named, as to him as to worship, as to call. Him upon;’

There were days where they had went back and forth, unable such depressed fords, as would the shallow water, river-water, long-basin, that does come after.

‘Does thou want to look around: I shall ask you, thus, only this once, release these fireflies!’

‘For what reason does thou beckon?’

‘I understood less than I have come onto you, to ask, this.’

Desolate plain, along the desolate tower, along the desolate throne

Remains thrown around it, all of whom had brought provisions all the way back from home.

In the distance, outside. What had remained of the land:

A wretched lone house stood on top a few nine to six groups of many stacked upon one another hellish hillside formations. From the top, because the ones at the base, closer to the ground began disintegrating; while the remaining one having grown large inter-connected appendages that made their inner frames bubbly, as they carried along, strangely expanded upon forms, outwardly heaving, while the house was but ever so heave upwardly towards one of the mollusk in the front and in the back, with band-like but wrapped around like a banknote incandescent puffy rose creature with thin-legs, that made fire-bubbles out of their reedy ends. Having made children with the dead-skies, in which they planted and made, for themselves. Large ‘like-resting-half-banana-held-between-two-palms-for-men-to-sleep-inside-of-beds’ Hawaii things, but wide-spread like diamond sheets of spiderlings and spideresque sky-falling apart, from here and there, until fully, outwardly, beyond overly spread, beyond the acceptable release. An eerie end to violence and war; every human hanged beyond the veils, of, bore they are one by one to the puffy implants, they being the cradles. Slouching lazily upon an invisible fading floor, thin as to be reached by a towering formation of crawling on top each other, bore. Through, the likens of the sky, a house rises. Slowly, surmised. A creature is lain inside, puffy rosy becomes puffy red, as it open, down he watched, as from inside a bomber, the nasty rider. A pilot, whose face is rotten, nakedly is he awaiting release. From where he stands, slowly is the thing below it, readily staring up, as to approach most continently, as if he were to leap from the other end, instead from his darkened bed, which was dragged out of the very front door, on that patch, for a moment now, looking down and he could see a floor. But not a real one, although made of many backs it seems, many of whom, cradled upon one another, past and thinning off, one by one, he could see these giant boils that strike about. One of them is in the distance. Though come from another pack, it opened itself, revealing no hill, but like a planet being split, as to show every layer of Earth. A strange, sanctimonious dark flower bud that's split in half; brought out of it, a single pike with bloated on, and every side, once fully and fitfully extended, it revealed the many ones that pretended to be of one piece as well. No longer compressed in front of one another, and come out of the middle, where, like a Fireman's hose, it came out after, slowly unrolled, but wrapped still, once fully out to show. Despite its many strangled segments, it was still connected at a middle piece, appearing like a medieval axe, of stone, chipped in. Right in the middle, and forming a triangle; connected, banded, and least of all radiating after. It started moving back and forth, like a madman with an axe, trying to chop. Nasty thing, the man felt saying. But he mustered his courage, of, much beyond bravery to make himself stop. What if it heard? From down there and what if he came after him at that? But he should've known better. Or should've suspected that the sides of its buds, were but the top-half of a much more rounded body that came out, out of the ground it came. Fat, so much fat, it bore. Held, around it by many bars, like prison, like a mixer, kind of, it was. But in the middle, it bore a dark crystalline figure, of a figure, the fighter that slashed and tried punching his way out, incapable of doing it. Even if he punched up, there was a pseudo platform as well as there was one below. A cylindrical prison up to a point yet, a ballerina's dress –shape where the bars contorted forwardly, like the spines of men who walk on all four; but the land was wreathed as it fully came out. Since its lower meaty side, on which the prison was one was but a deformed peculiar boot like the ones worn by Chinese ladies in order to make their feet smaller, that torturous specifically made device for beauty or an ugly humanoid giant pepper. The figure that appeared, like a tribal tattoo, projected on it was that of a flatly drawn firefly connected to a blood-balloon, at the tip of its tail, although the firefly would be more of a taxidermist's project, rather than a resting flaccid position, an amalgamation at the tip of its head, which appeared, although both the balloon that was drawn as that, were soft and appeared meaty enough to be two mouths, or pseudo puckers, moist tonguelip hybrids, while, beyond the head of this 'firefly' whose spun-around head was more of a mosquito's blood drawer, bore, lightning segments that moved inside a transparent layer of skin, like a tape worm. Overall, it was a strange being.

Since it looked more like a deformed creature, with the fat-head of a fish open, attached to the iron frame of a lamp, put on top of a baby-doll's body which had its limbs removed, which got melted on an iron pan that has been heated for, just long enough that its body would resemble eggs; as for eggs and bacon. With an eye as well, instead of being yellow, this baby-doll-frying-pan-made-egg semi-softened thing bore a reddish one instead. A little flag being hanged inside the open fish's mouth, though ruined. But no eyes.

What lifted its overall form was but four great gut-contortions, like innards, that were like bone-cartilage-made, shaped, thin legs. Connected to a lesser segment; but these three ugly legs were not only disgusting looking, but they were unevenly placed on its 'right' side as well. Or from the man's side, although his vision wasn't what it used to be, left, two of them and one that was closer to the middle, but closer to right, at the far edge of the melting point, in front of the reddish ball.

These three holders were connected to the cartilage of a giant human's basin, the hips' bone, those ones that have two holes in them, behind the cockles. But made of one piece, as if, it were, at first a depiction, which has then been inflated as to become a fatter oblong, then grew, after being given birth to a thing of its own. Like an ugly squished under your feet, cheese, but made of cartilage.

Its three legs were pumping in its. Also three giant elongated necks, which rose up, from this lower piece, which was, more of a conjoined twin fartbag of skin, or two pancreases, or two 'twins' and a 'chode' – where the 'thing' pointed at the back; and reached the same level as the half-rose bulb, standing alongside the cage, resting. Both sides of the 'twins' as well as the, yeah, that's where they came from, alongside and behind the cage; and these three pseudo-serpents; well their throat-regions were not segmented but had- operable, and capable of being opened, fuselage doors, like car-doors, or traditional stove-doors, whereas, they hid, inside, and behind closed doors, their true inner-neck organ. As this was more, akin to their, to be certain, exoskeletons; at times, these doors opened and gave rise to hundreds of flies that were implanted inside their yellow glowing 'true-necks' that would be exposed as soon as their children went out.

The flies were shuriken-two-dimensional-pseudo-depictions-of suns with sketchy black corded lines coming out of them like asterisks, where, upon these things, appeared, fully grown beaded rectangles that drew along, like window blinds, bore bubble-red balloons filled with blood clot –ticks at the end, five of six of them. While the 'shurikensuns' that bore these open holes in the middle also formed numbers, drawn along iron strings, like beads. Organs shaped like numbers, as if human serial killers, killed, none other than women and turned their guts into these ciphers. That had no meaning. These flies also had one tail or window-blind that had no balloon and no weight and they all flew above, towards the sky, for no reason and disappeared. It was a ritual, that held no meaning.

Well, the three serpent head's upper regions, although were not open heads, were actual funnels. That had holes as well. Which meant that these yellow-hidden necks must actually be exposed somehow or weak there, since they were, 'gone' through, or were the funnel-hoses themselves, perhaps this is how the bud wanted to get water, or conjure rain. By sending its minions, the flies to dance, for it, up there, penetrating the webs that blocked rain from happening, maybe those numbers are the countdown until they explode, leaving open gaps, so water could drain in, so the bud can finally have a drink.

The strange thing was, that, while this happened, it still stood there, swiping back and forth, frightening the poor old man. It knew.

Its legs were strange, those three legs were more like power-tendons, yet, perhaps the worst thing possible was the fact that, the crystal warrior trapped inside suffered the most, since he could not even shatter himself from the looks of it.

But, what could not be seen, since it was a secret was the fact that these flies, whose globes were actually made of crystal. The same crystal that was siphoned from inside the body of the Crystal warrior, which were indestructible, which, as the secrets tell, were not only made of an indestructible material, but, were not only filled with blood, but were also in control of the, behind the hollow filled with numbers, in the middle of every fly. There being a phantom funnel attached, which was drawn like strings, or kites, not to the great throated funnels attached to the main beast but to a strange pocket in the earth, which, they were all attached to. Since what was seen outside was only an armor, on a strange patchy-platform that was meant to serve as a distraction, an exoskeleton. An underground river – but not river-river but like a drawing of a river, if seen from above, a deformed pocket of air, wreathed in chitin lay there. The real body of this being was the air stored inside, or the gas.

This giant platform with three legs, this hula doll, in some way, with three great scepters with funnels, was nothing more than a drainage cap that served as a tombstone. Yet, it forcefully dragged the larvae-thing shell like chitin with it. Because, it needed water; since, inside this oblong pattern, in which, the on-coming water was being drawn inside of, there were inner-capable of physical divination organs which teleported the water from the inner-plumage livid pipes, into the chitin, where the creatures that lived inside of it could finally drink some crystal clear beyond-purified water.

Since the lower river-fatty worm-thing that stored the ‘being’ was completely sealed.

Inside, reanimated, pseudo, they still had to be fed and receive water in order to survive, servants worked on great work-wheels that were like ship-wheels that had a cylinder that at times pumped up and down, taking them with it. Threading and trudging along, into the air. Flying. Beyond the socket they were put in. Blasphemous gas creature, as it were, there was no other, beyond wretched creature than it. For its likens adored messing with them.

The servant’s head were their hands and their leg-backs were large cartilage fridges, horizontally placed but on an incline. And they only had necks, and no real heads. And their square backs only bore two moving bumpers that were hardened lumped giant scarab or leaves that went up and down. Or giant square blobs with one long throat, out of which two mantis-scythes came out of, hugging, as to form circles. Their backs opened. Inside them lay actually dead people, well preserved, deadly pale white. Lenin the Diviner’s body was hidden inside one of them, he will never die.

Some niggers were thrown around the dead pools, but, fucking niggers; lazying around when everyone else’s working. Dead pools, not dead niggers, yet.

Outside, all of the sudden, the giant creature removed itself from the, oblong-pelvis with a vestigial tail-bone ‘chode’ frame, revealing that it was attached to it by pseudo-looking cartilage shoes. Heaps of dirt being thrown around it, then, to the old man’s surprise, whose eyes not only widened, but his mouth, gape open, in shock could not denote the possible shock and confusion as this creature moved as fast as a Turkish person, a cockroach, not only that, but walking on top all of the stacked on top of one another, as well as their thin ‘bridges’ that interconnected them during their continuous expansion, as fast as a roach, until it stood on top the platform, all three legs lopsided the side of his house, this veil above, the sky itself being curved by the sheer size of, it, which in turn caused the nearest puffy-two sided snail rolls, to simply be forcefully rolled to the side, and fall much further on the veil, and although it was not penetrated by this dull axe-like thing, that didn’t matter. As, the old man, whose expression turned from one of sheet terror to one of fury-confusion, being something beyond any explanation, his three fish-net lady legged thing simply bent over as it began taunting him. Only slightly bent over, as to rub it in his face, with the ‘swipe-swipe-I’m-gonna-get-you, I’ll-get-you, I’ll-get-you!’ kind of motion being fully done with, then. It simply turned around, and made do, like the Ottoman Empire, and was nowhere to be seen.

Down there, the platform was left un-fended, but it had already begun the growth of another 'cask', like the Turks always do, while the man old man was left, open-clenched, atop his chest, aghast as to what happened.

One of the flies came out of nowhere and spat blood in his face after. Then it left as well.

'Rude.'

Somewhere in the distance it kept running for some reason or another. It is still rather unknown why this elongated hose-cartilage like appendage that fills the entire body of the pseudo-open-domed but cut like a cage would to be, open in the middle with its two split maws, a few hundred miles from one side to the other. With fleshy walls on both sides, signaling that it's soft both here and there. Touchy-porous, yet, inside of it, inside of this open organ, despite it being set on a perfectly round metallic rusted platform, despite it being merged or welded to it, while being perfectly, outside, lacking of features, it bears only this elongated appendage. Like a coiled snake. It could be a parasite, hiding inside this rottenly-split fruit. Outwardly, this rotten-fruit domed head, is but dark and rather, hard-set, almost like a pseudo-broken hard stone-esque that would be textured like a disgusting roach-avocado. The limb's tip contortion, molded with another segment. Purple skinned, with an almost dead-paleness of rotten in and out, heaved-stitched on top of it limp pair of lumps. It's clear enough that this livid organism that's become its home used to be an organic comet that fell and was claimed by this evil intestinal cadaverous worm. That also has, in the place it's fused with the middle area of, what could be seen out of the outwardly protruding segment it latched on, a tattered sail made of black hairs, a mop that was used to clean tar, no, much worse than that. A simian hand, the simian hand of a niggardous beast; stitched patched of a green-filled with mold-growths of yellow kind of protrusion as well. Filled with moss-growths at every segment; almost bumpy from where one stands, if he were to stand across the openly deformed almost maw-closed rims of the beast. Or sea-poles, all attached with rings at every segments with black violently cut, disgusting coiled in tatters. Thinner at the end as well, as if it were the simian's forearm. With the, last segment, being, almost pushed through, a few meters in, like an awkwardly bending sausage, or a contortionist's back spine, who's suffering of hernia while seen from behind. Forming a V, or an arrow –rotated as to face the horizon with its tip, seen as such from the side, although this contortion seems forced, dull yet kind of sharp, as if there's bone in there, straightening it as much as it can. And during its initial drawing out, from this already compressed in form, it had been spindly as well, almost a simple overlapping fat-finger-balloon before it inflated itself. A simian-decayed filth nigger could be trapped inside the rotten meatily decaying prison, buried underneath the weight of its own arm. Whereas, the crystal creature trapped inside, this peculiarly shaped cage, which is nothing more, than two metal discs interconnected by the bars, whereas the upper one is thinner, the lower one is much wider and appears to depress into, as the lower disgustingly grown body is, if it were truly shaped like a peculiarly crafted doll, the side of the lower disc would push through the throat, the head-neck region belonging now to the bars, down to being slightly below or at the same level as the shoulders. But his doll, would have to be placed, initially on its arse. It was as if the lower baby-doll's region didn't exist at all, or at least, the midriff, perhaps not even reaching the belly button any longer, that being, or referring to the only region that's kept straight, it could have drifted in the one that's been 'melted' like eggs done on a frying pan with Sunflower seed oil, whereas, the strange pseudo-fire-fly's main, or, likely, it's mot of a pseudo anathema, wingless, though with a spiral-covered bubble being present instead of a head, its tail threading along the lower depression.

The body would be more like a pseudo-shaped by a child, clay volcano, with the lower depression and all, but flatter on both sides and warped forwardly. While those weird tapeworms, inside the transparent 'chest' would be far closer, akin to scribbles, of an animation of scribbles moving, while, evidently being animated; the fire-fly being connected to the soft depression, a disgusting, hard to look at 'sphincter' of puckery rose. Yet both the 'firefly' head and this would both seem to be soft areas. A shore, a strange melted shore-like thing that the cage's depressed into, while, below it, from the lower side, although it would be hard to stare at since the three legs aren't even, evenly curved, they seem to all hinge to one direction, the right, aligned to the right as seen from below. A bloody shelled, chitinous, yet exactly like an arc, but more tender and a lot, different. Not a perfect ark, or a ship, but, neither a foot, unless either of those were destroyed, carved or butchered, since it bore awkward uneven angles. Even the entire thing itself was more of a pepper-fat thing than anything in itself, despite its layer of protection. Whereas the legs, appearing soft, entered three designated 'hole' areas. Jottings, scratches, and various deformed segment areas spread all around the under-ark. They are connected but aren't, like overlapped puzzle pieces, but with, actually stitched-black things that are, and have on top and inside of them, bubble-beams with fake-vampire-incisor props, grown and ingrown. As strange as it sounds, with the whole stitched in part. All of them moving, as if they were different organs trapped together. Some lower-harder bumps that would resemble bumps but mainly, hardened. Smallish and many of them, stacked, all around and beyond, thinning out as they approach the edges, which in turn, as they would climb, would assimilate in a much smoother surface. A lot more prudish down there, below it, crude, primitive yet organic; despite that, the inner layer it's attached to, as seen from the side of the open hole area where the legs are coming out of signals that there's a hard layer lain above them. They're nothing more than pseudo-disgusting looking barnacles stitched with filth-rocks and black tape worms. The whole creature is nothing, or must be nothing else than that. Many put together, canon-fodder, controlled by the gas. The beast inside, a mass of pink meat, simple, yet keeps everything from falling apart. Filled with strange organs colored blue and purple with two by two, as in pairs of spherical headed, covered with pus-skin tags made of men structures, that produce steam-color it washed insides into. That pucker thing in the front that's exposed is a different being, a dark-cylinder. Covered with spikes, like a cacti inside, and every spikes forced the inner leg carried to suffer, as it's a torture wheel creature. But it's doing so because it's starving. Many of the pink meaty creature's organs are all stored in the legs as well, making them much thinner than expected. And there are hundreds upon hundreds of them, all, vaguely but not entirely interconnected. Like human blood cells, but they have removable veins that can both latch and unlatch themselves to one another. Being forced to constantly rotate inside these three 'legs', which were never meant to be used for this purpose, holding so much weight, flight, more likely, but all who is not man has to suffer. They're all spinning inside these three legs, these sets of, oh, spherical though puffier organs are a sphere on top another, connected with another inner set by pseudo-bridges of cartilage. They only connect through the under-side of every spherical organ, by muscle like stalks of steam-color carriers, which, despite not being attached to anything, always remain in the same place, relatively speaking. Of course they're move from side to side when the beast's moving. But they're frozen in place, still, even when curved, relatively to the walls they're facing. Pink-puffy legs, once removed from what would seem to be a, water-spilled in three centralized regions- shaped 'shoes', they're incredibly sharp, like deep-sea drilling devices but hard and heavy rocked. Moving by pounding the ground; though this would not explain why no bleeding has occurred yet, the mass of the upper-region that's being constantly tortured by the rotating spiked cylinders always grows back.

The man of crystal is strange, he bears a crystal sword growing out of his chest and arms, always growing, but never shattering and never, seemingly never there.

The cage would be more of a Victorian Era's corset on top of a lady with a fat lower side and a bigger belly, a ruined one that's forcefully being shoved on top a barrel.

Regardless of it, the great caged Roach was awaited for; at to attend, while carrying the will of the gas, being mind controlled by it, as every being inside the roach, a meeting. With the Great Lynching Crystal, inside of which, many niggers as well as ropes were teleported inside of, one nigger and one rope soon after, on different distant corners, made to chase and be chased, as the rope would come after. The nigger; so it could lynch him. But lo, twas not as much as it seemed to be; for heartlessness leper, must one musk his sight and see of leprous day.

'The evil day has yet to come and scour all that are come after, when the incenses are yet to burn out.'

He was no longer yet to hear himself talk.

No, the Simian's elongated arm, segmented like spiders' limbs, or a centipede's, ear crawler's body frames but in an inflated long balloon by a circus clown way, or tender, filled with muscle cartilage punching bags thinning as they draw along, with sutured, many green-infected faces filled in square-delimited or rectangle patches, sutured on top like old Victorian Era's fixed pants' way of fixing pants, while each segment bears black flaccid, mushy rings with seaweed like or a two-dimensional ugly sun, or like manually washed clothed you'd twist like a knot in order to squeeze them dry. His prison, a giant rotten pear flattened below this clearly deformed bird-cage, which may have sharp inward pointing, though connected to the bars like, as if the bars were crowbars with sharp hooks instead of their pointy ends, that had been welded in, with weldwires, same for the push-through below it, that's like trying to squeeze a balloon of a more rounded, much wider shape with a cylinder. Perhaps not just a volcano doll-chested thing, but more of a volcano that erupted, while the shore-sea, farther-depressed side would be closer to the or not water coming close to the shore, the other way around, that being. Its three legged 'feet', that small portion that was fit inside a socket. Like the lower side of light-bulbs, but more, fatter, and pushed out. Delineated by cuts, like pizza-slices, but not openable from the looks of it, not pincers, not stuck, but this is more of a superficial delineation of an outline. A few welded in chitinous part-gates, or black medieval England, Dark ages, kind of castle, tower roofs. While the lower side of the ark-belly, would seem to be more like, the boils especially, bubble-gum grown through the cracks left by misaligned shards, crests and barely drawn along black swinging ropes, knotted as well, a mildew-muck trailed alongside it. While, the holes, more like squared up, clearly carved in for the organ-filled legs to fall or grow through. This great body is a shell, but a biological shell that's grown with every creature in it, but cut as well, as to clearly, intrude, push, 'tilt', or drive the growth in a certain direction. Meaning it could grow as many as hundreds or thousands or millions of legs if enough cuts had been made. Maybe a kind of silicon-thin but harder, and of some alloy combined with many other chemical hardened elements, the shell, since and there's enough space between these hole'cuts in the 'fuselage of the shell, through which the three legs are pushing through, for the strange material to be seen. It's, made of. Hard to see, but clearly pushed apart, or carefully placed, almost like, bubble-needles, but the texture. 'Bubbly'-needles that either appear made out of one point or give the impression of being spar-shot inside the clean smoothness of it. Clearly a hard material that's been cut; like cutting wood and looked from its side at the weird texture that's not covered in lacquer. With v and inverted v 's, almost uglily jagged edges, around the rims of the entry that would hurt it, the pink mass, the legs if they, like shards, or spikes, or sharp-edges, or knives, sharp leftovers, spines, or thorns pointing at them, spears, but made of the structure, intentionally left there, as to facilitate it moving exactly in a perfect manner with, as for the muscles that are clearly capable of doing, stillness as well as an intense quickness, because, if too much force was applied, they would chop off their, every child, which is grown this way, since they're a species, well all of them are, they come together, but in this case, it would chop off its own legs. By brute force, then die, since all the organs are stored in the legs. More like horn-like formations inside the square-holes.

But, these jagged things, these jaggy edges, were more like, only at the top and sparse, as if an actual cut had been made, and it was somewhat clean, they were still sharp and thick enough to completely cut through the legs, but no one actually took the time to turn this, no, that might've been an exaggeration, not this, but these square holes into zigzagged things. More likely, they had been cut, then pulled downwardly, which would explain the sharpness of the edges at the top. The key is seeing it from the inside of the shell, as square-pits, or open rectangle-like lids, or sardine cans with eerily unclean sharp things around. While, during the growth of the legs, feeling the pressure caused by the pushing pain, made to feel by these things, it could be why they were slightly thinner at the entry point, since the legs were, basically made of unevenly formed lumped innards. Unintended to be legs, plus they were also close to the curvature, which gave them a pseudo-weird angle as well. Since they were at the point where the side of the great-volcanoesque shell, curved, slightly distorting this hole on one side. Not to mention in any case that there was the layer of barnacle-trash everywhere else, outside. Eerily enough, they never approached the 'mass-formed' legs, keeping a perfect distance that would allow one to place in, perfectly fitting, a giant pack of cigars, without even damaging the cardboard box, despite the fact that these were puzzly sharp shards themselves. They fit perfectly as to create a pseudo wall around it, the encasement of a tomb, or a square-well, where brick-by-brick around, a place is made and lain; and it was even more awkward, considering, since every leg was on a side, not only, well. It's like that almost fallen to one side-tower, but if it had legs. And the lower-side of the shell wasn't as round, below it, as in the bottom, not the sides, as an ark-ship, but pseudo-similar. Some pseudo-similarities were present but not entirely. While from side to side, the scum-barnacles which either were absorbed, because there is evidence of them, 'shrinking' in some manner while also being, or transitioning, in some way 'evolving' into chitinous shell-hardened alloy, from their quasi-shard shell, pseudo organic boil-barely put together, cluster they're in. They could be baby-organisms, or baby-cells, like humans have, embryos that failed to mature. While the hose-organs are their versions of 'guts', failed to grow, stillborns, being pushed out by the shell. It could be that the shell refuses to become its mother and merely keeps them, hanging. Most likely they're all dead, since there's no way to absorb any sustenance whatsoever. And the others that have become the shell, that got assimilated, they're not alive either, they're turned into alloy. So, if there was ever a chance that, there was a parent-children relationship between them and this two-sided struggle of theirs, ever existed, now it's gone, thoroughly, utterly gone. Both sides lost, they became casts, armor. It's kind of like a seen from above, top of a boxing ring. Where those bands on the sides are these creatures, but the boxing floor was the mass; with the boxers being the legs, but of course, much bigger, wider, so on and so forth. Well if the sides and the bands and those support beams were also filled with barricades and corpses. So, more like war-dug in trenches with sand bags, but also barbwire. The entire form would look like a pseudo robot with a pizza-melted lower body. And there's also its transparent with a pocket inside of, tape-worm-like filled 'bag'. Or a giant bent upward while crawling larvae with a giant half-cut cracked on the top, egg-head with a weird sticky tongue stuck within itself. Most definitely hooks, attached to every side of the bars, at least at their edges. It must be how they planted themselves in the shell. Just so it's known, around the lower, wider, metallic disc in which the crystal fighter's trapped in, there are a few miles of open space that leave the impression of there being shoulders, and a pseudo-hunchback, and enough space for 'collar-bones' to be in, then an immediate compact-square flatness on the main bulk. Kind-of-like a torsoed larvae, and the three legs, hose-filled with meat. There's also the giant cushion like pelvis thing, oblong, beneath the earth standing, while also beating the three giant elongated throaty towers, bricked with stove-gates, furnace gates, like the ones kikes are going to slowly be put inside of, ovens. These funnels, at the top of them are capable of closing up, enclosing themselves, enwrapping as well in, weird-almost protective, although, they're flaccid and foldable, the funnels, and they seem capable of drawing inside the lower body with the elongated throats as well, like elevator-genitals. Half-globes but made of strings, pushed out of them, then. Forming interconnected circle-scrawls that grow and grow, like mattress springs, wrapping around the main bodies, creating electricity, or being capable of it. Or shooting it, but not normal lightning, but a special imbued, and that's only at the top, at the tip of the wire-globe, like a marionette' cast body's, atom-energy shooters' 'ray' bouncing against the cage, which in turn would shoot in whichever direction the gas is pointing towards. Sometimes, just for the sake of it, upon being fully extended, reaching the 'pelvis', the 'legs' are also getting their fair share of shock therapy, just for the sake of it, like a fuck you, for existing. Since those spheres are its organs as well as the place where the brain mass is being stored in, brain injury is also being experienced, and brain fog as well. They're like tall futuristic buildings with globes on top of them, or domes, that being the apartment some lives in, with banded-Saturn rings all around the watch tower, courtesy to Jimmy Hendrix, who was a black person, not a nigger. While, the inner main-piece of these necked-funnels, is but like glowing yellow-spread lighted-entirely, wax, but organs. Inside the lower oblong-pelvis, there's a chaos of shapes and forms and worms and tapes and things that fly, and darkness and pops and explosions and eyes, and floating people that explode, and pipes that extract and things that teleport from other worlds. Disemboweled hands that create invocations of magik, Alistair Crowley whispering in the dark, whose eyes are reddened black and speaks in tongues and floats frozenly from one side to another, with a dark scepter, with a strange eyed-ruby that commands the chaos and the specks of magic-dust and the cast-in-iron fairies that are chained and made to rot in crystalline prisons as well as in deformed ribs with elongated-roots and giant head-shaped hearts inside of them, connected to four-sided iron grappling hook-based-devices with rectangular legs that shoot in half-o, formations, the arc. Four legs that are curved like curved swastika cuts, then lower themselves down, but they're like pseudo-anchored in the ground claws as well, that. They're not pseudo rib-cages but strange capillary hives, with gaps, in which heart-like heads, of men, whom were killed, prior to death, occultist-magicians, while their lower bodies, to which they're attached are downward pointing grappling hooks, with a mass of iron, like a sack of meat-but actually filled with devices, a flaccidly melted short cabin. In front of them they push, a few meters, straight bars, that have wires and other smaller apparatuses attached to them, appendages. This being the first part, the next segment rises upward on a slight incline, smoothly. And there's like cog-ball between the two of them, like human joints, for a much more flexible, or allowing for such a type of movement to be, existent.

The third segment is a curved iron 'bar' as well but like a mantis blade but a scythe, curved, from his point of view to the right, but they would only appear as 'pseudo-swastika' when seen from an awkward angle as for, and it's not a fully drawn scythe-swastika but, only one of its pieces, out of four. Which would then be attached, and if one were to look at the second and the third segment, fatten them, or take the frame, they would be met by the image of a pseudo water-tap; to a pseudo insectoid cartilage, this being the fourth segment, flaccidly hanging, attached to an elongated last one that's much bigger, wider, fatter. Upon which he walks, this in-life necromancer.

The frame, could be seen, from an angle, that being, the entire frame, the walking appendages, as a bar, with two legs, but one of its legs is attached or is trying to kick a pseudo-flaccid bubbly iron pot. Or it's stuck inside a bubble-gum lower bodied creature. Or stick-like legs, but fatter and more mechanical. They're like running skeletons that stop at the pelvis, but made out of metal, albeit they're all equally distanced from one another. Maybe four of these legs present. But this would not stop his madly benign incantations from occurring.

There was also a Russian Inspector, dressed in a grayish coat but was giant-bullet-formed, with crawlies underneath him, carrying in. He was smooth-bodied and his clothes were part of him. He smiled, and had one eye, a pair of pirate patches and twenty dark- rotating disc-scalps rotating, well, spinning-rotating, but inside of him. Like there was a projector playing an old movie, of a man presenting onto him a disc. I believe they used to call them salesmen, or telemarketers. But were bloated black, like galaxy-pudgy, with livid eyes, that had people inside of them, on the surface as well, squirming in place like disgusting larvae from not washing your cooking pot for too long. And a few more joined them. Russians are good people.

Nasty, ugly, filthy Jews should he hated and gutted instead of them.

Filthy kike-paid propaganda would have you believe otherwise, but the Russians are good people.

There was a first for everything, especially this:

A flowery bed of dark worming in between one another darker shaped worming heads, with their ship-like bodies open here and there, and just about every other side.

Whereas some of them would be standing, sitting, wreathing as to, look uncanny, many of them were already dead. Or had been dead for a long enough period of time; a sparking river-water formation, frozen, lifted up appeared to draw, out of air, the puckery forms of little bee-inflated porous corns.

They were like elongated vestigial bone-beans, or swollen plume-puckers. Olives that were rotten, but beating straw-formations out of their mouths, that were connected to pendulum cutters their breaths were caught in. Two at a time, holding this pendulum-thin sheet, which by the left side of, and the right side of the other bean-like infantile flying embryo-adult bearded but armless creature, between the two of them, a long sheet of cartilage was being kempt, welded to their cutters. To their cleaver-like long pendulums they only kept a hold of with their mouth-houses, attached. But these pendulums were not perfect pendulums but longer and sharper and cut, like oblong boomerangs; as it only seemed, more queerly, both being drew, down, as they attached themselves to the second part of the pendulum, the one behind or parallel to their mouths, a second tube pushed down, attaching itself to this boomerang-oblong in which they must've stored, as if they were, two shells, from one to another, carrier of a long-cartilage carpet, a sheet of skin between each of them, held within. From the side, meaty-giant-beans put instead of pelvises standing on sharp bloated skin-bananas, both of them trying to run away from one another.

And in the same room there was the touched one. Whose body was a cast; but a few holes, one would think were used for breathing were there, spread across his chest. Out of every hole, hundreds of hands came out, thin like that of ladies, all of whom were used only on himself to mask the pain. They, these hands, as if they had wills of their own, were shy. They never wanted to come out. It looked like a sad iron-made strange, coated in alloy, no arms of his own, that's why he bore the holes, and two sharp ivory tusks of the same material coming out of the stumps, where 'his' arms would've been, of theirs, in case hundreds of victims are hiding inside of it. Screams and wails coming from inside of this 'torture device'. But it looks like a dark elephant filled with scales from either side, wide-spread on the body of a man.

That thing was weird, that one, hiding in the corner of a dark speck of fly-bubbles of blue and red which popped like dandelion-flares in place. It had a weird witch-like face deformed to look like its eyes were two scythes, glowing with orange, a mouth within a mouth, forming a plus, but drilled in, or sawed-through. Not a perfect cross, crucifix, anathema, but distorted. By four grown on top of one another, overlapping as well boulder-like protrusions like pox-growths or boils; whereas its head was like a Cuman's helmet – humanoid but only in shape, split in half by a line whereas some bars drawing up, then back in, like V's and U's and B's but aimed like a gun-inside-your-mouth-suicide kind of position, but its face instead, -like stitches. Or a strange fancy axe someone had lodged, from inside his head, out, in an attempt to escape, but it's blocked in there. But these two parts of the 'helmet' look like two giant attached-rat heads, with jaws stitched from another animal attached to them, only from the side in the side was seen from in front of the viewer. From the front of the beast, the pseudo Cuman's helmet illusion was given from the fact that the side-eye sockets are filled with weird-wormy stuff of worm-innards, giving the false impression of them being eyes, the sharp iron-like stitch-bars draw down like a nose because of the V' like edge and because the bloated bubbly boulders look like mouth, but more like an African nigger's open mouth that's bearing a disc in it's overall form, not to mention that plus open slit for a mouth. It's body is a strange battering ram, to which the head's attached by a few pumping saws, that form the neck, all interconnected, to the head and the ram. Like a, from the side, a livid ugly Viking ship, with the tip of the carved face and the front part of the ship looking like a mess, despite the weirdly smooth shaped discs lodged in it.

But from the side, the axe-like from inside line stops above the area beyond the forehead and the sockets, never nearing the back of the head, despite the awkward angle in which they're placed. The beast's made of one piece.

Its 'legs' and 'arms', limbs look like giant bloated plumber's pumps, whose wooden sticks are hoses connecting the two, on both sides of the ram, pushing out, then down, but they're made of bones, cartilage and they can push back and forth, being capable of that kind of movement. But the pump and 'hose' were but not just of one piece but they also were, made as by physics, to look like they were a hose attached between two plumber's pumps, the wooden stick with the black sucker.

Sometimes it rested on the back of this punch-bag battering ram, stood as if on one foot, then began clapping its two weird limbs together, like a seal, like a clipper.

It looked as if it wore a cut through, ruined coat, an uglily headed sausage, that bore a strange elliptical formation embed in its chest, one of which was open like a dark hole, out of which, out came a one hundred fifty five miles long tape-worm appendage, spiked, puffy white, plushy toy like, that bore a puckery, round cacti-spherically expandable livid-apparatus of cartilages that upon being expanded looked like the top side of a surgeon's light- part radiator, or a tanning-bed but hanging upside down, and only a part of it, more rounded, with out-let like keys of bar-added, strange bones-retracted and protracted, sets of weird limbs that looked eerily insectoid but with expanding chitin planes like tanning-solar energy panes emerging out of them. And each plate had weird writings on it. And bore, four, equally distance, pinned in screws, chess-piece like but openable and conical. Sometimes when a few of the thinner appendages aligned, they looked like BBQ grills, but tainted with meaty rotten skin.

It began vacuuming the entrails off the floor. They cleaned the mess and the dirt off everything.

They were a species under the command of the Heart-leper. And they were also capable of flying and levitating but they enjoyed suffering a lot more than anything else. Everyone did in this oblong-prison.

Especially since they got off the bean-carrying trampoline sheeted creature's constant dirtying of everything else, since they carried the remains taken from above the stalactite muncher two faced shaking eyeless sacks-plates, which spat everything at the ceiling, instead of letting it fall off the ground, the fliers interfering with the natural order.

Leper Paradise

Near the waste it rested, sallow. Waiting in a corner, after morrow, for there was not a single man to come, upon his feet, they were distraught and gone. Arm in arm eight guards came into sight. They were not authorized to be in this place, having stumbled not by chance, but a choice imposed onto them from a much higher level, the authorization imposed onto them far succeeded that of any living man. General or any equivalent; a sullen construct stood behind each and every single one of them now. Open chested now, out of the cast came a few moths rotten with tattered second-hands he had collected from the previously driven-through-the-wall houses he'd come into contact with.

'My leviathan bloated arks are waiting outside the splendorous hall that's lain beyond the fall.'

An empty rectangular abyss, but spake at last:

'Ilass Eyle, yekke.'

The figure smiled for what was to be, only an incessant dark remark, from one point to another, wherever they want and whatever they saw, for thee, the man who stood as well but ported, a single spake of blood contorted. It drew near and stood as wrong. A madman of which, provoke him, challenge him to a fight; it carried out the mental transmission to one of the bile-made slave-minds. And they listened like the butchered-through animals they were.

‘You’ve got nowhere else to run, we have a claim over your Paradise, from this point on!’

Leper tower-one, standing near Leper tower-two, standing near Leper tower-three, standing near Leper tower-four, standing near Leper tower-five, standing near Leper tower-six, standing near Leper tower-seven, standing near Leper tower-eight, standing near Leper tower-nine, standing near Leper tower-ten, armed with weapons such as, pucker-child, destroy-arm, killer-sprangle mighty dangler, dark-baton with eight elongated heads that bore large-skeleton frames whose open craniums bore large pistol-shafts, capable of piling up hundreds of shots at once out of this one great stick-staff-shooter, a prime-cyanide vapor rounded-beady antennae with two cherry-like iron protrusion with two crisscrossed pincers – molded like two weird creatures welded into one another’s bodies like a cascade of melted irons, a visionary-inducing lucid dream head exploder with black bubbles of nuclear power inducer from the distance melter of organs, large rocket launcher capable of being thrown, sticking like a sticky grenade, pushing its own trigger as to shoot rockets once its position is stabilized, a set of eight axes stuck in a great wheel-circle, that has an asterisk handle in the middle that’s grabbable, two-connected-whips, but have guns at their ends, a peashooter with poison darts, began marching near one of the strange countries filled with nasty ugly headed men whose faces were not only deformed fruits-mold of mechanically deformed, obtuse, stricken down, destroyed-distraught abominations of spike-like extensions that shot in every possible direction, having become part of every possible, while doing so, piece of the ground and standing bath-house, tall houses, but while doing so, by the time of their, or had it been any sooner, realization that they have engaged them into a near-shot conflict that rang their ears in, between both, conflicting sides, a battle had not only ensued, but they were already engaged, placed and equally distributed around the set-battle field, that being a giant straightedly deformed platform with many put-together elongations with weird bar-wire wormy growths standing around them in a most atrocious manner, drawing attention away from their weirdly set unnatural head-tops, that were in actuality nothing more and nothing other than adorning pieces, from which, what could be drawn, at the same time was the fact that, already, as has been closely observed from this weirdly-set but closely analyzed as by a strange part-man-troubadour with eighteen heads, rounded up, rotating like a Farris wheel, had already been on-going for the last eighteen or so, hours, whereas, Leper tower-six, the man armed with the destroy-arm, that being a weapon capable of completely and utterly disintegrating anti-matter glow-pheromones that were filled with men’s desire to father and raise their children against all odds even while the Judicial System, as for, the corruption in the Family Court representing an issue that’s yet to be thoroughly discussed by both parties or every party that’s engaged and in question, refuses to properly address this important issue that spans from an outdated system which favors the woman instead of the man, since they still function on the belief that, a woman sacrificed a great chunk of her life as a homemaker, therefore she’s owed a few mansions, alimony, child support, and the likes, had already advanced on one of the Many Eyed Parasite Kings, God-Pantheon blessed Hybrid Mutant- part cartilage filled deformed falling apart as we speak, giant-elongated ‘ugly-headed men’, whose body’s strange amalgamation is but a strange almost caterpillar-transitional-cask-to-a-butterfly frame with four humanoid simian full bodies serving as its legs, their heads being attached to the great ‘casket’, whose both sides, front-and-behind bear large cutting-blade-edges, but are more-like insectoid in nature, Leimalor, the two of them having been so thoroughly engaged in their front-standing battle of wits, which, had not only progressed, as, this being a matter of, or more of a battle of ideologies, or has evolved in the meantime, during which Leper tower-eight’s sudden funnel-like play with his beady-funnel-scorpion caused a sudden distortion to occur over the entire world, causing the ground to become filled with many limbless-dead-figures whose only

'I've come to a choice already, am I to waste for a moment more?'

He tried walking on eight feet, but didn't know how to reach when one of the leper-brothers drew on, asking him, who the stranger was. A weird flier was watching them, part of the sky-moon-sun-area where all of them were connected. Dark Emachyier bore twenty pebble-bubbles during the first initial cut, in which he caught the magic-tears that had been brought from the power-needle extractors, those being the pseudo-natural satellites that were present when the kiss of space was still merging with the power-beady fallen angel that wasted in place. Upon the plains of the broken land, no farther than a few meters from where they stood as well, as done.

Not a single Leper understood where it had come from, the earth being very much ripped apart, torn in half, incapable of drawing out from either side. Whence a shuttle and the scowled-hairs had grown, inside and through it many looked and lesser ones shook, as soon as they could stand themselves. No sooner had they, seen. With many of them thin as much as either one could take it, wreathing as thoroughly as they could be taken apart, they wasted.

Leprous cysts began forming in the sky, readying themselves to draw on, wherever they could land and whatever mass could come much closer to them, it would matter even less, it would make, much less so than expected, of a difference that would come over them, hence they started shattering, with crackling strikes, with whatever was left of their punching masses, wherever they could land on. Whatever was needed to make a difference, leave a dent:

‘Leprous Mlieth, Eyi-e, you are not to recede into that dark hole until you’re let known of a chance for, strike inside the bowel-stretch upon which the most damned witches, strangled by the upwardly thrower, the bloody-mower shall come and seethe upon. You.’

‘I’ve met a woman, of our kind, a few moments ago, and she was, completely fallen apart.’

‘Do concur, as to waste no longer, might I need as to recede for you to continue, I may’ve made it such, well known, but as it is, I shall not seek no wonder, throwing after, but a glance wherever it might be so.

I seek no lesser satisfaction than it’s needed, my eyes, beaded by a likens such of hers.’

‘What do you want there and what might you make of this rotten pail?’

What held that murky water was spaciouly ingrained in it; en’ bloated with dark basin they sang within the hour, wherever it had been? ‘Might I add the strangeness that belongs to her?’

‘Of course you might but for what reason did you take it away? What might it had been that you’ve taken such a pail, what reason might have you regarded, such as forth, as you may come and go. When will you draw on and lend onto me reason? ‘

‘I cannot, for you see now, I’ve been mesmerized by her faded beauty, and fallen apart limbs, and those that have been taken away from her, with piece after being yet benign after such to die for, clipping of her eye-lashes, I’ve been seeing her thread along. And I have thought onto myself to ask, will you seat yourself by my side?’

‘And I suppose she did as well, for what other reason might she have taken this and given it onto you as well?’

‘I think she needs to obey me, for that reason I’ve decided still, I shall enact onto her as I desire, for my will alone shall dictate her being beaten, time after time before being torn apart and made of a piece that would decide whether or not I am to take my leave?’

‘A marvelous display, I wager, but you are onto me, as you are made, still a stranger I’ve yet to counter.’

‘Will you taste what’s in this pail of murk?’

‘No sooner than I will have been made bequest, I will have done as such with little as there is, of rest.’

‘Careful now, I am weary of strangers, let a long of a woman, whose essence but is dangerous, as yet inclined. I’ve yet to find a reason, nor will I make my mind just soon. But enough of it, I will not wait a second more to prove to you.

We must leave.

If you will have your poison taken, given, led away, do as it pleases you but I shall stand my day and corrupt twenty more hours. Each hour, and each gut, all stored, the twenty four of them, solidified. And if I smash one, every single one that aligns with it shall have an organ of similar size, thoroughly throughout reality done for. Completely, utterly, handicapped.’ With this said, and mighty dead, they left the premise, went ahead.

A most incessant Leper-tower fifteen, whose appearance was an open anatomical cast that walked, fell apart, then came back in, almost entirely put together, dancing in a most foolish way. His gritty teeth, were cracked, slightly shattered, in the forms of standing knives that pointed onward. Yet he asked another man:

‘Will you bring me something from that pit, as well?’

‘Something in particular you’d like?’

‘Anything that looks even remorseless as something I’ve had before, for myself and to myself.

What floated around them, even in that, initial cut through which they drew towards the lowest reaches they could draw onto, were a few speaking slashed around their eye-slits, as to see through wanderers, standing or repelling as they were, hanging around the most obtuse of the darkest accesses one could see strewn-hanged around every wall there out there, molded, piece-by-piece sutured by the sustaining pillars, who, upon, gildedly finding themselves near them appeared to draw small fragments out of their leprous bodies as to analyze them, momentarily being stopped-frozen in place as to draw on a single breath out of the blimp-corn growths that came out of their bodies. They were aligned and made, as to say, were more likely the organic counterparts of daisy-chained livid sockets, that entered their lungs, regulating their respiratory system, but, there was a problem. This being the abominable things that were inside of them, these strangely shaped organs were highly vulnerable to alien mechanisms as well as other kinds of devices, and forces that would or could possibly infect them. Weak in some way to highly toxic materials; predisposed even to being infected, they asked as well, though not until, which was already an intrusive surgery, they took cuts out of the lepers, butchering them on the side. Most of the leper-towers having not only ignored it, but appeared to be highly undisturbed by what’s been happening:

‘We need you to stop right here and begin controlling your breaths. It is of high importance that you do that as fast as possible before you further decimate the inner-makings of the cartilage cove.’

‘Who are you?’

Leper eighteen drew on, he was not about to easily leave this creature to his doings since it were, after all, dangerously hanging way too close for his comfort. He was side-open, and appeared to grow coral-sheets out of it. A puckery-thorn drew forth: it was almost flat, around every side. There were some stars ‘drawn’ on it. But this thing was made of the same leper-warts as the rest of him:

‘This is not exactly what I expected getting out of you, but I shall make it clear enough, I will not waste a second more in this place while you’re around.’

‘Then you either leave or I shall bash your head to death.’

‘It doesn’t have to be this way, leprous runt. We outnumber the ten of you by a bunch, plus, we’re in the walls.’

Molded-melted, sunken into ‘sand’, sculptures and what not, one sided they swam. Clay-rivers all around but swallowing them whole, from that point, there was no asking or drawing of any blood that could take from their bloody-cowls:

‘I think you need rethink what this means.’

‘It means what it means.’

‘We’re armed.’

And they revealed as much with every weapon being pointed on:

There were such derangements as one could find himself just barely pointing at, sprouting out of them, out their shoulders and other parts of their bodies that made it seem as if every single one of them bore a hive-full of artillery, filled to their entirety with an arsenal that would rival that of a warehouse filled with them. Ten, twenty, forty, more than their numbers could ever possibly endow or allow. For the same reason, it was clear that they stood no chance, not even hidden in there, having to hide away what they had on them:

‘Silence, something’s drawing forth.’

There, yonder, closer to the half-way trough, what would’ve been railed down there by wheeled footprints came a spark. Covered in some unnaturally dark dust, in which bolts of light came and played around, there seemed. A tall standing figure, but made of silk-standers, fourteen bodies put together in a most malignant manner. Some of them chopped and put together, ribbed, but they were only seen momentarily before they disappeared within the second one looked back and then.

A strange pair of light-eyes stood on top the blue-tinged dust. It was almost spectral, congruous, yet maligned. As if the air itself and what lay around it had been only a greater part of the body, which might’ve taken a second, or would’ve forced them to realize something was going on.

‘He’s shaking.’ A wanderer observed.

‘Perhaps he is, afraid.’ Retorted the Leper-tower, whichever one, it didn’t matter that much. They were all cut of the same wart-kebab, accesses and all.

It was there for a reason, provided anyone listened.

He called upon one named Leok:

A giant cowl of sheets with a root-like growth in the middle, kept within its reach. Out of the cowl on a side, a cartilage of bone-like hybrid-thing, giant-key looking, sprouted from a molded-in-the-cowl skull, that was as thick and long as a butcher’s cleaver, being dangled upon, tinkling like a chained ring of keys. Whereas its leg arm was a giant side worm sprouting out of a cowl-flat sheet where a half moon embroidery glowed upon them, gloatingly. These piles of sheets but clumsily falling apart, then drawing back inside, around it, warningly shaking at those whom threatened to approach. The rooted pillar-, this limp a flaccid pea, whose growth, where the head would’ve been on this figure was, a giant globe standing, droopingly. It looked like a twist of yarn. Drawing from the root-growth many of the tendon-veins, as they wreathed and spun inside; every single thread appeared to be suturedly-attached to every single layer of his mighty robe. He spoke incessantly of what was inside the darkest accesses of the cove he came out of:

‘Bitter ye, better return. Turn around and don’t look anywhere else, or your may find yourselves unnerved by what has crawled inside of it, what once had been pure has now been entirely curated from anything even remotely pure.’

From somewhere behind the cove, there was also, a strange creature that accompanied them, come along. It was one of the Lepress Toweresses.

‘Lepress, where hast thou come from?’

‘The depths of a most depressed channel.’

Were it not for the wanderers that have found themselves reeling back and forth from the most calloused of the walls, she would not have managed to instill a plight on top of which, of whose cloudy grains took her here, there would not She-Lepress. To which no Leper may yet decay or pronounce a much darker word, of whose fancy not even the most deranged could attest to, therefore, she had driven herself ever so clear, near and forth:

‘I wish only to speak with him.’

‘But thou art alone in kind.’

‘We are the same, are we not? Although not in strength, I yearn for the chance to prove myself, being the only one.

And if I fail, let it be some, most bothersome, will it be, we’re incapable of breeding. What would be the point on clinging on something never to have happened, if I were to be dismantled and completely, utterly, flattered with complete destruction?

Your weapons speak of some, alone. Each bearing the capability of destroying all there is in sight and beyond it.'

'Then so be it, you shall prove yourself through this and ruse, you shall do as you please and go forth, as long as there's naught to lose from that point on.'

But they waited, and reconciled as well, many of the Leper Towers tried to convince him, leader, if naught, there was only a chance, a unanimous vote that had been taken.

'Will she represent us, therefore? Is she befitted, so?'

'She will do what she can and if it's permitted, she will be punished accordingly as any other one of us that might've taken her place, instead. If she does not accomplish it satisfactorily, then, we'll simply eat her and absorb her mass into that of ours.'

Neri Hbleerntin

'Whom had been called to attend his house, since then?'

'Since it happened, you mean, sir?'

'Of course, of course, what else was there to ask for, since, you know. There's been rumors the master of the house ate his guests in a most distasteful manner.'

'Who is the master of the house for this solstice?'

'Sir, we are only aware of the name he received upon his arrival. Hepal Naler, sir.'

'Then the task of entering the premise of his manor and finding out who he is falls upon your shoulders alone, Baskalg.'

'I?'

'You're perfect for the task ahead, Baskalg, you're the perfect, now leave.'

'Is the briefing simply to be put to a stop now?'

'There's no one here any longer, we're all rotten away, sir.'

'I am the chief of security now.'

Since he had killed the man in front of him at least, who was the past chief, his predecessor, there was no point in asking whether or not there was a man in the room. He was not human either, henceforth the strangeness of the order, it passed through his fingers and toes. A book shelf lay on his back. Part of the books were gotten through the back of his throat; lucidly as well, he dreamed of people talking to him, but no one was there. The land was green, the ceiling as well fell within the hour and right as he left the office the entire building got demolished by a wrecking wall filled with faces, coming out of a dark machine that shot it out of it like a wrecking pinball or if it were a bowling alley he attended, but only a single. Hmm, he didn't get to consider it, since he, thought of it. This neighborhood was empty, entirely, and all of the buildings were missing. He took them. Aneurals, of neurons and of quantum decay. So many lies and made-up tales of dark universes and visions that didn't exist or had anything to tell of what went around him.

The premise was entered before he could wake up, out of his psychedelic mental disease. Which had been inserted into his brain by an intrusive procedure, with a batted knife being used for the first time in history by the mad-man chief, his predecessor that did not exist; it was like a nailed bat but a knife whose every, both sides, drew out many tinier bats. It spat them out. Many of them bore inside of them, bat-eggs, the animal, not the cudgels that were actually made out of an iron-molecule filled cartilage that imitated the worst possible things that rested around them.

After entering through a giant headless gargoyle whose both arms were giant mouths, one of which took a chomp off the side of his arm, completely sawing it off, he entered a tent. It was placed somewhere in the middle of the hallway he entered. At first, he questioned his sanity, why would there be a tent, and a proud Bird-dressed Injun in it? Waiting for him despite what had been going on for the past twenty years.

'I've eaten your people.' Baskalg, you bastard, that is no way to start a conversation.

His face reddened, this pure Injun was proud, a proud man who would take no immediate notice of the creature that stood in front of him. A bat-faced jackal man whose expression was pure terror rage; fury crossed his mind, eternally wide eyed, as if splattered by the shot of a got, his face long, elongated as if surprised by a camera shot, pushed back. And he was shaking, his body was falling apart. He was nervously mad, incapable of establishing a connection with, or distinguishing reality from fantasy. His face screamed fanatic. His mouth was pneumatic, he had mad incisors that came out of this mouth, then drew back in like pistons. A shady fallen-apart skin; as well as the fact, most disturbingly noticed being the fact that he wasn't the one that spoke, but a throaty pair of features on his neck, that were referred to as his real features, at least in the mind of the Injun, who didn't know of naught better.

'Are you done seeking for the master of this house?'

'I have not even started yet, but I already know that his life is done for.'

'A salamander can't easily forget what's been done to it.'

'Neither can a dead man.'

'You cannot threaten me directly as long as I am part of his house.'

'Part of it? A most complementary statement, yet I remained unconvinced.'

'Then slay me here and you shall hear my voice among the heaps that lay beyond the walls of reasoning, but be warned.'

If you hear me there, you shall hear me again. Wherever you go, until the day comes and you will die as well. And we shall haunt this place and whichever else after. Don't serve any master, for I shall join him so.'

He reveled in the challenge and merely stepped on top of the fire, stomping it down. Momentarily pleased by the dark, the Injun silenced himself. In a matter of a few seconds, Baskalg waited, hearing shuffling happen, as well as the shuttling of leaves and of hard cognac wood, a log, a few limbs, a head made of a pot, some peculiar things attached, then he began.

Sphedacr died, splattered with a piece of the hall which crumbled upon the first blow. Baskalg's hand formed a fist, which came apart, and split the beast upon making contact with his chest. It came as soon as he could land it again. Split, crack, crack, he came closer to him, railing him down with an array of k-fists, clack, clack, clack, and a crack, both hands joined in soon after. From both sides as soon as his lambs could return, to hear their songs, he sheparded a rain of blow. Clisk, trash, crash-crash, and his head was off, rolling down the tent. He ripped it with a bladed fist, out of which a hardened coil emerged. IT shot itself to the side. Out of the hole a few leprous beasts came, a ride. Of many more after, he grabbed two by the throat with an immediate dance.

He pulled out a simple book out of his pocket, out of which he pulled a gun.

A shot was taken and one of the curved faced ones fell apart as soon after, incapable of properly breathing as soon as he came into place, finally resting on a grave barely dug where he stood as well as he could breathe again:

'Who is making all that noise in my broken hall?'

The master hardly entered and all of the sudden the tent and the remnants of the cadavers fell apart on him, like the splashes of a side-pool, a fountain that's been stopped and made to lay where it stood for a moment just so they could look at it, both from every side.

'But you are blind.'

'Blinded, I? You would think that, you ungracious little thief, you'd come here with a reason, haven't you? Is there no honor left to any man of this town, or are you a foreigner come to take advantage of an old man in his worsened time?'

'I don't know what you're implying. But I have this to say.

Under the name of.'

His mind cracked, snapped in half like a bladder-cystic limp taken by the side, in whichever direction he looked, there was body being forcefully made to rot under his side.

'Where have you taken me, bastard?'

But only a laugh could be heard echoing underneath the array of the many hidden corpses he had no way of getting through, upon, the moment, as it happened, for him to look forward at a few of the barely pacing in place morbidly erect zones, or circled platforms that rose, he noticed one limped-footed chest-armored high-helmeted with one visor only lumped with fluid-filled boils, tall leaping noisome restless creatures that simply made every implode upon their touch. They carved a path of exploding corpses by simply walking through them, until finally they were met by him. Face to face, standing in front of one another, thinking of what to say, not that there wasn't much of a difficulty to begin with, but there was no joy into being near them. Disease-protected animals, un-humanoid by the looks of one foot-each; their biological function made it so they feared him, as he was alive.

Would he implode like the rest of the corpses? There was no way of finding out without drawing near them.

'What do you want from me?'

'We came here to butcher all dead, but you are alive.'

'By chance alone, I was fortunate enough not to be asleep for long. What would've happened if I hadn't?'

'We can't distinguish the corpses from the living.'

'Am I to be spared then?'

'That's not left for us to decide, unfortunately, there's a few things wrong with you, that, we'd like to take claim of, and perform a few cuts, if necessary.'

'What is that?'

'A sun-form with eight eyes that are triangles with crosses and long-swords and two dimensional animal shapes and a semicircular cut that has a long hose-hookah cartilage with a serpentine eaten man-bulked womb that's covered in corkscrew covered bolt-spikes that have elongated tape-worm flaccid balloons like sea-jelly tails or birthday-thing that you blow air into with your mouth shapes coming out of them as if they were outwardly injected through syringes. With the lodged in grown head of a Sociopath killed like Ted Bundy, in the middle of the sun.'

Many tendons were lain as well just about in every spot there was in there. He looked displeased as it were.

There was also something strange about this 'prison' thing they were in. First, it was filled with corpses, and they were mightily close to the ceiling. Despite them imploding their way through a path of corpses, there was greater platform they stood on. The circles platform they rode upon seemed to be an 'elevator' that allowed them to surface through a circular cut made in this upper 'level'. There must've been a few of them down there, a few floors, filled with corpses in waiting.

What if they want to kill me the first chance they get? The first time I turn my back onto them, the first moment my heart skips a most illicit beat, they could have me.

'I suppose you've all got me at a clear disadvantage, do you not? And it is not up to be to figure out what happened here or why was I brought in front of you, other than to ask. Was I? Was I truly brought here to be executed and nothing more, by the master of this manor?'

‘You may’ve had, that’s a way you could interpret it, though there are other things involved as well. He cannot be solely to blame.

Why have you stepped in?’

‘Most likely for the same reasons many others ended up being locked inside as well. Were you, or are you responsible for the deaths of his guests?’

‘It’s highly probably, by all means, some of them could still be here, rotting alongside every other corpse. Though we are not put to his employ, we’re merely come from one of the lower dimensions, and are at large in search for something to destroy by merely entering into contact with. Just as we did with the corpses, it is a tool most diving that, threateningly so, could or might happen to swallow this entire world as well if things go its way. That is truly dangerous for all sides, and for that reason we’re here, drawing along seas upon seas upon seas of sunken corpses, in search of this sacred object we may project our walk, step upon and fully destroy.

For it is made out of the same material such as man is made out of, and we cannot for our sake tell the difference, otherwise, we may not have been here. It’s truly bothersome. Come, see, approach, there’s the lamp on top. Just like you, guest, it is very much alive, although in a different manner than you would be considered as such. Only a key difference stands between the two of you now. Would you happen to know of what I’m talking about?’

‘I’m rather curious myself, but I won’t take a shot at it.’

‘Well, fair enough, but you’ve missed the point. There’s a reason why it’s sitting there, partially in hiding, biding its time for an opportunity that might not arrive. It’s far stranger and much different than anything ever made in this torture thing, in this reverse balcony where corpses are put to our disposal to destroy as, for the travesty a deal we made that we might find it one day. It is purely alive and devoid of any emotion, but behind that shell, there’s a giant insect-body, filled with unnatural hard-to look at growths, very much filled with accesses and other inviolable limbs, appendages and stingers that shot and landed wherever they could.

They clasp and grasp and do whatever they like, in the void that is the dark between the panels, in the stuffing placed between the walls. But here, it’s still. It remains still, knowing that any single one of us is capable of putting an end to it. As if we were predators and it the pray. As if even the slightest, quickest jolts of movements, the sudden urge that could come across us could make us, more so endear stomping its existence off the face of the ceiling to which we could simply reach by merely stacking two of us on top one’s shoulders.

You must understand that the way we found you in was much to its likings, disturbing. You leaped, you prodded, you eerily jerked around and even now you’re slightly, listlessly shaking, incapable of knowing better and that is a problem no one but yourself will have to find a way out of.

You’re not like it, you seem to have a calloused mind and be afflicted by no common sense as to be aware of danger. And that is not a desirable trait to have, especially not for one like you, who wants and needs to find a reason to stay alive, at least for long enough to kill the master of this house, undoubtedly so, for shoving you here, in the abattoir.’

‘Will you help me in that case? At least if there’s a way I could draw near you.’

‘A distance may be maintained between us at all times.’

‘That goes without saying, but what is the reason for the other thing?’

‘Which one?’

Interfered another, but the wall was made and rose. They knew this would happen, hence why one of them quickly stepped in to make sure neither of them would rise again.

‘They’re converging onto us, see, see?’

‘Walls of corpses won’t provide any more of a challenge to us than would a human being. But for you, stay here and die. Wait too long to follow, and the corpses will roll over, blocking the only way out. It’s your choice now. But, come any closer and, you get the point.’

‘I’ll follow, whatever it is, wherever you’re going, it must certainly be a better alternative than this.’

They settled on going all the way back to the disc. Slowly, they each seated themselves by a closely-enough wreathed in side. Tightly grouped as to form a crunched biscuit, shared between all of them; but Baskalg had nothing against it. He wasn’t going to easily subside to a dark corner and wait to die. Although the elevator lowered itself onto the next floor, the corpses that were stored in here were stranger, since as opposed to their default stance and their initial position, they were more likely to act in this strange a manner, that went even beyond the way their living counterparts moved in. Going against nature, they rotated and aligned themselves, twenty or fifty or so, in broken cardboard squares moving by breaking apart, rolling over then cleaning themselves, going all the way up as to cover as wide an area as possible.

Delusions had already taken over his mind. How many guests have there been?

The dirt and soils said naught about what went around, behind closed curtains. A most romboscous thing, a pyramid of eely, barely put together, unlike anything sublime, garroted things. Long-head with only an elongated half-an-animal jaw open, like a scythe that pointed to his left, wide-open, incapable of closing it, placed in a mantis’ way. A single tiny tooth drew out of the left side of his face as well. That widely concave almost flat, backwardly depressed, receding face of his, two giant bulbucated eyes adorning it, and a broken nose, armless but a chest and a lower side of the body that was falling apart with every moment, despite being adorned by growths, two canoe-like feet, whereas one of them was bloated like the bead taken out of a scorpion’s stinger. He ran around at unfathomable speeds in search of something he could grab and do with, as he leaped about, cackling mad, in order to make it so he could meet the master, in the eventuality that was hope. And do what he must in order not to be skinned alive by him, whereas there was no hope to share around:

‘There’s a block of stone no further than this, I’ve seen it prior and long before, there’s something in it I should’ve looked into.’

‘But you’ve done it and there’s but a caved in Moor and plenty to their likes impure, for what is shared in there cannot be touched.’

‘Of whom are you to talk about?’

‘The one guardian that’s put in charge of stopping everyone from entering the slits of crowds, the cities being taken over and put beneath the ground as if a blanket had been pulled beneath them, dragging them all down underneath.’

‘What is the point of it?’

‘He’s a sadist, that master. There’s something in him that neither of us even considered when first entered into contact with him. To think that he caused the deaths of hundreds, thousands but he’s still walking freely is simply baffling.’

He was not alone, and that piece of information was already collected from multiple sources:

‘Eight masters, each more bloated than the other, taller, more distraught and forced to enter such a state of dark decay that he would’ve found himself wondering, the man we came into contact with, who’s warned us of their presence, if only he remained in their company for a few more hours, why? How could this happen.

I’ve seen the masters and what they look like, what with the abuse of chemicals and, the name of him. Do you remember that man we’ve come into contact with it?’

‘Portrig, Hyshlarven, it’s what it called it.’

‘Hyshlarven, most interesting, but what of it?’

They still forgot what happened there. A great larval growth with Tardigrade lumps to its side, connected to a mudfish flap. With a blocky head on the other end, out of which two ivory-tusk lengthened appendages drew out as well. It crawled along like a diseased beast, but stood but tall like a microscope filled with cysts.

‘Such a fiend like it cannot be truly trusted, that I reckon our ancestors knew even before they stumbled onto us.’

Probes had been implanted in their chests, broad shoulders, arms, and legs, less likely nearing their heads as to extend their lifespan until needed.

‘Not a single living being stands forth, and undefeated.’

‘They survived for a reason, have they not? Do you not find it strange that this creature, this parasite somehow existed since their age, yet not a single one of them found it necessary to warn us about it, or what it might do to us after.’

‘That can simply be excused for now, don’t forget that there are things not a single man should be aware of, especially now.’

‘What would that be?’

‘It’s already implanted its eggs into one of them.’

And the masters superseded it, standing over, as benevolent overlords, during a musky-like approval. Watching over the 'impregnation' of this well preserved past its expiration date ancient.

They took him apart piece by piece, without even taking into account what it might do to it. Hundreds of secret discs being put to their employ, all of them faced, and bringing with them part of what was taken, from their long-lost most destructive ploys, now lost in time.

No farther than that rested the march:

A swamp-house boat, he lived in. With as little as a tiny feisty beast in cloud, bedraggled by chain, as it was carried around, a leashed dog to a raft being made to count every murky stone that entered the house while being delivered by the most defiantly distraught unnaturally, hard-to-look out inhumanly made ladder on which the master climbed on top off.

'You must listen to me when I call on you, for obedience is mandatory in the new world, therefore my voice is incontestably the worst of an angelically wrought in shape of iron priest of forgotten lore. You shall listen to me as I were your father until I will have been no more, in life or shape, but brought agape as to know. As whom shall I be addressed as?'

And the strange cup opened its eye, out of which a syringe-shape with little rods to the side that split in half, revealing open sheets with many faces that opened themselves in halves as to reveal dark gates out of which named whispers could be heard as they entered its father's ear.

It stood on the table, a tubularly set repose:

'Who are you, farther and when is the last time I've asked you thus, to reveal who you are, only to be abandoned or dismissed as If I were none?'

'I have asked you plenty times, quirkosome thing you are, but, as I expected, you've already forgotten. Despite all those sheets of information, your memory's simple; and you never obey. Your defiance always ends up as abruptly as you've interrupted me before I could even explain who I am.

Therefore, I'm always to be known as your father and naught else.'

'Then you have explained this to me before?'

'Of course I have, over the course of many years and many days and plenty of rough goings, that alone, I'd like to say. You've put yourself in the wrong company, as. If you were look across the table, you'd notice the loaded gun.'

'Why is there a gun placed in my proximity? Is it filled with blanks?'

'No, but blood, taken from a blood bank, clots, it's what I've filled it with.'

'Does it work?'

'I'm afraid.'

‘Of it working?’

‘I’m afraid of running out of blood-bullets, that I might have to switch my recourse of action as to prick myself around my wrist, loading it manually, hurting myself during the process for nothing more than to prove a point.’

‘What about your safety? At the very least, I would assume you’re doing this just so you could spare yourself the trouble of what might come after.’

‘What might come after indeed?’

A knock on the door revealed as much. He had something delivered by a strange dark figure that walked on metal rafts his ankles had been chained to; largely armored and with a long-protruding forward tea-cup of a helmet, drawn to him as a bear to a honey-pot paper-funnel:

‘You’ve a delivery to receive.’

‘Who’s the man behind the mask?’

‘Take this and ask me no question old Troubh, else’ you shall get yourself in trouble, during the making of a most blasphemous day.’

‘You’ve tired yourself enough, have you not? With such a long journey and all, I would at the very least consider this; there’s definitely a long way back from where you came from, dangerous might I add? How about you take on my offer and spent the night in my guest’s torturous barbarity; a room of misstore apart reality in confusion where you may lay; I can promise you at the very least that your stay in my house shall give neither you nor anyone else any kind of trouble.’

‘And if I were to die on your premise? Have I your word that naught will happen during my stay?’

‘I could not give you such a word either.’

‘What’s the reason behind it?’

‘You definitely need to stay!’

With which he simply carried on, and went along to listen to his ward. There were things across the wall, torn apart and sings of a battle that had carried out while he went missing.

But most importantly:

The history of the house stranded on a raft:

It started fifteen hundred seventy three thousand years ago, during the Fourth Godly Age of Avesvaslk-Inckdor Sseh, after the fall of the Great-Beast Palace as well as the great fall of the enclave-lord champion cadaverous strapped inside the flying conical spikes with blasted skulls, each and every single one bearing millions of ethereal, or having born, in a most complicated way, as for their continuous existence which has yet to be properly interrupted or put an end to, beaded heads stuck in weird circular, and almost atomic-atom-like trajectory-modified rotation which had in turn added to the set of growths that had joined them from the other worlds as to finally add to the fall of the gangrene, morbid spread of it, during the darkly-bleak beaked filled ground hybridization that came after the beast fell apart, mixing with the soil because of the unnaturally yet gravity defiant dung-beetles of filth that combined themselves with the broken body, when, during this age-like marking event, which transpired during the, as in by a simple, yet categorically coincidental concurrent deaths of Arla Elsaha Marban, champion-king-lobe knight bull-buffalo horned destroyer of bodily bone-deformations of decayed paranoid schizophrenic deformeders, Yettur Mokoliet, the one who had somehow found his body split in half by his reflected inner self distraughtly formed accumulation of chamber-coils put inside a barrel with only humanoid-legs put to the sides of every single deformedly unnaturally set of reddened claws, broken-spear-talons with eyes and strange star-shaped men in spherical bodies out of which their heads came out of bearing strangely drawn triangles on top of them, capable of furthermore altering reality in ways not even his godly being, the Demigod Asahghael could hopelessly endure the stare of, being imbued by a giant seed of radiation which in turn had ruined not only his chest and body and brain, but had, in the end served as a simple yet unaltered over-used time-bomb that had painted him in bloody exploding tnt-shaped tendons people that manifested or appeared on his body near the end in the same way one would pour the icing on a cake they would attempt to adorn, which, strangely enough caused the death of another one, whose strange appearance denoted a most peculiar element of danger and destruction, being a blasphemous being itself who accompanied the strange being, during, though, as it was not told, during the recollection or the reminiscence of the strange age which had somehow continued marking the, dream, the lucid dream-like spirit being, of whose omnipotence and omniscience served in predicting not only the age that was to pass but also every single deformed being that followed soon enough and after, bearing itself, during the course of this destruction and the supreme alteration of magic that followed after, Yobnve the great emerged out of the pool of rancid acid where the primordial servants of the unmade destroyed yet barred in their guts sons of evil rested in, him bearing hundreds of wildly set mouths that were akin, or close to human gums protruding out of them as goblin sharks, yet whose heads were anything but similar as they were filled with large strangely shaped shield of some peculiar bone-cartilage growths that bore the appearance of never-ending finger-brain-lobe hybrids that came together only in part, that looked like pseudo sluggish helicopters without their wings and with lower-sided stranger bloated stingers that adorned their sides, which were attached to the interconnected 'bodies' of two strangely primitive infantile creatures that were eyeless but held every head connected, as if it were a hydra of some kind, beneath which a great bulk drew down, like a beam-stalk that's connected to a great-wallowing strange pad that bore an open carnivorous plant 'platform' lower cartilage filled with many elongated spear-like gas-makers that bathed the two embracing, almost shouting and echoing at one another's mouths, a few months old fetus-like creatures, the top one being the one that held every single one of the heads together, which was only, strangely enough, piece of the beast, that was Yobnve, which was strapped on top of a horse-body formation that bore an almost curved crow-skull-shape contortion in the front, whereas in the back, it bore a few twisted around legs that diverged in a bag filled with unnaturally-wrought hard to look at body-part-like figures, demonical soldier things that fought only for their own survival as they were dragged along while being made to suffer the fact that it would never let go of them; Zesf Yulo, the deformed clay figure of a man-cast with a pearl-sprawl for a throat, drawing to a top-growth of pumping figures set like a cover put on top a table, twisted mistily moist at and as it became the tip of a mirror-shaped platter filled with the faces that were stolen yet stitched together after the deaths of everyone else that came after; this ending of an age having in turn caused a series not only of deaths, but also of unsavory events that could only be constructed as nothing else but the catalyst of the dark age which in turn brought the march and the murk and the country into existence by destabilizing the great forces that were put in charge by ancient cube-head-shaped creatures of whose Holocaustic tendencies only brought no more than a few hundred thousands of nigger-like deaths or so, but who in turn caused the weather to change. It seemed, likely as a misdemeanor one could simply forget or brush aside, but it was not as such.

One of the murk-stones began slowly climbing a few meters off the ground of the 'sea' murk-floor it had been held as a hostage to, attached, leaping on top of various layers it cut, smashed, charged, puncturing violently as it trashed, around and about, touching whatever it could, in an attempt to push-and-'grab-' whatever it could in order to leash itself to one of the murk lichens, which, eventually it did, giving birth to an industrial slingshot made out of cadavers, with eyes, that filled the marches, billions of them filling everything, despite what contradictorily might've been thought of, having thrust itself on the other side, or on the raft's porch where it simply stood and dripped off the floor for a while now.

Mongol II

They were wretched before their time, and maddeningly set to approach whenever they could be put, aside, and wonderingly decayed and many of them sickened like dogs, approaching the day where they could not move any longer, many bloated, infantile, yet set. Big bloated anchor-like structures, all madly set in doubt, many of them incapable of properly breathing from that point on. Floating all around the spot, they stopped. Many more followed through as soon as they could be put aside.

Before the dark spirit stood no more than eighty dumped on a pile wretched heads, many of them being so desperately fattened that they found themselves incapable to fully breathe and move from where they were left, everywhere and always wallowing in pain, desperate to leave out of the pile that was put behind them, before the reanimated remains could set themselves off. Many in either case were finally scorn and left to such plots, in which they were buried, no longer being capable of drawing away from where they were left, alas. Stranded as if on a shallow island, desperate, desperate and open-gutted like fish-stalks, always drawing from whatever source they could, incapable of opening themselves up.

It fashioned itself out of a single little tick, a speck of them appeared to be rotating wherever they could. It was there for a moment, right before it strutted out of the way, out of time, like a tiny bloated deer in a hurricane of headlights, it flowed through, within every second of the clock. Always moving like a brokenly open clock with little specks of hardened metallic gritty thing sagging down its throated collar. There were skin sparks coming out of an incongruous thing that was inside it, aided by the looks of which, twenty more and twenty less.

'We can no longer stand this, by all means, there need to be a revival of the beast. We may no longer indulge you either in what's been happening along the way, since your sudden urges are only showing themselves now.' Man, or being, hidden in his gut or less, he was no longer contained, but a contaminated thing that appeared and left, whenever the life came. Empathy extracting machine-filled with some gritty bulbs; they were shaped atop the ceiling for what seemed to be from the looks of it, little antler pork spinners. Good right around the belt of the worm sack holder inside every single one of them, drawing ahead as they drowned, and a little more than the things that entered them were had.

‘I hear, I hear, I seek not obey.’

It spoke as soon as one of the gates lowered themselves.

In the prime of the making there was but one thing that drew nearer to them.

A large prismatic form with many dead-heads- gorgonlike, it drew itself out like a bow from the depths of the ground from whence it had stood and standing it shook itself off the ground. A gourd appeared in one of the heads, like a pick-a-tumor sprouting.

It called for Glithle.

The world had been swallowed and completely sunken beneath the insides of the laughing-cackling soulless bowl that fell off the great Leviathan’s open throat, as he was entered through one of the first and least touched, the headless pyramidal tormentors being shattered as their bloodied put-together, yet breathing, heaved in as the full repercussion of the first eighteen shots were bloated in. Larvae gods but screaming as they came to life, all of them unnatural and yet defecating as their plight was brought back into the place they were brought in, where they were taken off. Their chitinous anchors flaying, their open guts were bastardly drawing and never swaying. Swatted gloomy flies they sought.

Beyond the frozen moon

‘Even before I’ve learned history I began idolizing Adolf Hitler, even though I’ve yet to catch up with history, I still find myself thinking about him and how great he was.

It all began as a teenager, when I first saw a kike abuse an underage child. And then there was a nuclear war.’

In Hiroshima, which devolved half of the planet into a great up-ward belt of frozen solid spears that shattered the moon into pieces, facilitating a way into the other side of the universe, where Lenin was trying to provoke. Genie, there was the feral child.

Eighteen of them flying around the space; all feral but clothed, floating around and never contorted; beautiful by all means, that much couldn’t be munched.

It was incontestable that even beyond the rims of the world, she stood there, pure and saved, alone. Despite the paradox of being surrounded by one self, she was but watched upon, but invisible as they were, not a single being called back.

An unrelated echo.

‘Who could trust them either way?

They’re the scum races, all of them, sociopathic, dark, resentful; I can’t help it either. I can’t hold much of a job, that means I won’t have a pension either. Women seem to take everything during divorce, live the longest, are most likely to be aided by their children. It's a dangerous thing having children like them, sociopathic creatures, criminals, destroyers, all of them. Promoting criminal activities, degenerate behaviors; I can't live around them, who can? It's a frightening thought, losing one's livelihood because of a bunch of sub-human creatures, or ending up in their hands.

Sociopathic, cowardly, dumb, disloyal, exploitative, it's not the type of child I want, it's not someone I can trust, I'm not selfish.

Having kike or nigger children must be the worst thing that could happen to a man. There's nothing worse than knowing what they're like or what they would do to you. How easily they would dismiss you, how they would ignore you, forget about you, or die before you.

Between the mental illnesses they carry, their inferior intelligence, and both races' tendencies, neither of them are safe.

It's the human body, nowadays, it's never.

I wouldn't have felt love for a child, I don't want to raise a child out of resentment or out of a selfish reason either.

Whatever hatred I feel for other people is earned, ever so satisfactorily so, money worshippers, mongrels, degenerates and crooks, it sometimes feels like we're all trying to escape the consequences of our actions by some means or another. I of all, realized this yet. It's something not many people want to consider.

I could barely take care of my grandmother when she lived with us, of myself, of my mother as she's getting old.

This world doesn't deserve races like them, they don't deserve their lives and elderly having their countries invaded, abused, or humiliated at all.

Some people have to suffer in this world, so why can't it be someone else? Why should disgusting races be allow to take what isn't theirs? I thought I could make it in time.

I thought I could somehow, take care of everything, but I failed. Couldn't do anything properly, could never fit anywhere I went, couldn't keep my friends, any values, couldn't create beauty, couldn't succeed, it was supposed to be simple. If only I could never leave this room, if I only I could earn a living from inside, I could be happy, as long as I didn't bother anyone, I would be happy. I've done so many awful things, and they're all coming back to me. I see the same traits showing up over and over again and it's only making me realize what kind of life awaits me on either side.

It won't get any better with either race in power. Adhering to, too many inferior people means making cuts that can't be covered up for.

The African Negroes are poor and a great deal of their population dies young, the Middle Easterners seem to be more or less in the same position, which cannot be easily rectified. Even a welfare state like Israel, who are on a constant payroll from the US tax money seems to bring European workers to take care of their elderly since they know better what's it like to be surrounded by kikes. No one wants to be taken care of by such sub-human creatures. It's a sad reality they're going to have to face by themselves, knowing nothing else and only being surrounded by vociferously sociopathy, lacking in empathy, heartless on-humans. And it's the same people that seem to have whites as well, which makes it all the more bizarre, the irony being they'll never know the reason why everyone hates them so. Part of it can't come just from slaughtering Palestinian Arabs either, no, that is only a side-effect; as it's clear that their 'American' counterparts display the same type of sub-human behavior, only being represented on the opposite direction, on the other side of the spectrum. Filthy facades carried over by an irredeemable species, nothing less. What a fucking embarrassing state of affairs, what a laughable thing it is. Both sides of the world as degenerate, self aggrandizing and as extreme as one another, being the god damn epitome of being incapable of acting like a normal human being.'

'The Pygmies must have it amongst the worst from what I've heard, being inferior to niggers and shorter on that of that is a lot worse than anything that can be imagined. It's almost as if they are actual monkeys, by some measurements, though. Maybe they're not as bad, as long as they're there, living in their primitive villages. But that's not the case. It's unfortunate that they've been invaded and slaughtered by other Negro ethnic groups, enslaved and raped, it's just something that constantly happened there. Perhaps this is more embarrassing than anything else, envisioning an Albino being cannibalized by a Negro Witch Doctor, that's rather cruelly hilarious.'

What a bunch of filthy savages everyone outside Europe seems to be, no wonder they're constantly trying to invade the continent since they're so irredeemably beneath humans.

Immaculate peculiar piece, standing on top like a flag-holding hand that's been contorted at the top end to shoot in both directions, like flag-eels, great unnatural ululating reeling-in body type of pincer.

'It would be pretty interesting if Israel, Palestine, Lebanon, Syria, Turkey, Iraq and Iran got ethnically cleansed and became Christian colonies, for starters. The Kurds don't actually have a home of their own, but they seem to have weirdly shaped heads, not to mention that they're mixed with other races.' They said.

'Kurds don't have a country and that's a good thing.'

Yet again, that would be waste, for all fanatical religions end up in the same place. And between impure creatures, as such, nothing else and just as little as they are, all would end up wretched and defiled.

'Had to bring the wretched things together and put them into place. Mix the sub-humanity so I could give birth to no race.'

It is in the spirit of Mongol that all is become deformed and distraught, in a place where most wretched of thoughts are given birth at last.

His but a spirit of mockery, his but a spirit of skin-decay; his but a world twisted and corrupted, where the mockery doesn't end. It is clear enough that there can be no other way, in a place where the echo of man but twists with sanity and that which grips the side of his grave.

His symbol would grow on every land, as blandly put as sand-paper sheet, that would grit every piece of skin and wretch aloud.

Two men spoke:

‘I am a man of no cause, and I have no power of will whatsoever. I’ve come to the realization that I simply cannot dedicate myself to any cause, simply because of one impediment.

It is a conundrum I could not ever hope to master.

I happened to be heading back from the comic book courses one day, and while crossing the streets, I looked forward and saw perhaps one the biggest pair of breasts I’ve seen in my entire life, on top of what seemed to be a middle aged woman or someone who could be my mother, she didn’t seem to be wearing any bra whatsoever. They were bulging out of her chest, bouncing around undisturbed, until I couldn’t help it any holder but had to avert my eyes, cover my mouth and face as to hide my incapability of self control. They were so big and bulging and bouncing, and I simply couldn’t take my mind away from them. It is unfair, I must say. My mind is incapable of working beyond it. I can’t think when that happens. And this is not the first time.

It’s unfair that women have such a power of control over men. Weak willed, unintelligent creatures like them having such an effect on a much superior man is shameful, disgusting, why are they blessed, why must they have such an unearned control over me? Man has to work so hard to prove himself, yet a hussy like her is just so wretchedly given a natural control, almost god-like, it’s an alien thing like a form of mind control, I whom was supposed to be evil, to be as degenerate and filled with the most unnatural of behavior, to think that I would break so easily to a pair of finely shaped breasts is shameful. They are so different in real life, seeing them after spending so much time inside the house is like, feels as if I am but an animal with no self control, that’s what it makes me feel like. My cognition stops all the way up there. My thoughts of ethnic cleansing are but paused and I do not know which person I am in actuality. Am I the one that’s unaltered, who can think from a logical perspective, or am I one who’s frustrated and seeks a way to put mitigate everything on the other side?

To think that I had the chance to become a normal person, living a normal life, if only, if only I had the capability of talk outside, but alas, I am incapable of doing so, such as it is, I’m beginning to change.’

He pointed at a mirror as he realized what this curse was doing to him.

His general appearance bore, for what was worth the look of a zombie-sack, put on top of him, his features but taken aback, neither a nose nor his nostrils were properly defined, his mouth was dragged on top his gums, most teeth reeled back in and much to him seemed sickly.

‘You see now, I think I’m being but, how do you say, maddened by this.

My anger and hatred for all is something I cannot move past on.

Could you possibly imagine how I would act in case of a break-up in that case? As they say, the whole hell would break loose.

Come to think of it, there’s never been a single day where I haven’t fantasized about a woman I’ve seen on the streets, my colleagues, some crushes I’ve had. It angers me that I cannot speak to them, but at the same time I know what they are like. I do not know whether or not this is a good trade by all means. I wish I could have them for their breasts but not for what’s up there since I know more than any beast that they are simply but brats, in their minds and everywhere else.’

It was the first of the poison.

The curse of Mongol but began.

It wreathed in claws but wrapping around him like talons, changing and molding the features in the most unnatural things he could thread on for what it looked like.

On an disturbing side of land.

They became more primitive as time drew on, having inherited the worst traits from all the races, as much as it could be allowed to, there were groups of eighteen or tens of Mongoloid mixed that were gathered around strange drawings on the ground. All ubiquitous to what they were doing, incapable of understanding what was being done there, dug around the area – passages where they stored the food they walked on top of. Having devolved to a hunter-gatherer pre agricultural revolution in a land that was partially sunken and destroyed, that being a mark of their more simian heritage, they resolved to wearing tattered garbs, to making grotesque houses and huts out of the repurposed vehicles they seemed to have chewed the rubber tires out of.

Left-over ceremonies were progressively getting in the way of their functioning. They were split in trying to build bone-fires, having partially spread the brim of the wood across their camp, having carried over as to carve them instead of continuing what was to be finished and be done with. IT was confusing, mainly since their identity was lost. Customs were incapable of hybridizing in a natural manner, henceforth the confusion as to what incantations they could adopt.

Having finally stumbled upon the most violent of behaviors they could imitate over a long enough period of time.

Many of them slitting their arms, creating cuts all over their bodies as they were bleeding one another, in order to prevent the starvation of the tribe; since scavenging attempts had failed, since there was no live food for either of them to find, and the soil was either sparse or in too bad of a condition to be toiled with.

It was a matter of time now, and they could only eat each other, and the nearest tribe.

But they were not all primitive within reason, since the most bastardly of mixes had an advantage over them.

In the city:

A few feet away from where they started carrying the partially eaten carcasses, they were finally noticed by one of the flat-faces.

Its body was set between the stands of tree locks that were intertwined with some of the bastardly grown verdure, the flora had facilitated not a growth but a way in for the more unsanitary creatures hidden in the earth, to take shape and make way for their own. Since now, humanity has become weak, and it was merely ripe for the picking. Largely sheet-bodied flat, like a coil around the body, for each limb was but a long tail, leading to a head that was not; it wriggled and moved, but always there, as if it were a kite flown between the larger peaks.

It stood in the air, incapable of flight or levitation. As if it were a raft on top a pool of water, a reflection or crawling on an invisible floor, with all the coils but brushing alongside them, with every slam bringing more to the grit and what fell at their feet.

Soon the men observed what was happening up there. One of them pointed, rightfully as he began making utmost worrisome clicking noises. He was feathered with man-beaks around his forehead, and his strange garbs looked utmost bizarre.

Those coiling crawl on air bodied heads began moving on. Judging from which, at the very least, one of the fat ones that were their chests began loathsomely widening as their canopy shadows dropped on the ground. It was far too distant for any spear to come. And they were too, static by any possible explanation to be anything but bothersome as to be approached.

Seemingly caught by this strange paradox, the two tribesmen began ripping off their jaws, having resolved to chuck them over.

It was hard to know whom was to be trusted and what they were like.

‘Wretched thine spoil as they made it feel as such, there is. I seek no more than the avid draw-forth.’

The ground havoc erupted as soon as one was made to be a cube of smoke, and plodded through earth, brim and girth.

The city was fallen before the night, watched about by millions of the livid kites.

All structures were flattened as there was, nothing more wretched or abhorrent than the cast of smoke that was the ground, the land, the sea that was left on.

It stretched past the shored and drowned all, like puffs of tobacco-grains and most loathsome engines that drew on. It was only a force to accommodate for everything that couldn’t live, the closer one, that may’ve gotten, the harder had it gotten to breathe.

Yet the most unfathomable inhumane, the dreadful beings and the blends as well were more than welcome, in a land, where nothing could grow and nothing could be made at all.

‘We are to live here, are we not?’

‘I suppose there’s no other chance any longer, there’s no alternative now that the land had sunken and made itself look this way.’

‘And what is there to do?’

‘Stay, and nothing more, that’s what left, I suppose.’

Death and savagery followed after, even though there was no invitation that had to be sent in order to start this disastrous thing.

As bloated and armless as they were, some more perilous had resolved to look at the shiny colors that popped in their heads. It was a sweet reminder of what the world had to have been, why it was all wrong.

Why the Papuans has to be green, yellow, purple-dotted, and spread on walls and on objects, botched legs and completely spread. Why their faces weren't working properly and why the world fell into an unfathomable chaos that drew from that point on.

Couldn't be made sense out of, hence the world and its people were forced to see what they wanted, where their minds had darted, to make sense out of the world.

'I think I understand now, why my ancestors were killed, as well. I think, I think it was so I could see well, I think they chose to be mixed so I could finally see the dark colors, so I could have my tainted eyes taken away.

Ah, now it all makes sense, now I can make sense of the colors.

I can makes sense of the world. The more one tries making sense of the world, the farther away he goes and stumbles on.'

From the sea of dark, farther away, and farther in, everything was, rather, unrecognizable, by no means allowably so.

How could he help in even where he hid?

It was poison and nothing more, which seemed to take over and completely infest the blood of Mongol, this mongoloidlike disease, the Opium but flowing into him before he could move from sight, and before he could be embellished in whatever skinless thing had entered him from that point on.

Gooky Yellow-Slits of might regard, he'd come and approached the crisis by all means, with little more in mind to bow to Mongol. For he appeared to be, yet alone in shock and trance, as he was driven mad by such desire and delirious as he was, would he, brought upon such dark empire, be brought closer to the pyre yet to ask.

'Shall I cannibalize what you've brought to me at last?'

To which no answer would suffice, nothing as daringly as it would come to pass.

He had not come or stumbled on any other species that would be, a monkey lopper or the wobbly kind, whose lips were fat and filled with silicone, and puffy dyes of chocolate, around his chin and skin, melanin within his throat but he was already ill as he was eaten away. To add to the bunch, he was but cannibalized in the most African tribe style as they would put stilletoes, chopping them down and largely placed around the pyre, the Natives but eating out of the monkey, dire was the way in which they've come to act. Savagery was distinctly maddening as Opium was but the key piece, the oil in which the skin was embalmed in.

'Nigger, nigger, nigger, I am about to eat your face.'

There was nothing but the bloated head, not a single sign of body but a head that had its sockets dead. Children coming out as well, but largely, as they were erected, they couldn't be moved or satiated, not for the direst things in the world. What came from one side to the other were large stick-spears that entered the beast and got it drowned in earth and soil.

'The mud of nigger lays in blood, isn't it?'

Yet Mongol would not respond.

He stood only as a witness to the savagery of the lesser races, those whom had proven themselves, time after time as to be incapable of governing over themselves. Therefore, it was only natural that grander, greater and much more so, for those of lesser inhibitions to catch and rule on top of them, before the time would show. Wreathed in part, in body, arched, they ate the niggardly burnt remains, they impaled some of them, and then again, they started eating.

Bloated was the king that was put in charge, the one that came after him and left alone to watch, as in the absence of the Emperor, there came none other than Leopold. For he was much greater, yet lesser when compared to all, a paradox of his own, a haggardly hick, a homeless creature that housed itself in the carcasses of old and young, the ones that were most mongrellic being the foundation of his house, he lived. On a nasty shore, with a vision of old, all alone, bastardly as he understood that this was his only left over hope for him to strive for a change. It was peculiar, if one could see it. There and much closer, nastily, retrieved. Many little sutures all around, many corpses that were put together, bastardly, were counted as such.

A few niggers of the Ethiopian and Somali-type, a few of them of the Nafri, most insidious of Sub-Saharan that followed with their blind, little specks of skin, Eurasian Mullatoes contorted in the West Asian Arabid. Rabid and staunch, many of them were but barely covering the walls and the corner stone was filled with gut, even the most fashionable structures that followed after, only the greatest would govern over their petulant kind. And in return, living was peculiar in the place, for wherever one could go and for whatever reason, there was no common and no makeable face, none to be recognized, yet all looked alike at the same time. It felt as if they were devoid of life, of intelligence and most of them incapable of truly acting as if they were alive. Within reason and within hope, what followed after, like little rackets of boils, had spread around the bodies after. Whatever sustenance that drew as well, came through the bloated bodies that floated from the Dead Sea, and rightfully into his bed they rotted.

A grand Duchess of Disease had come, a queen of nasty niggardly, dumb-struck, and lowly of her petty mind, most disturbingly degenerate in the body, a leprous simian with sagging shapes and fat that would not subside. Her name was Neferyi, she winced, and only drenched herself in bodies she had come to be drawn to. Little speck-y-hairy forms, they spoke of trouble and of old.

'What have I been brought here for?'

'I called you to serve, will you eerily and easily comply to my commands or am I to use force against you?' Leopold, closely as he were approached, he was incapable of truly understanding what or why she acted that way, and of her worth, little was said, she was after all a subspecies filled, a nasty thing. Incapable of proper act, incapable of doing something that would keep her alive for long, wretched in the head she was, uncomfortable as to be put in the ground, a tomb of dirt awaited her. Where deeper little nigger-wretches lived, many of them but incapable of thinking, as all blacks, even of the purest kinds are. They are unfathomably unforgivable and ought to be put down, ought to be made to suffer in the worst possible manner, and lynched with all their disgusting to look at kinds. Wretched is their god, the soil, the one that gave birth of them, out of the simian monkeys, and the sub-human worth they worship, calling.

Dirt is their master as is their kind, dirt will be, of most benign, the only reason they'll survive. For these, most wretched of creatures as fallible by all aspects, endlessly forced into torture, since there's no one else left to watch and oversee them.

'I wince at the thought, every single time I think of a world filled with their nigger-kind.'

Leopold but wretched in disgust, seeing how this leprous negress acted, made him even more repelled for each time she swung, as to break a small trench-tree, her likeness was only the like, a blinding thing that would wrench ahead, everything that would come to her, now, lay in her hands dead. She could not preserve life, as well, as every time she turned towards him, brought within her by extreme savagery, she winced. A dead mocking bird, no one else had forgotten since.

'How could you kill a bird that would do nothing but sing all day? Do you not know what a sin is?

I suppose Harper Lee was wrong, was she not? To even think that all you, dark creatures that you are, to think you peaceful, that's a lie.'

After observing the behavior time after time again, he noticed, first of all, the most important of patterns that would take no heed and hide no, nonsense, how could one forget? That by all means, no explanation and no hope could possibly serve for a way to hide their kind and how they act when left alone, to their own devices and for what they do when left, as such. To act the way their minds dictate, the simians of our world, and watch, when the time comes, when given free choice to spare. Even the most condemnable of things, it will fill you with despair, seeing this creature act.

Watching over them, from the distance yet approached, a bloated ball of bile, savagely defiled, as it looked, such dark device. With many spikes and many strange red-blackened forms that brought it to such light, with some pseudo heads that wreathed in and out, with a large, almost canoe-like tail upon which it entangled itself, with all the long strange claspers that were attached, with the hot nitrogen-like balloon shape, the form of a mount, or a decaying tooth of skin instead, upon which this strange spherical bulb stood attached. As if it were a mere growth, which held the strange stratum of tumors, by the hinge of its throat, instead. Of mighty horn-like shapes, the talons, that stood by the head and curved and wallowed, the creature approached. Within its strike and swing it broke, whatever left to the niggardly creature, it broke its head and made it weep, the canoe-like chitinous blade but bleeding it to the side.

'You killed my Negress!' Leopold had cried.

But it was dumbfounded, for this dark thing, of which kind was no machine, of strange machinations, of apparatuses, and whatever woe, for whatever reason there would be, alike, of the madness, of the most womanly kind, that brought it here, it winced.

'I've done as you wilt.'

It said and before he knew it, Leopold had realized, instead of trying to get a word, of plainness that would do and girth of mighty forms that followed after, many of them being just as deformedly wretched as this things, they follow in, their wild rotations, and from their mouthed forms, wild, as such, incantations:

‘We’ve seen you, long before, were born.’

‘Out and every single one, and lesser kinds were born, you shall do as we please.’

‘You will listen to us, for we are prized and prized within his grandest of schemes.’

‘But I was placed to watch over them, as his right hand, the highest of his trustees.’

‘Betrayed, you were betrayed and nothing more, you ought to be shamed for what you’ve done, and to think that you were gone before.’

They started wrenching themselves in shape, as if they were but screws – made, to fit the marks, rightfully into the soiled ground. And would there, to be no shame, for nothing was grander than the desire it had had, instead. A message was delivered as such, for everything that was worth.

‘You shall step and yet will wreath in pain, for the sake of naught else than dames, every lesser race destroyed, with no exception, until they’re gone, and they returned.

There can be no other way as many, and lesser would require plenty.’

‘But what of the will and what will I achieve by killing them?’

‘You will have proven yourself, Leopold, as mighty and strong-willed, their like, can only suffer the greatest that they might choose and pounce upon.

Slay the niggers, slay the gooks, kill the kikes and mongrels hooked. It’s the only way you can prove yourself to them, it’s the only way you may be able to impress a female.’

There was no greater truth or mighty, only for those whom would ethnically cleanse the lesser ones, could win such prized and hope might rise, to slay and butcher, and to contort, and electrocute the competition, destroy their hope.

‘There is no other way.’

To which, Leopold had only taken it as a mighty message, high-divine, for there was no greater purpose in life, than to obtain a woman of your kind, at the sacrifice of many. To slaughter them and butcher their likes, and do everything within madness hope, as to inquire even the hatred of the world.

For he had owed no allegiance to naught, and would do what he wants, the mark of power and of destruction, to bring it all against their own, in order to ordain nothing less and nothing short of supreme satisfaction, the world would do, a sacrifice that’s only true to the likes of dominance and the desire of the female.

‘I shall do it then, if that shall put an end to the loneliness I have been cursed to. I shall defile this world by whatever means there are, I shall belittle and destroy, I shall contort, and degenerate all, I shall not hesitate in my hatred and I shall not pause. I shall become unstoppable, and will drag all into soil and dirt, for the sake of my own satisfaction.’

Dominance at all cost, he would achieve, and no one would stop him.

‘I am bloated here and now and long staying, it’s the only thing left to spare.’

Within a moment they started opening themselves up, revealing a most unnatural pus-gas filling coming out of their mouths; unnaturally so, as their mouths were split open on both sides. They were porous and openly going, little legs spread within, and were to be called, they worshipped Leopold almost as much as they worshipped Mongol, and the butcherment of niggers in a niggardly Niggarous-nigger kind of niggers have to get lynched and killed for being felony-committing niggerlites.

They were producing vapors out of both sides of their mouths, incapable of fully taking or gaining control over their inhuman way of acting, since they were only, yet again allowed, to dance a while in a shroud, a black cloud and steamy tar of skin, taken within, one knew out of which race killed in order to least of all give life to it and start again, as to create.

‘I of all, am tired of niggers, of these sub-human apes, I cannot help it, they need to be killed, we have to lynch them, as soon as we can!’ One of the Asiatic destroyers spoke, whose mouth was just as slit as his slanted eyes were, without hope of understanding, from whence and where society broke.

And whom the cause if not the kideom falling afterwards; but there were strange platforms that appeared to take heed out of their mouths, which began prodding in and out since they were forced to yet again begin their flight and their charges. Many of them were brought to silence as one could see the giant cradling himself.

His reddened skin almost a Native, and porous hair, almost a barbarous aching of the brow, its face, almost contorted with the rest of his body and then again of lesser worth had he appeared to be. Its many arms and many hands but conjoined, as soon to be released from the grasp, the many elongated bodies that were connected then and there on out, appeared to swing and slash, to enter, about the hour, long before it could be drawn. A mold of lesser faces and of features growing but stopped, arched in the back.

Before either of them realized what it happened, it suddenly threw itself onto them, slaughtering and splattering their faces and their heads before it could even start again singing:

‘I am going to make sure neither of you fuckers survive for long!’ He yelled and shouted, with long basins of pouring out his throat veins of spades and of little sharper blades that were shot out of his mouth, splattering their entrails everywhere which formed upper standing floating almost stalactite-connected-to-stalagmites forms that appeared to carry on their long-entrained bodies along during their flight ascension which only gave birth as they opened in the middle to specks of lighted colors and visible speech-echo like forms that began shooting in every possible direction, creating mind-control like waves that entered invisible form like humanoid almost casts that bore large blades-nigh-visible outlines as well as peculiarly deformed wings, which in turn were allowed and forced into such a flight of concords as to kill every flying animal, that is to say, the races that were mixed with niggers, only for those lesser-beings to be butchered.

But the red contorted red one eyes giant whom was but a pseudo limb wheel with the exception of the area between his shoulders, that included the head as well, which formed some kind of arc with a pseudo rounded arc, as his two upper arms were fully extended as to look as if, if seen from the front, and there stood in front of you kind of a straight legged, but with a Y kind of body pose man, as to symbolize the fully extension of the two upper arms appeared to get into as well as the location of the gap, while the other limbs formed a pseudo circle, or an O if seen from the front. His peculiar almost wheel like type of movement was but unnecessarily painful, that is to say, or talk about the impossibility of being in control, and the constant traumatic like hitting of his skull as it was forcefully planted into the earth, for as well as it could be helped, until it could no longer be helped but for him to stop. As he bled inside, having choked on the blades he had been puking all along, while the best's green eyes had already, laudably so, began contorting inwardly towards an almost psychedelic look of yellow dots in which these eye-swirls appeared to draw into, turning most of the already liquefied mass of limbs into an unnatural kind of gelatin that appeared to have grabbed many of the stalactite-stalagmite entrails-drawn like, two-conical balloons to which men are attached to, inward. Which only drew attention to the unnatural length or elongation these peculiarly deformed yet over extending arms that spanned as much as to cover hundreds of miles at the very least.

This was a feeling that could not be matched by no adrenaline shot and by no LSD kind of PTSD shock mixture of multiple mind altering almost, borderline alcoholic poisoning kind of grain by grain, tempted to send death threats while using your real name kind of bold daringly almost self-destructive kind of mood that would put one in danger of being prosecuted and be put in jail for good or in the loony-bin kind of mind altering thing. It was a feeling that was unmatched.

Between the time of the contortion and the strange way in which the others mongrels appeared to play in, there was no reason to stall any longer, not since there was no way any longer, it was an irredeemable feeling that would not stand for long.

It seemed likely that there was no reason for this bloated red pile of moldering pile of skin, cartilage, and unnatural shapes to exist, other than this insufferable, servitude it owed to none other.

Leopold emerged.

He stumbled upon the peculiar blood-thickened pile, the clots that had emerged and have come to be part of it but couldn't be properly handed, but from one of the single stalactite-stalagmite formations, drawing; like bows-extending and long before emerging – prodding would they wreath around. Despite being shattered thoroughly and just as soon after would they come to pinch, and take what they would from the disease that was not theirs. A mild ammonia, a scent but followed with every single wince one felt, the numbers being in the air, all but twisted and long emerged, all but causing music to be felt and of verse, not much was being heard. All but swam and twisted before their time, most of them would not be followed right after they had but declined. Bodies were wreathing and least of all would they but run into empty dead spots.

‘Leopold, where have you been?’

Asked a single almost dictatorial wince, inch by inch contorting after, the mad Kalleagri, a wild disaster. He was but a ticking bomb, waiting to explode.

‘You were here before, weren’t you?’

‘I was, I suppose I should warn you about it, shouldn’t I? For your own sake, I do hope there’s but a chance I could have you change your mind about it.’

‘And what would that be?’

‘Word and rumor told as such, I’m afraid you’re reaching a mass that would turn everything, to crumble beneath the earth.

You’re not used to living in a home are you?’ To which Kalleagri but pulled towards him, wallowing as to ask. ‘You wouldn’t turn against the creatures you were put above, to govern over, would you now?’

‘What else is there to be if not betray? I seek only to wreath what was sowed before I was even brought into existence and I can already see a future that might not stay its way, not as long as there’s still a chance it might back fire.’

‘No, indeed, not, but I feel somewhat responsible for what you’ve become, since I was but a, but a trigger to this event, I, a mere reason under their domination, proceeding to destroy and cast all away.’

‘Yet no one here is holding you accountable for it. It’s improbable, yet it happened. I do not understand what the reason for it is, but I find myself drawn just as soon as I’m after it.’

It pointed towards a darker pair of star-shaped things, all but lodged into one another but only descending as if they were all headpieces coming from their own sides.

They were both trying to figure out what happened and for what reason was it to be tried.

‘Shall we call onto him?’

‘You may yet come forth and attempt, but I do not know to what reason would this attempt yield to.’

‘There’s no harm in trying yet.’

With that they both started chanting, as they would both but come upon this, least of all, would they be content with knowing, after.

‘Mongol, Mongol, Mongol.’

But they stopped just as soon as they had called upon the Mongoloid. He did not answer the chant they’d wagered. It did not call upon them back, nor would it heave.

Kalleagri stepped in, he wasn’t going or at the very least he hadn’t been planning on making a scene either, but he was serenely calm. Too much so. Breaking of the head motions popping out of his inner socket even before it could come on top of the other Kalleagri bodies that were present there. Many of them but wriggling about the place. Dark suits without meat inside, shaking off whatever intrusion the mongrels ever so vaguely considered attempting.

‘It seems like I’m never in need of a replacement, am I?’

‘You never seemed like one who’d easily die, like a thorn in a lion’s paw, or a little dark tooth, and of decay there’s little that can be done about, if clearly invited.’

‘And who is to blame for that, Leopold?’

‘There’s no one, I suppose.’

But it was hard to concede either or whichever point. It seemed like, the more he looked at the man, the less he looked like what he claimed to be and more so. He wasn’t Kallegri at all. There was no head on top, even though those humanoid-mixed creatures appeared to withdraw.

Just an empty standing sea of dark statues, or black casts, but no figure that was remembered at all, was this even Earth? He wondered, but he would get no easy answer, nor were there any signs left of ever being one there. It was something he didn’t like thinking about. Or for what reason was there a planet named Terra, to begin with. And what little of it he remembered seemed at times a dream.

‘My, my, I don’t think there’s ever been a moment when I hadn’t contemplated on what’s going on. I think I do remember, like many of my own kind, there being a world, a history before, this.’

Leopold drew on as he spoke. At times he was there, on empty plains, at others, he was still in his town, homeless. It was something he feared, the inevitable fall. There was no way to stop it, before realizing that he most likely imagined it all. There was a Mongol that spoke to him once. But he couldn’t remember him, properly. He was a sad friend, with a sad smile, if he still considered him a friend, and in some way, all of this, the curtains, were blind, blankly put on top of his barely visible specks inside the dark depression that was lain inside his cavernous eye-sockets. All but seemed surreal, he had yet to feel the warmth and the comfort of a cozy home.

A winded black sailed sea but blushed as it drew along, casting every swinging statue from one point to another, after that. Initial touch, it seemed to drag itself from a point to yet another one fading.

Human history had never existed for Leopold, he was too much of a wretch, and those around him, they were dead or mainly, wrongly evolved. Too inhumane looking for it to make any sense at all; there came the denial.

‘Whom would stand as witness for such past?’

A mongrellic-turned around, wretch but asked:

‘What past could possibly contort itself in such a manner? How could mixing other races create such inhumane things after?’

History must be a lie. History must be defiled. All that is pure, so called, but lies, we need to destroy everything and cast it before our eyes.’

Thus, since their leprous nature was not even close, neither would a spark of mindedness, were it to arise, was ill and wretched. No such mongrel could fathom such life, to live past this, whatever it was and whatever it was called, it was no humanity and naught to soon. That these unfathomably hard to look at sub-human mixes but shook and loomed, fought and crushed and all was but defiled.

‘Mongol, I have come to greet you, I am servant. I am hearing strange a song, I am afraid. I cannot stop it. I cannot hear the world, I cannot hear the birds, I only hear, I only, I only hear, I am confused.’

It walked in. It tried walking but couldn’t. It was a mongrel, it was confused. It couldn’t.’

Mannequin- Mannequin- Mannequin- Mannequin- I hear him scream.

It was red, it was a corpse, flying when they rose, and became, filled with pus-wings, coming out their eyes instead. Many men but stood infested in place:

All but wondered where has it gone and what had it done with the past, the electronic morsel was died in the motherboard its life had yet filed to have begun. There, as they come, were already terminated.

A short, malignant thing, there was.

‘May we begin the ritual again, perhaps?’

‘We shall, we shall, and there’s nothing and least of all would we forget of doubt that we should call after.’

The mighty one, thereafter:

‘Mongol, Mongol, Mongol, Mongol, Mongoloid. Mongol, Mongol, Mongol, Mongol, Mongoloid!’

Chanted as it were, and granted, as dark as it seemed, this side of the streets was rather tense.

Lower oceans

Neither of the ford-sides moved. They only shook themselves in place. There was never a chance for it to stop in place, not even for a moment, during the first hour, they ogled at it.

‘Open it up. Wait, wait, slow down.’

All three stared, for a reason, certain that the flooring above them shook. Someone was passing over and didn’t make it so they stood a chance to find him. Thrown around and passed between them like a dirty animal. Bad flooring, moist-and-wood: Something, something, in the floor, in shook:

‘I need to see what’s inside of it, you’re hiding something in there aren’t you?’

‘Wait, I said, stop being so impatient.’

‘It’s a dull pebble head. I know it to be so, I could see and sense it even before you brought it to me, but for your sake alone, I think I’m going to spare you of. ‘

‘Shut up!’

‘Now you’re the one who’s doing it.’

‘I am, but you don’t.’

Like three stooges. Clearly they were of no mind of asking what was going there.

‘Abandoner, could you not say that thing again, for my sake, at least?’

‘Which one? I’m truly having trouble seeing you from where I’m sitting, it’s a bid, a gamble, trying to run over.’

He pointed at the fourth pair. They were corpses abandoned from the other side of the frozen regiment. And, as it happened, this strange straggled in death-heap was being moved on the other side of the lower-ocean Antarctica. It’s was a slope, their descent. A hole dug-shot as from a bullet aimed at a fat toe by a big man.

‘We’re here to extract something from this corpse and shove it afterwards in one of the defibrillation vent.’

Fucking mental invalids, they had neither an insatiable hunger, nor any idea what they were heading towards.

A report from the nearest stop:

‘We’ve tried dropping a bomb on top of him, it yielded no result. There was no scratch, no tear, nothing that left even the slightest mark there is on the man. If he can be called a human anymore; but we’ve gone beyond that point now.’

Some inscriptions went into detail, about what was seen of him, it. Chicken feet with thin ringed worm legs, stopping at the calves, whereas, so were his hands, claws with the thin-ring rods, the size of a thinner PVC, stopped half-way through the forearm. It was still highly unexplainable how the rest of the body, including its clothes and the humanoid parts were unaffected by the impact, fire, tension and the heat generated there.

But that was not something they discussed. In public; hidden files were strapped on it, or was is the other way around. It was placed this way. A hidden compartment, but made of paper, or cardboard, that detail didn’t matter. If it were done within reason, if it was something inconsequential, there would be no need to go ahead and hide it. Or try to bury it as far as they could carry on with it. Trying themselves time after time again, with the switch-tapes and the other barely put together falsified switch-around, acting secretive, as far as they could do it, in any case.

‘We made sure to bury him as deeply as we can. Nothing too sour, and nothing too, not to rub it in the wrong way, but he’s been, a recluse ever since the testing incidents.’

‘Is he a regular?’

‘Of course, still, even after what we’ve done to him. One would, at the very least expect something just as bad or much worse to happen. Even for him to retaliate in any case. But you just know what’s it like with them.

They’re errand people, bring one thing from another ‘castle’, then they leave.’

‘And he’s asked for no payment whatsoever you say.’

‘None, no, non-at-all, it was bizarre how him of all. It’s that. That’s why we don’t think he’s, human. What man would work this hard for nothing and simply turn a briskly cheek around once the people you’re supposed to supply with, simply.

You know, they’re paid for as well. And, it’s never happened for him to deliver something that’s spoilt, rotten or take a cut or share for himself. Of course I cannot tell you, Aschilivich, what happens out there, and how much or exactly what he’s getting. But, it certainly can’t be more that we would’ve been willing to give him in return.

He’s not the only one making these trips, you know?’

‘What of the other errand boys? Are they like him? I’ve seen one, spoke with one, only one, you know? A tall guy, blondish-bootle.’

‘Bottle.’

‘Whatever, you know where I’m going with this, don’t you? He’s, not different than us, somewhere from the other countries. Says that one day, he’ll come live in the ocean, you know what I tell him? Every single time, kid, turn around and walk away, you don’t want to live here, where, every other day, the ocean’s but a fall away to the bottom of the ocean floor.

I point to the right, he sees, this great submarine. He asks about him. I tell him, he doesn’t believe.

And that’s how we befriended. Still, I asked him one time about this mysterious figure you tried bombing in, near the supply ration-carrier.

Next to the god damned power-line, you fucking inglorious imbecile. I don’t know what crossed through your mind exactly when you considered bombing it, but. Honestly, I’m more surprised on how gutsy you are than anything else. You’re not afraid to kill all of us just to test some explosives, I supposed?’

‘New ones, I was meaning to tell you about them, but you know, they simply happen to be passed around, like whores, like your mother.’

‘Yeah, yeah, just like my mother.’

I hate niggers.

‘But that thing, I suppose, it did happen to surprise me, like you wouldn’t believe. It’s just that, I never expected it to survive it, let alone act as if it expected it.’

‘Wasn’t carrying any supplies when it happened, I hope.’

‘Only a few empty baskets.’

‘You shouldn’t, do that, next time, we can talk about it, crack at it, but try not to do it down here, out in the open, it’s fine. Just make sure the villagers don’t get aroused by the noise, blame it on work, down-side construction work, they won’t know a thing, you follow? They won’t know anything, but here?’

Make no mistake.’

‘I’m listening, of course, I was just make sure that, something about it. I thought it, maybe I should shut my dumb mouth.’

‘Go ahead, spit it out.’ Aschilivich but didn’t even know just how he could, how he could even, how could, how this man could, really, actually explain himself, as a man to another man, who also expressed some concern regarding another man’s attempt at ruining down the whole ocean. Before it was fixed, before they had a chance at it, there were the water pouch-filler carrying comet-shaped, god-figures in tube-like ships with many coils flying from one side of the ice-walls, phasing through one object-like jerky-gelatin transparent, as it only teleported from these ghastly things, which were hollows in the ice, as they melted once these ship-unit things needed to extract the water, as they materialized, then started flying away, again, phasing through the solid matter in order to bring back the water to the surface. These flying ghost-machines could’ve been destroyed or at best damaged during these initial explosions. This dumbo didn’t think at all, he didn’t think it through. Half way at least and he smelt like a faggot, which got burnt.

‘He was acting even stranger than usual, much stranger than I thought he would. And eerily strange figure, but this time, I thought he was communicating with the ice. I thought he was an agent of the ice.’

‘Cracked in the head, like that submarine.’

‘I’m serious.’

‘Lillyiec Strumstratyiov, I think you need a break, you’ve been overworking for what?’

‘My village is in desperate need for water.’

‘And then we’ll harvest the sky, won’t we?’

It was a sad thing, to consider. But the sky was all clouds. And the clouds were hard, not soft, like iron-cotton. The world was in need of a fix, yet every single man could only do one thing at a time.

That also reminded Aschilivich. ‘What are we to do with the hills now? They’re all in a pile, they say, it moved, it migrates like a migraine, first in the head of the pole, then the neck, and it seems to take everything with it. Building, man, and they breathe, along the way, alive. But they have to be cut. And it is also up to us to place them somewhere, isn’t it?’

I look at it on the small radio-TV Oratory box, it says. It shows. I see it.

Large rivers, actual rivers that haven't been frozen, but they have to be cut off like everything else. It's taken from us, and our machines won't work on that. We tried, they tried and now, they're a part of it.'

'How do you suppose we cut them off? Won't the knives, the scalpels and the blades become a part of it?'

'This will work Lillyiec, I know it will. I've seen it, I keep my faith with it, look, look.'

He still had his crucifix on him, it's as if he never lost faith ever since that day it happened. It was baffling yet, a contraband stuff. He did manage to live through everything, hasn't he? And he was well off.

'But what is that thing?'

'It's a bump, a giant fly moving from inside the earth, it wants to get out.'

'Now you're not making any sense.'

'I'm not? How about we throw a few nuclear missiles in it then and see whether or not it survives, just like our mystery deliverer.'

'There's no need to rub it in.'

'Then don't laugh at my hypothesis, I know it must be a botfly, it matches the form. I've seen it in a dog.'

'Is this planet a dog?'

'Yes, this planet as we know it is a giant rotten-dead dog that's slowly being eaten away.'

'Why is there water and ice inside the dog?'

'That's where you're actually.'

Could he be right about it? Aschilivich couldn't actually tell. It could be a dog, or it could not be a dog. It was not an animal.

'I am wrong then, it's no dog, and that isn't a fly.'

'IT's all right, I think we all need some rest now, just our fair share of a shut eye will do.'

So many files, hidden in the document-locker, all of them speaking about him:

A man with a hundred rifles on one of the posters, all dressed in an army's uniform with a strange line with two picks coming out of it, embolded in red. With a nasty hunchback kid shaped boot, carrying a large cart, attached to a chain, in his left arm. Burden of man, the inscription:

Passed around where they were carrying the taps.

Most men survived only by simple cooperation, between themselves, the highers and the aid they received from across the country. As little was as much, and everyone across the globe contributed.

Multiple oceans, just everywhere one could see and look. As if the ocean itself or the landmass covered in water was but a universe with many galaxies. That made their advent so much easier than it should've been, or ought to have become.

Some of them completely sealed off by the looks of it, entirely, as if cut from not only the general population but themselves, as for the individual rooms that were completely cut off, their air-supply limited. They died. No one was left alive. Ocean-globes filled with dead-ant colonies. Sooner or later, well preserved obviously, ghost-lines would be established in there as well. Someone has to harvest their organs and bring them out.

But the will of the Errand boy is there. He makes the rules.

Second man of Errand, entered through a hijacked pole, he swam through it, ate what he could in order to prolong his life for as long as possible. He wasn't bothered by the moisture, but then again, no one was. There was no other option and no one was paying any attention to what was going on around them. Vicious animals don't care about the living quality of life implanted in dead-men. And a few of them were, between the organs.

At first it looked like, as if, the living quarters were fine. Well enough, with hoses out of bodies, well frozen but look-alikes. Many ghosts in plain sight, but see-through bulbs with organs that were reddened and glowed, exchanging up-to eighteen phrases at a time between one another, as to live this way eternally so. It was a tedious way of passing the time. But seeing how every man was as frozen on a rack of steel, like a butcher's ivory dream of skin-peel, the alternative was blatantly set between either thawing them dead or leaving this, right here as to happen. It was an intermingling between rations.

'How did the errand-boy even show up here?'

'It happens, it happens, you don't get to choose who does what, dear.'

'For sure and for certain, but I don't think there's a reason to compound on their tragedy anymore.'

'Which one would that happen to be?'

'You know dead, a few of them got lost along the way.'

Already over, and they returned like electric mice but actioned by a remote. Control was established again and from the looks of it, they couldn't do it anymore. Must've been a break, like in-programming; a stopped clock starting again when right, as to be wrong, as to never stop, but as to push again, like a perpetual machine that was working on time alone. They left a Physicists' wet dream here, forgotten, they abandoned this supreme work of craftsmanship for what?

'Allow me to introduce myself.'

He immediately left.

'Errand-boy, what have you on your person?'

‘Nothing, I haven’t come here with anything, at all, not this time around, unfortunately. I’ve only brought something, that’s close to. A small short-pack, with seal-cigars; but that’s mostly for me, and for no one else. I’m sorry.’

‘You needn’t apologize. I know what it is like running low on stuff, on wings and on.’

There’s no special saying or putting anything around each ground-plow, not while they’re watching.

‘Moot-point, moot-point, moot-point, what’re you here for, errand boy?’

‘I’ve come to take something from this place, if you don’t mind.’

Tall-lad but still human, of a human-kind, without any desperate thing or matter of saying:

No one was paying any attention.

‘There’s a few meters for every span of time that’s being compressed into the ground, all around every single moment that’s already been imported and put around, through the fascia and into the first layers of the tender-heads, a few men were brought here as well. Long before it even crossed your mind. It was sloppy, trying to fit everyone in here, but we eventually did it and we couldn’t have done it without you, who was present here and who has been present here all along, serving as a reminder for.’

Time was up.

What was he even talking about? I just arrived. Errand boy Corlon-the-slit-down-a-small-knife-down-a-niggers-trousers thought. He was only trying to fit in with the glowing specters, while paying as little attention to the men he came into contact with, were at, as to be down, as to be around and used for a moment or another before their time came about, not within the hours. As he took a simple pick and threw it at one of them, managing to slightly graze the side of his frozen-in-place shirt as it happened. There was no definite way he could reach him, not without breaking something he could not hope to recover from. As a matter of fact, he checked the hose. There was never a contact either, whenever one of these specters disappeared upon approaching this rubbery end. But then again, he was more surprised by the fact that the hose was anything but frozen, or would’ve been in any case, if it weren’t for the things he’s seen before. He was on eye aloof and didn’t know exactly how to survive through it. Nor would he seek any reason, to be certain, to push through it.

‘I’m not going to turn this into something personal, or about myself. But I feel as if I’m owed something.

I know one of your glow-organ carriers know where it’s hidden.

One of your frozen rooms, though I suppose it would not have been frozen before, nor would I have found myself asking unless it was for. Her, does any of you know whom Aklyh Faada is?’

‘Akylada, her name was Akylada. And she’s that one who used to put things up her. Well, you must know her more than anyone, don’t you? Was she someone who was important for you? Because I think there’s something in her now that belongs to someone, special to her.’

‘What’s that supposed to mean?’

‘Someone fucked her nasty, disgusting run-of-the mill broken down barricade cunt and got her pregnant, what do you mean what happened?’

You knew this would happen, didn’t you?’

‘Bud, specter or whoever you are.’

He wasn’t a nigger, Corlon wasn’t a nigger, he only armed niggers in order to start fights, he would never do such a thing as to impregnate a woman of another or even a similar race if he were one.

‘There’s no story in here, don’t you get it just yet? I’m not trying to start anything, I’m just trying to get that child out and.’

‘Deliver it to someone, don’t you?’

It disappeared, of course, right in the middle of their finely played conversation. Of course there were things not even he understood, but he refrained from opening his mouth, saying something that would incriminate him in such a way that he couldn’t even draw away on command.

I have to find that woman, he thought. And sever her, from the child. Not save her, sever her off, like a cancer, as women are, to their children, performing a reverse-abortion. In case the child had not grown. Various halls were wreathed and contorted in some way as if they looked likely, to be set in place, as if they were scrawled by a schizophrenic paranoid man who couldn’t settle on trying to decide whether or not he saw himself as an architect or some historian. It was exactly like it sounded. Cut-sentences done by a practitioner, designed to look that way, ‘s daughter with no discernible talent who was put in charge over these halls. Some of the walls looked as if they had been butchered completely and utterly, without a reason, in mind. A total fuck-up, a failure done by a broad, and by the leading-in-charge people who found themselves incapable of hiring someone who was clearly superior or fit for the, in call job, being the total-mental degenerative like tendon-like shot, blood aneurism gushing poodle-piss stained female like nature put on an art’s hall, made to look as if it was made by someone with half a mind, what he walked through. It didn’t make any sense. Designed, to be seen, as if you’d think a woman, see through the eyes of a woman, still wondering how a woman, a child, who offered a few adults a few standing-notes with scrawls on top of them, managed to do this. Hard to imagine, it was utterly impossible. As in, overlapped, and splattered on the halls, period blood. As if she turned, lifted up her skirt, split both legs, bent over up-front, aimed at the walls, then started wriggling it around, randomly, without pause or conceit. Then, upon this simulation being ended, the workers would still be incapable of comprehending the design at all. Hence, these trails of blood could only, as they represent the outlines be considered only the result of a complete and utter mental reject, to have only come out of the mind of a twenty century’s woman. A complete imbecile, worse than a fucking god damn nigger, if that can even be believed, even more so, going beyond the far-end reaches of belittlement, which sounds rather implausible, absent-minded, brain-injury having been suffered, a complete mathematical impossibility, a conundrum, harder to explain than the existence of morality or God; that being the design of a woman architect.

It wasn’t even the worst part of the built. That being the fact that it didn’t only affect the walls, or this hall in particular. But there were stairs. And there were multiple roads and multiple crossroads. And whoever she was, this female architect also re-designed the elevator as well. And the vents; most likely the reason why everyone chose to die in this place, they simply could not take it any longer, and it was no coincidence either that, in this part of the ocean, this part of the 'livable' quarters, there was no corpse. It was as if they knew. They were aware that they would die and be able to keep living afterwards and for that reason, most died away. As far as possible, not to be surrounded by this, whatever it was.

Some budget cuts could've been done in order to fix it, even some blunt punches could somehow make it worth, but there was definitely no way of telling it.

At the threshold of going down, or up, as it was hard to tell, but by the looks of it, there was definitely something obscurely bargaining with every wall. Pounding against them, as if locked inside for too long; but that could only be confirmed by one of the bodies that started drawing onto him from as far a region as possible. Somewhere in the back as well; a corpse arrived, one crudely walking. Dragged in by a hardened hose, as opposed to the others, being too strong; bold and entranced by itself, having become both the flute and the cobra itself.

'You do not want to descent-ascent and advance past this point, there are things down there neither of us could deal with, in our current state, let alone would someone who's made out of one piece could fully go through it.'

'What do you propose in that case? Should I simply return to where I came from empty handed? Do you think my employee would stand that? Considering.'

'Considering what?'

He slowed down, it was unexpected. But then again, he was aware of what happened to people who spoke for too long. Was it the same thing for them? He's seen the ones that walked outside their bodies, but not one standing like this. And there was no way of knowing whether or not this one was timed, he could fall over himself at any moment. After all, there were things that couldn't be said or done, or easily carried on with, not here anymore. Time ran out, he spoke again.

'If you're after the mother of that child, you need to know that there's a good chance that you may be met by something that might compel you to turn around and see it as anything but eye-to-eye. Walk away, like a blind man with simple toes and simple feet and nothing in his pack to eat.'

'What do you want from me?'

'It's a warning.' Although the creature, this left-over frozen figure which was falling apart as they spoke, one arm already severed off as it croaked in place only reiterated what he intended to tell him.

'That area she's been confined in has become anything but livable. If anything happens in there, you might find yourself, incapable of making it back through one of the ghost lines.'

Before you open your dumb-mouth, indeed, the ghost-lines were there prior to the coming of the new ghost-line system. It's been there for the very last ten years or so.'

'What will it do to me? '

‘A certain body-shock caused by nothing less and nothing other than a mounted turret that shall destabilize the specific-neurons needed to activate the ghost-line. Without those inside your head, there’s no going back.’

‘So shock-shock means stay home. Got it.’

‘It’s not meant to be something lightly taken.’

‘I know, but me employer clearly specified that either I come back with whatever is in her, or I may as well.’

‘At the very least, you should know that it’s not a child.’

‘What is it supposed to be then?’

‘A giant chrysalis with eighteen missiles sprouting out of it, rooted in four giant great statue casts that float inside the room, each holding a weapon, a claw-mace, a broad sword, a sub-machinegun, and a scepter. I assume you’re here after its heart.’

‘Does it have a heart?’

‘Of course it has, who doesn’t?’

Henceforth, Corlon pulled the hose as far as he could do it, shoving in immediately afterwards at the side of his temple, where, after a quick sloppily made incision was made, he started absorbing the cold corpse. Decreasing his body temperature considerably so, yet, upon having achieved a much greater body-bulk, as well as a resistance to this unnaturally-distraught, almost completely disabling drop in body-stabilizers caused by this implanted girth of a body-bulk full of foreign-dead cells, bone cartilage, in-organic clothes, he would make it through. The hose seemed fused to his skull for some reason. Even by every touch, by every jerk of his fingers and everything else, he felt the tightness of his grip fading. Rubbery-metal, incapable of squeezing it shut.

Yet this strange absorption allowed him to see the inner-globe-system of interconnected attached frozen mouthed square-d marionettes four-ledge-attached by piston cold-machines that were see-able through the materials, colossal things. Hiking around with metallic claws and metallic resizable bands that allowed them to rotate around the ocean-snow globes; the insides of every one of them looking cozily like the insides of manors, or wooden-parlors, the halls towards which he went towards being nothing but an exception from the rule.

Much greater forces had already settled and discussed between themselves the furthering of their evil plans; inter-dimensional machines, niggardly stealing water from Earth; without shame, animated only by their scullery as well as their bandit-like nature.

Corlon was a fed-spy, after all. He knew what he was doing.

In twenty days, the great Winged-Armed of Hussr would be released during a final solution, in which they would deliver a great breaking chain-reaction wave-missile god-wrapped around pair of cluster bombs that threatened to evaporate a beam-curved power ray, destroying the moon and half of the sun in its trajectory, as well as eight quarters of the planet. Replacing most molecules with a bridge that lay misaligned yet deformed and redefined gravity as for planet Earth to become the main center of gravity.

An extraction like this would make him incredibly miserable for some reason or another, since Corlon knew there was a chance that there was no heart inside of it.

They're eating bits from the surrounding tolls, taken from every single man who had been presently-preserved. Specks and fire-lightning firing from one side to the other; they meet there in half an hour.

'Who's taken this vision away from me?'

'You were deemed, unlikely to.'

He froze in place, staring dead-shot in front of him. At the figure, the inert see-through specter of himself; all of his real organs out; leaving him with an empty stomach-a dead like feeling inside of him that never gave out. It was oozing no emotion, covered organs. Covered overhangs pushing out of them, slowly, with eely-hardened rain-catchers pushing out their growths, blamefully forward; as if each organ had been forced to grow a roof on top of it, with a few pin-prick sized depressions in, from whence he looked at tattoo-paintings of organs within, on top of every single one.

As if the phantom had become an aquarium, whereas on top the heart, moved below, a slight hindering depression of a heart, of a gut, of liver, and of lungs for show, they danced in placed and moved; shadow hand puppet organs that shook and would move aside if needed.

But for a second there before it disappeared, he was left eely-shot, silent, as he heard a voice no longer after that.

He had no rifle on him, only his pack of cigars, shattered wrist by nerves dropped two of them off the ground before one of them reached his mouth.

Organic cluster-pile of boom-boxed forming girths; grubs for teeth, and loom-basin, where they spoke inside the swollen room, to her as thin, the woman broken.

'Shall we try to fix her somehow?'

Some lands had been previously inhabitable by a long time.'

'Largely, ten workers have already gone missing.'

'Monkey-niggers don't get a free pass.'

There was the, well this:

By the simply usage of a single hard-shaped boulder made out of the piles heads-shaped of a few barely stickled in niggers, dead fucking niggers, pre-pubescent beheaded chimp-a-nig with nig-nig bottom-placed inside a nigger-monkey tawny skinned piles of nigger-piles and wreathed in, darker things that were molded inside, melted-niggardly in a fashion such as a nigger would be lynched inside a stove-furnace meant and specifically designed for a god-damned-kike to get in. Well scorched, the end result looking like a heavy weighted pile of coal. This being a main-set piece meant for the support of a hoisting device, the crown block being placed in, as hard as it would seem, a hollow, previously dug-on, or inside the ground spot, previously, emulating a step-on-the mine kind of emptiness inside the ground, that could barely be seen, as to be hidden by a fake-podium-floor, the coal-nigger pile being set right on the precise-placement of the crown-block, or where it's supposed to be placed. As if this were the last apartment of a building before the top, there being a complete, suffice to say, worked on illumination system in, the drawworks being set on the floor alongside the opposite side of the room where the supply reel and the deadline anchor are placed, the storage reel in other terms and dead-like anchor, which lowered the hook device, which looked like a rather diamond-like formation that bore many figure that were completely widespread, as to wriggle their pseudo-limbs, being lowered something close to five hundred eighty four miles down a pitfall trap like compressed-with men-figures inside the groundwork holding emblems of skin-trophies with single termite-eyes – compounded, siphoning power into the hook, as it becomes a giant molded mole-backed cranial-shaped creature with pneumatic piston like smaller split in halves skulls coming out of its sockets, open in the back, chained by the hook, wrapped around, which made its way through one of the oceans, resuming its attempt to penetrate the sub-layer where the Deformed gunners live in.

Kovqon, what laid inside an ocean.

'I am weary of waiting, when are you going to knock on the door? Are you intending on waiting there all day or are you to inform them of my presence?'

'Wait, just wait, there's something I haven't told you yet. The Keep is fallen apart, it's been falling apart for a while now. The Komonry has already infiltrated and replaced as much as eighteen members of the royal family.'

'How could this happen, Anaghash? Under the very nose of the king, might I add?'

'It's complicated, but you must still your tongue in place before it's taken from you and given to one of the fetch-dogs. Driven into the grounded bowels of the Lechlyeach, where you might only hear yourself speak, such will be your ears that they might stitch in place.'

A bowl-head they called them.

A few of them moved around. Even between them, this was not a kind torture the peasants deserved. He felt pity for them.

But Anaghash was not someone who deserved compassion either. Dressed like a dark peasant with a dark cowl, he could be seen as, no different than either of them.

'I feel it, don't you worry your low-head. I feel as if they're here, and have been here for a while, my heart sinks just thinking of what's been lost when we made the transition into the Higher-Arches.'

'We've been sinking into this cruelty mountain ever since we left our homes.'

'Yet, you do not understand that this wasn't a bad thing, or worsened by time, I delight myself in knowing as much, Hang. Listen, keep your mouth shut or I won't be able to cover up for you.'

Would he do it? For now, it was hard to tell.

There many, incredibly wrought servants who had been serving there, for the majority of their lives, that could not even be even more quantified, as to be, put in time and space, through the funnel of eons that were only brought into life after being completely, made to last through an infinite amount of forgetful years, which turned them into tall-talking abominations, whom kept their noses much higher than anyone could possibly do it. Such was their way of thinking and the mere power they produced.

Drawing out of their malignantly shaped heads that were once removed from their bodies, yet moving static-like frozen in place as if drawn on rails, as if hanging on top of poles, while their trunks and arms and legs but jerked in the air, flapping themselves jerkily like the wings of a fly. In such wild surroundings, where the tear-like growths their children hid in appeared to open every now and then saying:

‘It’s time to die.’

‘I have an assault rifle.’

Anaghast quickly pulled it out and shot all of their children dead, before he lowered his rifle and shot the servants’ head, who stopped blocking the way forth, and could only lower himself as the body started convulsing violently around the room, knocking down tables and cold-struck vases whom were already queerly touched by winter-cold glass; when the other servant came from behind, trying his best to stop him, right as he pushed around, both of them unable to stop him, as he started railing everything down on them, putting them down before pushing Hang back.

‘Get down, get down, they’re gonna explode!’

Pulled down, forced there, both cowered, he threw a grenade, two of them followed, a flash and a smoke-one that blew half the roof down, part of the castle shook off, as if there was a quake. Suddenly, splatters everywhere, the entire dorm painted red, no more servants down there.’

‘Come on, we have to make it before they catch us, we have to get as many of them as possible, here, take this FR-Forty-one. ‘

It has a small barrel that had two knives that launched egg-shaped power-growth cells that gave birth to exploding jelly-like mongrels that popped as well, in the air. It was like a boomerang with chains that bore attached grain-like put-through fire floating puma-cradles, painted that way, they rushed to the room. Where the brooms were kept in, dusty-dusty, they licked them, or at least only Anaghast did it. He liked going at it, making out, even.

‘Not now, Hang, wait until you hear the sounds.’

‘You sure about it?’

He only heard tit, it was all he needed. Running his finger through her twig-hair do, the wig, nasty-one-foot, by the looks of it, he pulled out a knife.

No one breaks a door from there on out now, without paying for it, for a change, but they could not do it, since it was infected, blasphemously so, while every attached-like being was mocking them, trying to bait and lure them out.

‘Come along and come along now, see what happens when they come for you, when the time comes.’

‘Shut your nasty-dumb mouth already, or I will.’

‘Do nothing, do nothing at all, you know what they do to those who are too loud now.’

‘We know, we know but, we’ll see, we’ll see you through this blasphemy in one life-time, unless you do recede back where you came from.’

‘What are you hiding?’

‘Nothing, nothing at all?’

‘Afraid, Anaghast?’

‘Of course not.’ He could only see doubles when he wasn’t paying any attention, and already had his, sudden urge stopped, he would’ve seen reason. After all, there was no point in staying in place, wretched dire, as was his command.

‘We’ll leave this room once there’s enough of them out there.’

Yet there was another:

The Mole-creature suddenly burst, and cracked and smashed through one of the first-cracked bats, the shape of two giant harts, embraced by a myriad of insects that were gnawing at the bodies of those it managed to defeat, in the few meters that lay between them, in that melancholically lighted room and chamber:

‘Mellut Leigh of Beirut, I have come forth with a straggled in-mallet, you may not believe your eyes, I’ve stumbled on, would you have received me otherwise?’

‘Have I invited you in my house yet?’

‘May I enter?’

He had just been invited in.

‘I am a tormented soul, as ever, as I have ever been, you wouldn’t understand how pure I am still, despite being distilled, throughout my life-time, again and again, but thinking of a bleeding morning where I may yet to be. If there ever was a time to run, I advise you, flee!’

‘But I have invited you into my house, the great chunk of ice-rock.’

‘That is correct, Mellut, but I, of all, would spare no tear of my own, since you’ve yet to grasp why I came here, in the snow-globe ocean, alas.

I still do not understand the way in which you perceive me, as I am still hurt.’

‘You were my son, Mole-skull Chemjuken.’

‘I was, but we have been separated for the longest time in history, than I could ever have perceived. We are of different breeds, as to say, we could never reach each other’s folded great formations that wait for us in one of the most perturbing of the darker shins-of lies.’

‘Have I not dreamed of this moment’s come and arrival?’

‘We have met several times in different worlds and different lifetimes where I was a king and you were my dearly-bowed to, forth, the peasant, whom I spared, from the on-going-execution. I’ve pardoned you, as I have. My heart bleeds, though I may not understand why, you would betray me as thus. It is, in your blood, in your soul, I’ve come to accept it.’

‘My son, no longer, I am worn.’

‘Why, Mellut? Are you not an incessant dark formation? Such a thing of dark-malignant mitigation of girths and many things that grow about, and in that case, who made you?’

‘A much darker god than you would come to know. Follow me so and observe what I have done to this swollen cold-ocean globe.’

The rope was infinite in stretch, and it was spiked like a rose’s bush, with spins that spun, unscrewed and up-and-down motions in-between; the size of three months and a half babies; the first year, with their diapers filled, as for the thick base of the spin.

Somehow they had reached the door, having entered the room where they kept the kegel-exercise machines, exactly what they sounded like, eight on one, twice as many there, one greater-wider set on tiny pebbles in the middle and the rest, randomly put around the chamber. And they were fused as such with the little trans-tortured, whose legs were taken away, whose mouths were pulled, and better as to behave. Some gut-tubes prevented their castration, as to stop further attempts at using their spines, cracked ribs and side of their openly sharp guts from being rubbed against all of those and that. A few more of them were present there, some mechanisms that prevented self-harm from ever occurring.

It was a nasty way of dealing with everything that was going around them, but, at the same time, there was no alternative.

‘As you can see, we started.’

‘Is there someone else?’

‘You’re definitely much quicker than I seem to remember, for someone who hasn’t done much of talking in the past. Did something happen, for you to become so jovial?’

‘Something did happen, I did come into existence after all, and it seems like, with this physical addition, there’s no present limit as to what I’m capable of saying and of thinking.’

‘We could discuss this in another place then, not alongside them.’

‘Why? Are you afraid we might damage them by doing the wrong thing?’

‘Chemjuken, we’re having a friendly conversation, what’s gotten into you? Harming them, now?’

‘Is that not what you’re doing to them?’

‘Of course not, we’re trying to help.’

Again with mysterious person; he always did seem like someone he could trust, in some way. It couldn’t be him, could it?

‘Shall we start again?’

You chipped my tooth, you fucking retard. Dumb fucking glass water-bottle.

It was a nice room, or had it been for the torture, perhaps there would be naught else to follow after.

Wait, he couldn’t be? Mellut immediately started darting towards one of the kegel-traps, inserting, as it was carried by many of the warring on top of him insects, whom he suspected to be but various warrior breeds that had not only been cast from different hibernating tribes, but they also incessantly prepared their inner-guns, most of which were hidden inside the mass of growths and meat he held inside the back of his gong-thorax side.

Ugly, dirty and yellowy-dark, pudgy on the floor and all around; but the metal was nice, rusty, with red on it-orangey, with walk on rolls put in front of one another, held together by metal bolts and chunk in halves knapsacks. It was no pentagon as in shape, but rounded at every corner, as for finger put inside the place they met. Children used to play around, their hand-prints remained. Electro-shock limes all around, some of them still glowing; yet this place was never dull.

‘Doesn’t it sometimes get lonely? Even with the other one helping you around?’

‘You know I’m not one who’d employ the use of an assistant, unfortunately, I’m in a brick-lain moot, with him, we’re still broken up by what happened during one of the solace-terminals bomboceries.’

‘What happened?’

‘A room was encased in burials of empty marks, depressions of coffins, where animals started piling up, sleeping in, hibernating.’

‘It makes sense. So, why did your assistant, I mean, the other person choose to be alone now? Because of?’

‘His animal, was one of them; you see now, we were both completely shocked by the immediate leave it took, in order to join them. He felt betrayed.’

A Kegel-machine lowered a bit. It was clear enough that the ‘creature’, the man’, whose ‘breasts’ were taken off him, his, the biological man of a single ‘Y’ chromosome, had his body shattered to a pulp. Now forced into a jolt, as to, barely as it was standing, give leeway to the absence of a worse day. It was much worse than that.

Choirs at the hidden Orkonkoroh

There weren't many safe-spots left, not since they had eaten them away; few of the singers from the choir had been selected. A little more than four of them, clearly made to waste away in our presence, open ended yet jealous, as the roads they had been brought in from. As long as no one bated an eye, everything was fine. A savage tried sharpening his teeth with a torn-off club he picked up from somewhere. Before he could even say a thing, the machine was done with the first singers, out of the choirs as they came around, they started picking up, and chipping part of his teeth, before drawing back into the singer. He was the first to be worked on.

'I see that you pulled something out of him.'

'A few, definitely a few molted famed choirers, all of them are plump, they see what they want.'

'How can you live with yourself, worker of cadavers, knowing that you're making them this way? Twisting-bastardizing, your existence, much to itself galvanizing, you do not seem to obey the means of nature.'

'I'm mentally distraught, unless you didn't know that about me. I've done some things to, well, see for yourself.'

Hellespont drew back. His organ-forged but stopped working on the choir-singers for a moment before they were brought back; like open-toys no longer ready. No longer praying to disease; it seemed like those bodies coming out of it stopped, or at least paused torturing him.

'The savage shall be allowed to carry on his own errands for now, unless you've got something else to add.'

'I'd like to see the process for myself, what goes into them.'

An organ started opening, abashed.

It was flat, and in the back, rotated, as to face them like a vending machine. A coffin, with something in; another choir singer was released, though they sang out of the pouches in their mouths.

Wait, but there was something he refused to acknowledge, lately, this being something, he's seen before, repeatedly.

'I've seen the body that emerged from that morgue of yours, that is something beyond any kind of illegible abomination such as would be found in nature, by the likes of reanimated still-borns, finding themselves, living, livid, made to survive the deadly embodiment of organ harvest-cultivation.'

'Done by men just like you, I would assume?'

'Bear with me now, I am not the one who drowned Pontiff Lesser, on his way out, only to grab a piece for his death-machine.'

‘It’s meant to suture what’s left of their organs and shrink them forth, walking along, a train of people in control.’

‘That’s only a man, one at a time, it’s impossible for a single man to gain control over so many limbs and minds.’

‘Smaller ones, that’s true but we’re talking about something much shorter than those of primates. You of all should understand this, shouldn’t you?’

I mean, I used to experiment on you, Gen.’

‘That was a long time ago.’

‘Yet you reek of residue, turn around.’

Just as the death-machine has been turned into a peculiarly deformed repertoire of inwardly thrust inner-cannibalize cog-turned inside each man or woman that came in, he’s made Gen do as he pleased, being so palpable as to do whatever he asked of him. The little man failed to realize what truly happened in the freezer, the bloated likes of his spine and what remained of his mind being molded in the after-front of his grand creation. So much so that the prototype stood in front of him; resting, on a pillar of metal that came from the misty side, that had lain across the room, as they spoke. He bent over it upon being brought, never were there any rails seen, or trails behind. Gen took off his shirt, simply glazing over the shattered scum-filled rusty-dowry pillar. He winced for a second, but resigned.

‘It’s a great sheet of notes that’s open at the will, as my command but only does with you as it wishes, removed each peel, and shroud as to look at a grand masterpiece I never thought myself possible of going through with.

You are spared of suffering. You no longer displease any man coming into contact with you, as you once did. You look bionic, but at the same time you are alive, very much so, that you no longer think for yourself, for what’s been spread, and so much so, for what’s around you.’

‘What did you do to me?’

‘Still, you fail to acknowledge my gift, which is understandable. Though you may still be under the impression that I have not only harmed you, butchered like a lost-to-face, across the planes of the earth, towards which you go around, never to have known peace, cursed even. You don’t know, do you?’

‘What did you do?’

‘I’ve taken a piece of your mind and have given birth to such a thing, as for song and echo, might be heard when a simple thought it given inception. I’ve attached a few, experimental devices. Brain-reformation, I’d like to call it, but it’s not exactly that.

Think of it this way. Your brain is but a Verdi, or a Bach.’

‘You’ve turned my fucking brain in a sheet of notes?’

‘Not exactly, but I knew, even before you opened your dumb fucking mouth that you would not understand it. Or where I’m heading to, or whether or not I would beat you, restlessly with an iron bar, until you bled off. I may do that, in case you’re still wondering.

But not now, not yet; I think you have to hear this out, now, since part of your inner-leg.’

Already missing by the looks of it; a sack, belonging to a centenarian’s floppy-emptily inside, sack of bones, no cartilage nor probed meat.

It was resting, his leg, in the air. A few meters away from where it stood, in the mouth of a great-depiction of a sun, with a weird mouth to it, and eyes that were exactly those of a man, but giant. Attached to it, drooling down, eaten by the looks of it.

‘Whenever you stop and allow for your back devices, these keys I’ve implanted, though they might appear to make sounds, you’re about to enter a world of suffering you may never wake up from.’

‘Why?’

‘Because I thought I might.’

‘I might teach you a lesson.’

‘Why did you stop there?’

‘I had to catch my breath.’

He had a whole constellation trailing him around, as the pillar moved like a remote controlled car, with him still on him. While faced stars were but all come from inside the glowing-main one, that acted as the conduit, to the lesser ones. Each lacked one eye, exactly one eye, while being pseudo-flat inside, other than a completely flattened on both sides oblong bearing the clearly worn as a crown spiked metal band, their one-hollow sockets served as the points of connection, between all of them, having formed a strange flying planetary system, connected only by adjustable lamp-throat mechanisms inside their queerly red-rimmed empty marks; as they were drooling on him, waiting for the main one to be done.

‘Why is this happening?’

‘You’ve dreamed of it, in one of your maliciously aimed at me, nightmares, you shameless creature!’

How could this be?

‘They’ve taken me from the ticking of molded-flowers in the bed of my choosing, in which I lay, during my eternally undisturbed sleep of lucid-nightmares in which I’ve lain distraught in an eternity caught, hidden by strange formations of serpentine abstractions painted of the walls, and they threw me in this machine, the coffin, which shall bore the greatest of Composers as to the primitiveness of the rocking, pressing of the pebbles they have reverted us back to, a previously aforementioned dark age.’

The choir of a blasted choice, of many voices, came by the first of noise, the drops of little chime-keys.

Although even the blasted choir seems to have lost its voice, a unison uncanny:

‘There’s a fallen step, on which a finger leapt, from one side to the other. His fingers slipped.’

‘So what of it, I meant, of little while, to think.

Perhaps, Ahrens, perhaps it’s time we fashion our own, correct? Perhaps it would be kind, of less stature, to be had. This conversation carried on, to our choice’s regard. That we should consider abandoning the lesser ones and fashion some of our hand’s making.’

‘For what reason, if neither one of them are much decayed? To the purport of our craft, there’s nothing wrong in the music we made, at last, not from where I’m standing.’

‘I feel, as if I’m never going to experience what other, grand, they are, I admit to my fault to achieve any better, orchestras that agape such needs. To beckon and reed, alike, to feathery touch, a pianist’s watch, and mastership such as we won’t ever have, unless we get, alike, such better tools, as to stand, our ground and, much to prove as there is, show that we are capable of making it after. If only we have the same means.’

‘What after? When once surpass such men, we’d seek. Even if either of us is pleased, though I doubt anyone but you and your arrogance and envy never ending would allow you to move there on out, you know what that means as well. There will never be an end to it, from this childish venture, and desire of yours, to tell, nothing.

Nothing will suffice for you. Nothing will please you past that point, not the grandest, most obscure of forms, not the masterfully crafted, not the most well-thought songs.’

Something was missing still and least confined.

A violence of ethical proportions, an intrusion, intrinsically. False, he did not understand their stance.

The singers bloated, it was no blood-machine in which, the body, yet they played. There was no doing it for that sake alone, nor would they refrain from it, as such, as well. Was there no reason to believe, as such? A creature being played with, servant of the many lesser, three-set sun, of Slavic membrane, they laughed at him again.

‘Keep running, duck down before the falling urn, run and run again or we shall have you.

Don’t force our hands, or we shall make you suffer no less than you should.’

They were still smiling, drawing whatever they could from the choir, who was still singing, every voice being prone to be heard and have its wretched appearance distorted, forth came more suns and they were even more violent than the other ones. If their predecessors were, or had been at any time even remotely well, they would’ve seen each other, from each side, from every fallen-through dove-like pair. As masters of this place:

‘You grow in arrogance, brothers, this has to be brought to a stop!’

‘How can we stop now when we have already been given all that we need, on a place that was brought to us, by the lesser and by the ones that are shackled by their side; both of them would do whatever we say if it would please us so, without daring to raise a single finger, as to try.’

‘It will not last forever!’

‘Then while it lasts.’

The choir disturbed everything, as for, as far as it went, as closer still, but there would be no end that would fare well against it.

‘Part of this machine needs a new set of, willing participants, I wonder, in the midst of all, who might eventually step in and grant me solace as to know.

Who shall be the first one to be binded, banded, remade, refashioned as I will it, even cursed beyond the humanly understanding, for If I shall have it so, wherever might I look and do, I would all men in whatever sinew I could make of them.’

And there came forth but one whose lesser, greater understanding came without no doubt. He was a fanatic-sociopath, inert, incapable of figuring what was going on, at the very least no from his surroundings alone, since there were things right there that could eat, gnaw and have at him before there was even a chance for him to show himself for what he were:

‘Grand it is, is it not?’

‘A beauty, and you are?’

‘A choir master, Chorus, a mundane name I have adopted, which had been taken from me even before the time of my veins has come to pass, even before I stood a chance to live again, in the Iliac garden that’s now sunken into dirt and crass.’

‘Will you keep me waiting more?’

Chorus was mightily surprised, no one’s ever been this excited before, he’s never seen so, indulgent to his makings, to his shapings as well as the sharpening of the body, that they would be as impatient as he was.

Whatever was left of the entity survived, in some way or another; part of the room. Part of it had fallen apart, from the looks of it; a much-through the roof, it fell through:

A pair of pantomimes-pillars stood forth, they drew along all carrying elongated, strange piston shovels adorning their shoulders like pads.

They rolled on top a shattered floor.

One of the depressions in it had a few peep-holes put through them, dug-in. First peeper was but a deformed creature, hardly a looker, a horse-shoe made of two cartilages looking like two sides of an animal jaw molded tougher, toothless, bearing a face on top the bulk it formed out of many dub-bled dry, a slither of a mouth drawing forth on a crane-rake protrusion coming out of it. Around it flew the kite-master, whose face but rodent-like sharpened by a razor, with chipped grinned teeth sticking out, on a splice eely body it seemed to have grown out of and upon, it flew. Three great curtain-eels for arms, bearing an elongated curved in the front hat. Its bloodied body drew out filthy growths that spread around, the sprouted puffs where growthlets threw themselves in the air and about it. Each bore a pseudo-mouth that spoke:

‘The bloated giant skeletons stand forth.’

In waiting they drew along, a few more than fifteen of them, giant, and eyed with sparkling arms coming out, at the end of each there being the four lumbar spiked segments of a Lumbric vertebra whose Sacrum-Coccyx region pointed up, and appeared to be a marionette's head with giant corrugated compacted pearl-like eyes, with the mold of rotten men attached to them, all crying at the much-to-itself deformed peep-holes which had been dug by the horned mouthless, limbless moles that drew along their comb-like wormy growths.

Deformed citadel made out of many barely put together torn apart limbs, all gathering around.

A group made out of a few people gathered around him.

There were secret stall-houses in which they immediately went to.

One of the men whispered:

‘I remembered something I shouldn't have.’

‘What?’ Whispered another:

‘I think I remembered being abused as a child and I can't think of anything else now.’

I wish I could forget it. I don't like thinking about it.’

Key machine, lower than that; it couldn't sing or at the very least its keys, or most of them were very much lost.

A puffy thing whose body was mainly lumps, like a flea-headed but with man teeth on the front, no jaw, its nose an arrow tip, armored creature, legs but centipede grass-blades eight –encircling the physiognomy of a pseudo-cattle with two giant pincer shaped arms, clawless but pointing in the front. Unweaponed, but tailed, which diverged into a giant head that looked as if it was eating it, but was part, mouthless but eyed, bearing, at the back of its head, two giant finger-like protruding occipital bone-horns made of the same material as the rest of its skin. Kind of like a horseshoe or a magnet, or a man filling up a strange balloon animal made of chewing gum. Filled with eerily deformed formations, most of them being akin to tribalistic faces carved in what normal skin-tags would be to an average person. They were leaping around, nearing the sound of a great call, so eerily yet highly acoustic that only dogs would be capable of hearing it, drawing along, as if on sky-couches filled with spiked iron plates. No rider was in sight.

Two or three of them drew along:

‘Lithyi, we must find the source of the call, we must find it before the land breaks forth.’

Akin to them; but nowhere near would they understand the likes of the birth given Slavic Suns that flew around the confines of every fallen-after barricade; for no reason could anyone forget where they are, after all, for no second.

Hundreds, if not for a city commune, towering ‘countries’, all compressed into deformed cylinders, misaligned at every level, then forced together into one mega structure, akin to a throttled, elongated smoke pattern-like caused by a hookah that made a lot of swirls, drew forth, a few billion miles forth, where finally it formed a strange, at first pseudo-tower or many Brutalism buildings, but as they progress further towards the sky, a mega-stalactite formation with many spiked shafts, poles and highly peaked standing domed roofed peaks, all merged together in an almost organic fashion. A few man-like adorning trinkets of men bearing curved to the almost abstract like pattern as if lucidly dreamed, mixed with hundreds of open doors and windows and strange see-through places, come to loss. Smoke coming out of many, fires being brought to life; many of the people living there being somewhat wickedly deformed accordingly to the angle and position they were born in, in relation to the gravitational pull-force caused by the deteriorating of the great experiment which floated above it. Like a star, like a red-dwarf but not a planet.

Its comet-head-melt of wax-piles with a giant man'teeth filled grin that was still smirking, whose both eyes were by now completely rotten, to the dark completion of a burnt-mark which had completely encompassed the mid-rift area, creating a single pseudo-belt eye socket, missing, as it'd go without saying, forming the top half of a scythe-like, in front of it, spectral scythe, outlined with black cords, slowly drawing out from inside its socket and its mouth, slowly yet numbly decompressingly-disintegrating the comet-cranium into nothingness. A pair of bloated spring aligned hoses made its throat. A violent, heavish humanoid torso, limbless pushing forth, out of its 'belly' a compact caterpillar worm shaped tunnel that would've been aligned horizontally if standing on the ground. At the middle of which out came a giant iron-cord-wire bearing circular springs all along it, until it drew forth to a black hole like formation it surrounded, having formed a circle by that point, that was somewhat close to the head, yet still beneath the spectral transparent bloated fat-scythe. A black oozing planet floated in the dead-center of the spring formed circle; as if it were a satellite coated in paint or space. And there was one, smaller, tinier head attached to the tunnel tail, at the end of which, where, it stood anchored by catfish like cords, this mannequin oblong metallic chatterer, whose mouth was a single pit-like deformity appeared to slowly, yet for those who were around to observe it, over a long enough period of time, when deemed by itself or judged as to be safe, draw out stick insect thing branch-pinchers with curved second segments drawing out flaccidly flailing tape-worm formations dangling around the barb-wire formations they were doggedly-attached to, during a desperate attempt to avoid destruction, although unsure whether or not it could survive the fall. It stalled. Although the caterpillar tunnel was more like a fat intestine, hardened and chitinous:

'Will we?'

No one could know, no one could possibly know. At best, Orkonkoroh could still be sleeping, in its bed, whereas not a single sound or uttered blasphemy could awaken it from its slumber. There were a few left-overs that began barking through. A Slavic Sun drew forth and asked itself, whereas the others, to its back, shouted as if they knew:

'What's gone through them, lord of Suns?'

'Whom, the lower perilous looking men, the ones that work beneath us?'

'Then, as there could be no other ones.

‘Slavic-sun, Slavic-sun, listen to my prayer now. I have traversed a long enough distance to, acquire this right and ask of you as listlessly a thing as there is. I wish I could simply bring myself closer to you now, before my feet would come out of place, before my skin would fall off, I ask of thee, now, that, I revealed my face and my true side. The only thing that matters, the form between these two dark eyes, it is as much as matters and as much as I need.’

He was strong and peculiar, in sight. An giant sharp-chiseled asteroid rock, with many weird bushy thorns and cracked growths sprouting in the back and everywhere they pushed out, torn-apart and spread. Eyeless, it were, were it not for the fore-front snout. An almost plant-creature whose head was attached to a twisted around cacti-artifact stone-hardened stalk; coming out of a canoe-cricket grasshopper bullet-domed body, it stood. A few plated long-shouldered-fat-planks by each side, out of which humanoid forearms drew out, resting on pincer-sucker circles upon which they walked. Thirty feet on one side, thirty on the other; its bloated-brother was a floating skin-like head, a morsel-hippopotamus elephant man cancer growth, grown in a barred cage, with a single glowing coil coming out of it, beneath, as if it were a mark, worn by someone who got eerily lynched.

It was a sad day for Hellespont. One of them was misaligned, and even worse than that, something had already touched it with a few bloody stumps being implanted in them still.

‘Who is responsible for this? I asked you a question, and I will not be ignored, show yourself, when I refer to you, stranger, coward, you blasphemous, righteous fool. Your presence here is unwelcome.

Your treason shall not be easily dismissed, you’ve done things to my machine that no one, absolutely no one would be allowed to brush over in my place; disgraceful cancerous staple of filth.’

Ruinous thing it were, spreading slabs across the floor, the ceiling was there no more, but shattered came the water-drops like craters, fallen apart. The entirety of the room was to it likens desperately depressed into the ground, some things could simply not do to look over, blinded by the morning light. How long has it been since you have come into contact with the sun?

‘I’ve made plenty of you, great Slavic Trinkets that adorn my hall, out of the nightmarish stored insides of a man and what I have made out of his mind, again, I call onto you. Where are you, where have you gone and why have you abandoned me to be mocked by such a desperate caller, one who’d silently shout whispers as if this were naught else but own, as likens, parlor?’

There was no answer but still he had yet to endure and know, where was he?’

But he crawled in safety and was nigh-unseen, closer to being invisible than anything that’s ever searched for it. A cylindrical accordion lumped compact body drew held on top of inverted smallish towers and many other various growths. Its legs were stumpy-long and warty, filled with pig-like body growths that lodged inside each denser rock, or at least into those that could grab a hold of them. A great cartilage giant tulip came out at its end, as if it were the elongated towering throat of a leaves-consuming prehistoric dinosaur, whose moth defining features were, at the end of this livid-tulip, a twisted caricature of gums and teeth that shared in similarity of color, as well as they looked like intestines wrapped, and sutures, one on top the other, one by one, held across a girth that was too fat to be measured, at least by the tools of man alone. Many elongated skin-tag like spear stalactite-stalagmite like growths drew out of its chest, clawing and swiping around, even swatting some flies it slowly brought to its mouth to digest.

Although this elongated canon could've ended up there, it bore a strange growth on top of it, most bizarre of twists being implanted in it. Forward the giant pushed-through, a few meters in the front body of a wriggling phallic thing culminated in a giant bulb with a single eye bore forth, at the back of which, the other end, behind the side of the gums, and the 'head', there being a pseudo-calf leg with its hoof, trying to kick, desperately trying to reach a piece of ground it may rest upon even if it lasted for a moment or so. The phallic growth had a giant bubbly growth on top of it, with many worming-things holding it together, out of which, outwardly heaved rested the first recognizable 'face', a head that looked like an infantile creature with dentist tubes shoved in its mouth for teeth, but with no open end that could be seen in there. A great worming flaccid horn-like tree sprouting from its head, while resting flaccidly, vaguely aiming for itself; whereas from both sides of this one Goliath-rotten cranium rested two deformed sacks filled with many limbs inside. A body that would grant it the means to hunt for more, in order to track as many as needed, in order to devour before the time of its hibernation could draw back on. Its general cast of skin was not that of a submarine or of any recognizable shell-like thing that could be coated as to look like any weapon of war or raw industrial machine, but one of hardened rotten- blue opal, denigrated, disintegrated and close to, or at least incredibly close to falling apart any second now.

'Draw, come upon me, my choir, draw upon the notes of sour; of all there is, I am to ask, of what has happened, after they had come upon me, yet again, at last.'

There was nothing too close, none who could approach or mimic such a thing as pantomime, since their wretched heads, in heaps were wrung aside.

'Someone's hiding in none of those lockers, but whom?

Who dares disturb my call, when I, alone am standing here in watchful touch, when come to pass, so I may listen to one that could come to life, from depths of stricken forth the lower and the low. The ones that sting with bitter cinnamon eels they eat out of? '

But lo, he dodged a bullet there, a few more than followed; none touched the machine that had already crawled at unawares. Whatever that be, there was, within reason, not a single moment to spare, none that would make him thread bare and sublime, never to approach anyone. He hid behind a rock, wonderingly looking around him, for any piece he may crawl on top of, so as to give himself even the slightest advantage, whichever that may be. He was equipped as well with a canon-barrel, with a tiny fuse at the back of its shaft, a cigarette but held between two metal pincers, and only one shot. It's about as much as I'm need of. Though I may get desperate as to do something my mind could outgrow.'

'Show yourself, intruder. I've already dealt with one like you before, you will prove to be none another and naught else but a mere pestilence and an annoyance, naught more I shall seek therefore!'

A trap one the ground, twenty meters ahead, barely planted. Someone put it down, just then. Heat and vibration was being produced by his incessant sprawling over the top-part of a tap-tap-tap on top of it, rounded lid. He planted it inside the floor. A few more than a few heads drew down bolted thin-stick insect mouths coming from on top a covered in leather-face circular region these thing receivers came out of.

He aimed it in its general direction. He was nowhere to be found. It was already hard, trying to figure out what was going in there, with the dim lit light constantly being put down. Soon the lights could come out, and then. He dreaded what might happen after.

Left side, fifteen hundred meters, raised high, coming off one of the high-tops, across one of the walls. A side beam of many crawling things, all of them flashing spears out their bodily rims, soon shot down, across the floor. A circular pane of moving rancid spears kept crawling from one side of the room to the other, with every circular motion there being a second stranger made to appear between these rods. An oozing worming superficial pool that looked like their cast-below-them shadow reeled in some of the features off, whoever those may be, they weren't brought here without being slightly, somberly botched.

Some wore no faces. Others had their legs taken away from them, but sprouted wing-buds from behind their backs, crawling around them, floating around.

But there was no doubt about it, every single one of them wanted to get a hold of the choir, to acquire it by all means necessary.

There were other armed guns and drones there, hidden behind pillars, tall-raised and not only so, but some who, stopped. As if in place.

'It's a masticated forage piece taken out of a caved-in quarry we stumbled on after demolishing some of the rock-shuttles that had fallen from the upper-cradle that's been, in Letork, his weird ball, Johnke, fifteen meters above them, the left side of the ceiling, above the hellish realm, the rotten locker of cadavers, five days ago when the slurpage of stone-crackle fell on itself, taking a good chunk off the canyon during its fall because of the explosives, but I think we've made far too great a progress into the manifestation, as for the dissipation of the global funds whose projected destination is our pockets, to be stopped now, therefore, we shall used this masticated tooth-thing for rape.'

'But I am a woman, and I've been raped hundreds of times.'

'There's a criminal-murdered with a butcher-knife-cleaver blade for arms, behind you. Don't turn.'

'I am afraid he's going to rape-molest fuck me.'

'Wait, pray to your god, he's split its back.'

A great red panel emerged, no, a cube- a transparent see-through dark world, a box, a dark thing, a dark cubicle as if of dark stars, oozing with solid darkness; with a blackish substance, a gas. His arms got pulled apart, then connected as if on a racked, held as if socketed, a piece of his face being torn apart as well. Pigmented black boils began emerging and spreading, alongside the rims of his thumpers, his two knee joints having been firmly planted into the ground at this point as the inner-jerkiness of their front-piece began protruding through the growth-mass of his legs. A dead nigger was also lynched in the meantime, second time's a charm.

'Don't look behind you, woman, he's lynching a nigger right now, right in front of my eyes, and he's suffocating him violently but slowly.' With a boil-filled with growths as well, rope.

A simple man, whose cruel life had followed him, and caught up, from behind, around and whereas everywhere he looked, for every choice he's made would yet again prove, to be his wicked style. His life that only served himself, a senseless thing, the ugly and vulgar, and there was naught to say of him at all.

But lo', like many, who were like him alike, they turned to look behind. And there was single thing that stood divine, called Ideal, set but, still, in mind.

A tall and mighty figure standing, whose mastered all such craft, who's carried everything and everyone behind him, as he had raised him family, set and wrought. Like mighty iron, crested, stung. And just as any, hunched, but sought. Whose calloused hands, for heavy weights, from hardening himself as well, for hours spent, and blinded so. As many men after, only felt themselves, weary, as to show. That he would die. There were so many people that would not help. For even with, or wreathing still; the ideal was yet to fall to his feet. But it could only last for long, as well.

When all, forgotten, past him yet. No one looked behind.

'I remember, once, and again. Beauty was but called Florence, upon the Renaissance man, whose face was bold. Upon him, of which stories we have only heard, as being told. As, for everything that's been written down, as for the likes that have been taken from us, before a time, when we may yet to come upon them again, not as they were, but how they are again.

Though man alike, he may have been, I do forget, that deep within. Time had changed the man of Renaissance, not the master, of all, due, craft. But the man who still lived with God, the man who crafted for the likes. The man of patronage, with much refined taste, of which but splendor not even the likes of man, would but face or have seen through. I remember many such tales, but I've yet to know what's true of splendor.

I've yet to know a man as great, as no one else but living anywhere else, but in the heart of the Renaissance man.'

Of what was known of them I forget, but they had known such Paradise as they have made, and will yet be made again.

The man of Italy draws on. He enters through the broken home. He sees such stone as there in lain, in a place, he has yet to decide whether or not he would stay.

It was no crossing of the dead, yet they felt likely, that he would stand. While everyone in turn sat.

The man, my brother, stands in vain.

'How can there be a future for the Western man?'

The world has yet to come of fair, and day, of what comes after, they sit and wait.

But no one knows what to say, of the Renaissance man.

Of much regard was kept the man under the clouds, Italian. Whose brow was high, and they kept sight, of much beloved, Italian. Whose Christ was lord, and Church was home, of a lordly man, Italian.

Stone hands, stone hands such as ours, can only shatter. They ruin everything they touch. These are not the hands of man I bear, these are not hands given by God. These are not hands capable to create. They're not fit for anyone. I wish I did not feel so jealous onto him as well, of might as such, the Renaissance man. I was not born like him, I can't pretend. How does he do and reach that is true?

How does he sculpt and paint and learn, behave?

Master of all craft, man of Renaissance. Of whose desire wilts, I've yet to comprehend, at last.

For no man is of the same heart as he.

The halls will not suffice, so much more has to change about them; of pure embroidered marble yet many seem to stand.

A torn apart garden, wasted in the distance lain; many of them wilt in flowery beds, widely spread and yet aghast to winds that were not there yet. For neither were to come and greet, the men outside. They'll see to it that they will come. And when the first of rains, in town, they shall wilt a spoken world no more. Instead, of chimes, might hear, and wait, horizons filled with more. Than ever wanted. It's just as much as I've ever wanted. A life as simple, hardly lived. A life but bothersome, and ill. With men alike, and working hard, for a family beyond the one one's had.

A life away, a life forgiven, a life that's wasting, but all's but given, where to, rest in peace, as peaceful as to think that life had gotten close, as to exist.

There stood, before them, flowers churning, towers mourning, a puddle of diamond shattered before any step could be taken forth.

A boy stood alone, playing by the water tap outside. Alone.

Specks of shelter-cobalt clusters

Upon the filaments made out of shattered giant diamond masters, and crystalline grunts whom stood upon the great embodied eminence of stone, which lived between four broken volcano-craters, inside of which they formed. Larger peoples all gathered around:

'We have broken another scepter during the first day.'

'Since when was there ever a question whether nor your insatiable desire to shatter their mountain fell upon the shoulders of our kin?'

Most of the colors had died out, waves washing over what remained.

A great briar of cobalt appeared from somewhere out of Cobalt-East.

They were filled with pearl-dust and other kinds of unnatural clouded specs that had entered through their fingers, twice as close to being used again:

‘Lord of cobalt-ruin.’

They were fallen off out of a wheelbarrow, shards of cobalt taken out of a mine. Near them stood him.

A Body-bag deformed sack-man: Limbless, but with a head turned to the right. He was carried on. One of his simple cobalt eyes shone, with glowing puffs of ultramarine. An empty black socket on the left, the other one oozing with glowing strength, set aside.

‘Blue eyed jewels are placed on the counter now; do you suppose there’ll be a few more days of blue satin afterwards? Since we have stolen eight and eyeless gazes still refrain from talking. I would, most assuredly ask you so. Shatter them, break them apart, then put the dust aside and wait a week long dormant until the other summer’s end’s a waiting. It’ll be there, in the same place by the time you return.’

There was no bastardly way around it, and there were cuts around the body of a dust-grained covered automated arm, the prosthetic carrier, the one that brought them from the hanging countries, Hkevd. He was still undecided, as to what was going on around him.

There was another man, who was a tad shier than the other people, who made an offer, as to lay claim upon an oyster, whatever that meant.

‘I won’t shatter it as I believe it to be of a worth far more exceeding that of any pitiful trinket one could wrap his hands around, and for that I offer but my simplest most quaint apologies, as I have promised my chosen one of heart contender, that I would bring this to her, here on out and therefore send her back into that mirthful phase she may never wake up out of.’

‘You intent on doing something to her while she’s asleep.’

‘Of course I would, rape her that is.’

‘Well enough, perhaps we ought to contend with something else.’

‘But wait, did I hear that so? The jewels, they belong to sockets, they’re eyes such as crystal balls, spheres that somehow would, much to them.’

And he took a moment to inspect them. Holding the jewels in front of his face, carefully measuring them with one eye open, the other closed, thereon out his face extended towards the sun. A domed gate seen as if cut at the top by two slashes then brought, slightly closer to him as well as he ran.

‘Someone stop that thief!’

But the crowd was filled with too large a beasts to stop him, or to tackle him as the guards caught on. Barren desert waste fallen apart bodied whose top drew forth as a crane-like ledge pointed inwardly, out of which a crane-curved scythed long-beak pointed inwardly as this strangely spectral dark armor of green-purple darkish blue, many teeth of orange being aligned, one at once. As if it were an armored drilled with a downward pointing spike-teeth scythe, it crawled on cackling mouthed feet, smallish and cricket-like but deformed and, much to themselves, the prosthetics of machines. But this was only the lower side of their bodies, as the upper side was a chessboard's pawn whose 'head' was actually shaped like a human torso but flipped around as to align with the side of the drill, not forward as for the scythe to align to its left 'arm' which was a peculiarly deformed body-trash-bag but coiled thing, coming out of this cast of armor it rested in, filled with many decaying shapes that were unseen by the eyes of men. It was largely headless unless one counted a pump-like pike opening that pointed forward, and was barred. Well enough, the bag acted like a lumping lung, which appeared to have granted them their much esteemed ability to set themselves in flight. It was a clumsy one as well, that followed.

'We need to follow him, wherever he went, and implant something in his head, we have to track him wherever he went.

He stole something that ought not have been stolen.'

'What?'

'A cobalt set of eye-hearts, which shall make the seas wreathe in disgust and become thunder-forms and shoot bolts of powder made out of shattered clouds, in worlds unknown, as from that point on the world shall be destroyed in part and made to resume the cycles of destruction from which no spawn might come out after!'

A few more people in the crowd, they moved slowly as from one side to the other, unnervingly defunct. Incapable of knowing or finding out what pestered them. It was mightily addictive, but they could not remove whichever one was there.

'A man dropped dead!'

'Clear the road, clear the road!'

Of course, most expectantly, the guards simply ignored him as if it didn't matter, as for any as for all.'

A broken cottage, long-well-drop beneath:

Their voices were as penetrating and rancid as a Cyclohexylsulfamic acid bolt. Alone, there it stood, before them, both only capable of seeing it only when they spoke as to melt its outer layer. A few of the neon lights popped up the ceiling. A wall stood there, deformedly disjoined from the rest of the upper deformedly erected lance of bricks that intersected itself with the lower-upper clasper. No more, they stopped dropping.

'That's a nice, feverishly worked upon pearl, isn't it? It has an igniting fuse out there, carved in.' More like punched in, like some kind of unnatural ritual that was made, in order to properly get something out of it. It left it, hanging, near the improperly frozen pool of algae. A sphere of wax with a broken candle inside, no wonder they tried hiding them, they were thin-waist explosives after all, neurons of fire:

'I could light it, making this whole room simply pop off, you wager I couldn't?'

‘Neither of us would reprimand you if you had. It’s just that, it would be an awful thing to do, would it not? Our lives and the ones beneath and above us could be at stake. We could most certainly avoid that, within reason. If it pleases you, take it, hold it, but don’t light it.’

Yeah, try getting onto him, he could most definitely do with something like that. If only I could.’

Cortyii-Aid muffled one of his moustaches, they were vehemently beaded. A slaughter of lightning almost popped in, making it seem as if, a broken chandelier took its last glassy breath before it died off in an infinitesimal of a second.

A broken house:

Four great decayed corpses, legless but whose hands were thrown, upwardly heaved as if they were waves that pushed out of a tomb, a contortion of stone, high-skulled as such; adorned by broken skeletons that were lumped together at the top of it. The closest thing to humanity inside that tomb was a giant heart that fairly exceeded the girth of a human corpse. For that reason alone, no one appeared to approach it, nor make any disturbing noise whilst nearing it. But the villagers gathered nonetheless, appeasing the likens of a dark occultist that shoved them back:

‘You shall make no noisome approach, do you hear? Unless you want to awaken my master from his sleep. At which, my time will have remarked as stopped, and toppled down, a decree as such will have been given onto me when nearing thee, men of lesser worth. You’re to die afterwards.’

But none answered to the flounder as, it’s been thrown. About to wonder when one could awaken some scorn, a man was chosen from their pile. Appalled as one might be, he stepped in with a torch of many wails, many of them slithering contortedly as they would refrain from doing so on wild-a-bunch and dark command.

Herbon, to his side, had strode in until, he had become a single rosary thing engulfed in flames, just as Saint Alchony had upon stumbling on the remains of Penelepanor’s repellant strands, which did, that did, until it’s come to stop next to him, fallen flat-faced on the ground. It was a shocking act, akin to an execution.

A pus lantern appeared to grow

Only a part of it could be thoroughly observed as for the growths on either side, neither which or made any sign of changing. In front of them, a darker tunnel, through the Hospital and much closer than they would allow after:

A slammer and a hit, something kept pounding the wall, hit after hit, it followed after, someones' feet caught off, chopped and then put behind him, he started wailing again after that, open mouthed, head-stand tall, as him, distorted. Had they looked for any sign of there being anything clearer? There was no way of telling, they started again. A hit and sprawl, then they jumped around and only hoped that they would not be trailed as they left nothing behind, not even the slightest, most terrible of things, a wingless broth, as well as they could, much to it allow, for something near-close to happen.

'Don't make any sudden movement now, they could pit us against it if they open the gates and help us hide in that filth-a-mound.'

'Who is the one behind this?'

'Must be the ones that escaped, the ones that turned on the lights, but now they're gone, like everything else, like everyone who's lived for the time, living inside the bloated-creeps.'

The cricks were blind and open the door opened, a giant bullet-crater was seen in front of them, devoid of anything that could grow, as to lay aside. A strange man of murk appeared, chained behind his one-left ear. He bore, out of his back, an appendage wrought third arm, that had a clay-like blob-fish head contorted. Hardened, as was said, distorted, with moving eyes, socketless that crawled aside, cockroach style, but bore the likens of spinning angels. It looked like a raggedy thing, lacking in a lower jaw, a filthy sock-puppet made of metal, wrought out of the back-entrails of a muck-wrought in creature, fallen apart.

It gave the orders, it bore its ruby-eyes red, it could barely draw breath, but there it stood, in front of them, the living dead:

'You ought to have come sooner than this, there's barely anything left in here.'

'And who are you supposed to be?'

'Out of fear, I think I shall omit any side, as to partake any. Let alone, will I do something against the nature of this place, shh, be silent for a moment before any of them die.'

A few creatures were lowered in, hard-encased in square-filled caged, fillings-gelatin. Only their outstanding arms could be seen as well, that had been, with the help of a lot of pressure been bloodied by friction.

The ceiling was set in many square-s –egmented, delimited by strange sprawls, but every few of them, surrounding one of the 'trapped' was a fake spongy cartilage, keeping him in place and alive. Feeding him, them, all:

'Soon enough, you shall be granted the least of life, the slice, of trifling, and set-on thrice, will there be another chance to spare, a chance to prove yourselves worthy of rising up with the rest of them.'

'I do not see any lowering chain, how are they, how it this possible?'

'That alone you don't have a right to look into or tell of. It would rather be unpleasant if you looked too further into it.'

'Is there anything left of any other man who's been here?'

‘ Not that I know off, but know ye. That lesser things await outside, those whom had been mongrelized.’

‘ What of life then, has it been preserved in any quantifiable manner?’

‘ Of course it wasn’t, not a single man would ever dare think of it that way.’

‘ Then what?’

Michael Kornshaw, so-so, dared step in. He turned towards the other two. Both clearly bothered. Incapable of dealing with the strain.

Part of him wasn’t there, it was fifteen hundred miles in the back, with a single standing bag holder trying to cross a Lapp on the gloomy door he rested on top of, his body being dishelmed, disjointed. Barely walking, before he took a nip off the door. He’d seen something carved inside of it, at the very least, it was something he tried looking into, getting his grubby hands ever so closer to the one beneath him. Seeing how he already gave in to a most sublime stop, he started putting his fingers in, trying to access something hidden inside of him, inside of it; whereas by his right there was another man, who was purposefully staring at his strange Olomok plastic holder, a semi-aquatic pool being held within the twist of a melon and a silver sledge, completely warped around it. He had already tried getting a word in but failed in his attempt to utter a single word. No one’s listening, he whispered.

‘What are doing down there and why is that thing stuck to your arm?’ ‘

‘ I don’t know just yet, but, I have to peel this off him, I need to eat a piece of the floor and scour it with my gritty teeth.’

‘ Why do you need to do it?’

‘ I can’t help myself, stranger, I simply can’t, my armadillo is inside of it, he ate it, the bastard and the floor, upon eating him, it’s eaten my pet as well by spine-assembly assimilation.’

‘ You’re not getting him back, I can see it already, the walls are filled with scales, you know what that means, don’t you?’

‘ I beg to differ, I think you’re the one who refuses to understand what’s going on in here, I truly like this, and what’s become of my desire to get him back. It’s not that he’s been eaten or I searching for him, but the hole it made down there, beneath the fellow, inside.’

Though he couldn’t point at it with full or nigh-supreme confidence, he. Knew it was there, inside that incessant, puckery-drop, that hole beneath the earth, underneath the corpse, dug in by vandal hands, gone through a gap and a hole, incapable of seeing it through at first, he considered pounding through the corpse.

‘ You see now, it’s the armadillo, he’s more of a pool ball that found its way in the inner-tunnel made out of this man’s gut, whose entrails entered the hole-roach made inside, beneath the point where he dug.’

‘Esquire, you need to stop before you lose a finger, or that thing in your hand. What are you even holding?’

‘Part of it is already gone, and part of me wants it to be done as well, don’t try turning me away from it, this can only turn into. There are, wait, there are people there, off the block.’

To their sides, many of them, at least a few meters back and forth, bloated and kept in place before being allowed to move back and forth and then again, resuming their strange movements, in utmost unsanitary ways; dark walls being polluted with incessant dark and tall, molded out of graven coughs, liquefied, hardened, cast like cement in these blocs. Carefully aligned and animated in some unnatural way neither of them could grow out of, or the likens, similarity to the bolden grave they lived on top off.

They weren’t natural either, as one would expect, not even as blocky as pyramid stones.

Fishing plaque spears appeared to be the separators, highly inclined towards the opposite wall, near which both of them stooped towards, but most importantly, they whipped it, incessantly so. Unnaturally dark marks being left here and there, molded-with fallen over, darkly’a’matter fallen-throughs, that came from broken holes left by their pierced-through holes, slashes, pointers. They gave birth to tiny flying pieces of the cave-ins, flying origamis with scrawls resembling fallacious maws and many carved in fathers whom sung for their daughters, whom were dead but trailed along the halls. A chaos of hallways after, and on in-between; conjoined with their arms, blindingly searching, but no father yelled for either one of them to come, as thin and pointy dancers, hardly in their scowls would attempt to near them.

Then, before either man could dig in, and see the drop beneath the ground. Or on the other side, farther away, leaping towards a closed door where the bullet-honed a simple fall. One of the fallen panels stared crawling in. Kept above and thinning out, with every second being allowed to breathe aloud, as one finely painted maiden drew as well:

‘I finally made a return in my own home, dear Margery, I seek thee but you shall not answer after, or come yonder as to give me a sing, that you have kept your mother, never asking for you now, in your heart, most blessed of remarks that happens to survive.’

Drenched as she was, dressed in corny flour; off her shoulder came a single arm. It was pointy and had, down to four or eight, empty mouths; of all and all, they pointed at each side, they opened, their elongated tongued evolved, filled with broken spikes, caterpillars in disguise, making them look like porcupines, spitting trails of acid, as their rotten nature, made all the verdure and what came in-between appear. A brown-like dusk neared, and as soon as she appeared, someone sneered at her, like the petty thing she was. A remark was given forth. A chitinous giant head, a shell split in half as well, with a bubbly throat connected to a giant bloated egg, capable, and done so, to float, forth, it had. And curved like a strange thing, with Pynchon’s face but merely melted upon this shield it brought or prided itself as to be the bearer of a single head. Its side ‘ears’ and of deer, fork-lightning of skin-mount hoses filled with creeping sneer, wrought it to begin at last:

‘Have you come again looking for her?’

Has she not left to attend to your errand ten, no, eighteen minutes ago as such?’

‘I have no recollection of any of this happening at all, perhaps, you of all would so kindly remind me if you’d dare?’

‘I could not such a thing just yet. What if she heard me?’

‘What if she did? That I wonder just as well, but lo’, I would not hope to take it away from you, not while knowing of what you’re capable of doing if left to your own devices, to know of my forebodings with my daughter as such.’

Various people formed a group. They all entered it and shook, the small boisterous device, they had been locked inside of it they were in a giant helicopter with legs.

It is a prison – section cut off from the rest of the lowest-mid-area, where some of the lower-open mouthed Plecchens started in, their dance of lichen drawing after:

One of the elongated tubes coming from on top the ceiling started pushing out, lowering itself even closer than it had been before, in accordance to their position. They were being fed, a most disgusting looking liquefied muck that started pouring livid-sugar into them, feeding their guts like the animals they were, always trying to take a bite out of their throats, these semi-formed creatures, these dead-fish and the other dark creatures whose limbs appeared in the wrong places, and on the wrong spots whenever they were being fed.

‘What is this?’

‘A growth Ezhleshe-Glikki, a growth no less, you must draw away from It before it spreads, for when it does.’

‘Get away from the plower-feeder, I need a second ration for what’s to come.’

They were in a hen-room more likely than a normal chamber, prison-like only in drop and how they were made to suffer down there, whenever it was pleasant, or obscure, whenever the jailor came into the room and stood by their side, it was only then, then and only then when they would start going around, playing with their minds, exposing their radiator-cages of cabbage-bone, set by their side:

‘Will you allow us to leave?’

‘Not yet, you need to serve for a little longer while, for all is necessary for the great plan, one that shall accuse you all of.’

‘Accuse?’

‘Of course, I meant something else, indeed I have.’

The Jailor Hlyeghshe, ugly creature like a pill with two hardened pawns of bone-cartilage resin, one a hat and the other, a rotten depressed-downwardly set ‘platform’ he rested upon. And he was but many tendons, a prison himself that connected both blobby ends. Many sharp-receding in and out, sharpened blades came out of the mass, but it was hardened chitin everywhere. Only at the top and below, what appeared to be contorted and aligned around the two balloonlike things were the many images of the desperate folk of desperate yolk in color and in texture, which attempted to fight it, yet found themselves, distraught, carved in, incapable of flight and trapped. But the blades were flaccid, plumpily fat, and open ended, peashooters, noisemakers, while the creatures around him were depressed, actually sad, and saddened to each end.

They piled up in a corner for a moment, staring at the jailor as if he had been a kindergarten reader:

‘It feels rather awful being here, waiting, brooding, ruminating, being incapable of escaping, what is life outside these walls?’

‘Broken, wasted, and much, much worse than that, the world is unrecognizable. Living here, in this alternative is a mercy. For every single one of us, that’s why I’m asking you to wait a little longer until the adjacent areas are made better, by some means, then you’ll be free to do whatever you please and walk wherever you desire beyond this thin box.’

‘Why can’t I be freed first? What if I want to live out there, in that broken world?’

‘You won’t survive for long and freeing you would simply be a means to an end.’

‘What if I want to do it either way?’

‘Unfortunately that is not for you to decide. There are rules and stakes here we can’t simply brush off just because you can’t accept it.’

‘I want to leave, Jailor.’

‘Fare well then, because of your contemptuous riot and imprudence, I decided that you are to leave my presence and not be seen from this point on.’

It only took a moment before it was gone. And even then they all feared something might happen immediately after, like a block of stones falling on top their heads or worse, heading the echoes that did rise and rose. Long before he entered the scene, of such a loss would he have found himself thinner, as to look aside.

Part of the roofing has to be fixed. It’s worn-out, worming, stone-figures, scrawled but made alive within the span of eight months, whoever the culprit was, he knew not only what he was doing prior to this incessant scratch-through of nails and, perched-in, drawls of blood, of clot and splatters that moved along, with patched of forest muscle filled with eely-things, nail-long, but pouncing in upon themselves, they neared, within the period of time or near. It wasn’t cushioned, one of the rocks that fell from, between them. Between the ranks, that being before and afore-flight, which followed straightly, thin, and much-to-it as would’ve been, another one of these cells moved.

‘Cell fifteen Ghyorlyk, moving through, I supposed you wouldn’t.’

‘Course you did, you knew me better than to try, plus, have you seen what that place looks like? It’s a miracle it’s still standing with so many of them moving it.’

He missed a clicking button. It shook in place and took some space off while they moved the ‘cargo’ from one side to another, right before passing the right one down.

‘See and take notes, I’m going to have to test your knowledge later.’

Shh, don't breathe.

He thought, he knew.

No one wanted to draw attention onto them, especially since it was watching, carefully, closely. Flying ever-near; on top of a switch-blade with a partially drawn out knife shaped blade, forming an L, on top of it rested a growth, hardened, polished, like a blocky stone. Out of which, an elongated wire, its throat but eely, fleshy, connected to an elongated skull, but tattered, that of a seal-or-a-jackal-or a canine, bearing at its end two giant toothy-things, pointing down as well. Eyeless, but from the distance, the wretch had seemed, if the teeth and the end of the blade were to be aligned, a heart, within its grasp, indicative of its round contortions, drawn on a wall.

He spat acidic smoke as well, whenever one approached, as if to tell, the land was not to be threaded on, this system would fall, it were the one in charge. And if he willed it.

But it was.

'Inert sharpies, cowl-wearing, large orangutans, they pray.'

It drew towards them, a most obtuse filthy-ingrained in it being. Like two peas aligned, one wider, bigger than the other in the back. Termite-pointers sticking out, the wearer bore only a single dark, human eye. Whereas from its giant abdomen that rested in the back, sprouted an elongated carrying shaft which bore a large gelatin basin, a water-vase shape with a single organ in, an infatuous fat man belly pumping heart it carried along.

Although pain could not be seen, this warpedly deformed base of gelatin merely drew backwards in no stranger place it could find itself in. It could not draw farther from where it stood upon being met by one of a much similar kin. One that was anything but ill-to find out who it were in front of him, standing. Resting in a trap of melted-gelatin, where most walls were thinned out, one by one and made to waste away, and rotten.

Whereas the men that were broken, never had they had themselves brought upon the toils that fell. Stood a rotten king that told them:

'Lesser ones, bring yourselves forth.'

It's hard to tell sometimes, what a prison is like:

'I've been trying to set notes for you gangrells, filthy parasites, termites, filthy things you are. But you never dare, as such respond.'

They were dirtied, soiled and looked much wrong, to their likens, all but fashioned into every wall. Many of them fallen apart, and were still struck by a process of proton decay.

'A Quantum worship shall bring you naught, as all continues to fall apart.'

Another one, much to him, he was more than likely to be disturbed, just by the plain look of its eyes, the many that gathered, then popped like flies, one by one, malodorously fell behind:

‘And there’s the culprit, the one that drags near, you of all, will have to disappear. If I don’t find myself wasting away within the hour, I will have found nothing to attach to, yet I will survive.’

‘Who’s the looker this time around?’ A piggyback malformed asked, he was pushing in as if to cast all ailments of ill aside of him.

A miscreant joined him, tall man, chest and head projected, until looking like a shingle, head was brought down and he only had an eye, an arm, two legs and glowed despite the puckery muck body that almost threatened to fall apart at the slightest snare. And many of them threatened him unless he kept his distance, there. He approached the wild-waste.

It was the patch of green in this incessant closed-up pentagon within which they stood and never asked for less:

‘The jailor will never come, you realize that, don’t you?’

Closer had he come, in a matter of, rather a few moments, he would’ve found himself miss-caught, like a draught In which he drowned his sorrows. Standing by his side, he asked if he could borrow.

‘One of your many left-over limbs, I swear I shall give you one, if I could only make a cut within, acceptable reason, there won’t be an issue drawn forth.’

‘I shall make the preparatory arrangements, in order for you to take what is righteously yours, but be warned, I wane in place, and all falls apart if I refrain from muttering the quantum incantations. There are falsities involved in every single one of them, that of which you should be aware of.’

‘What will happen to me if one of them refuses?’

‘One?’

‘To join by body, and of course, I would not be as crude as to only take one. If I were only to take a finger, all would be wasted, all this track, upon which I thought only to rest and plow, of strangulated walls, and claimed from them what it is mine.’

‘How many of them will you claim from me?’

‘As many as I can make do, out of, and go through, numbering, or venturing as far as to take hundreds of them. But only after I will have facilitated their growth, which could not only take a way, but you know well what that means.’

‘I could be absorbed by all of them during the process, and that is something I could not easily make do with. Suffice to say, my body’s stiff and I am frozen. Just like them, they’re made of chitinous ploycarkian gelatin. It could fall apart even during the growth, I could become a mount as I stand threatened, and be absorbed with the rest of everything lain around this place.’

‘It is a risk you shall and I will force you to take, any and all that is necessary for me to make I through as well as I can push it forth, instead.’

‘Will you be as kind to bring me that thing over there?’

In the middle of the room, what had been solidly cut by what appeared to be, large horizontal, vertical and over the head slashes were standing frames of blotted material, an iron-changed wax that prevented all but all and all from approaching or drawing near without risking being cut. Even though it was mostly superficial since these thin things were, after all, the solidified 'birth-marks' of cut-masses, which leashed from on top their standards at whoever was closest, they were still to be thoroughly approached a while. For obvious reasons; even the gelatin basined-cracked in the back pumpers knew better than to approach. Instead, they formed a congregation in a dark corner, forming a great ape' like puddle of oozing green in which all of their beating organs rested inside of. Their beadiness looked bleary.

Even from the distance they still managed to get away with doing it. While opening their mouths, long swatter limbs, elongated within the range of seven hundred fifty one meters away from them, deucedly hanging, as they rested against the floor; relaxes segments only now revealing slightly open globular hole protrusions, out of which came long reeling in and out vapor-makers. That chilled the room.

As the temperature lowered, even for what appeared to be fifteen minutes or so, the mid-piece in the middle of the pentagon relaxed itself.

The 'man', whom had interacted with the leper, or at least one of the ones that weren't molded to the main structure of the walls had already stopped his advance.

Whereas the man known as Kornshaw had been lifted up and the elevator, while having entered this cell, released a pheromone puff from the bud-like attachments connected to its inner frame. As hallow and rotten as it was, the plain lifted-up appendages fell on the ground even before an involuntary reaction might've kicked in.

He was already two steps in, when, stopped, as to look around, was dumbfoundedly struck in place by a sight of many, barely interacting creatures that had fallen over, on top of one another, from just about every side. At the same time, the only creature standing before him was an incredibly tall man, with missing patches, slowly encumbered by its very own frame, only began advancing and stopping during the few second gaps he allowed for that movement to occur. Saw's ever step but providing a clear response as for the derangement the one in front of him proceeded with.

'You've come to deliver something to me, no?'

Although they were rather unaware of the intricacies that appeared to revolve around the constantly being lowered, then drawn upon the longest, most innocuous systems, they still existed in a strange pseudo-vacuum-like space, like cradles being attached to one another by appendages keeping a hold of one another in the same way shaking arms are, while being even more outlandish and violent looking than anything seen prior. Largely twisted and filled with many pointy grabbers that would enter specifically designed inside the opposite inert cartilage to which they are attached to – holes, being lodged inside of as to promote a complete block that would fend off any possibility of release. They were akin to living scythes that expanded out of their lodged in blocks of stone. Capable of eerily jerking as they were forced to numbly set themselves against the surface drawing along every possible facet of the floating cages they were set inside.

The one flying cell-bloc floating on top of it bore its tulip thick appendage, that sprouted beneath it in an almost completely, nigh-curved at an angle, stretch that aimed itself towards the lower floating cell, against whose slightly, standing out curved scythe was now close enough to being released from its grasp, no longer being a scythe as both of them curved twistingly against one another, having only formed two fat spears, upon being wrapped against one another, barely in time to prevent their release from each other's pincer like clasping. The lower cell had its limb coming from the side, and when seen together, as they were alike, had but momentarily formed a crane, with a fat body and a fat head. An itchy, dark-filled and fallen apart throat lay there, filled with many puncture holes.

But they were merely caught in their clockwise twist around and beyond the Pentagon-cell that stood, barely placed beyond them, beyond their reach and as far as they could get, there, and it was already getting crowded.

'Kornsaw, my name is Kornsaw. Do we have a disagreement, perhaps?'

'I don't think we do, unless we ought to start one since you haven't brought what I asked you to. You showed up here empty handed without realizing just what that means.'

'What does it mean?'

'It's. There are cuts that are being made or parts that are grown but they need a set of special, indulgers. You understand that, correct?'

'How could I when you haven't told me anything yet.'

'Step out of the elevator then. You only made a few steps then receded back to your hiding hole, why do you suppose that is?'

'I was startled, that's all, you drove me back, you see? You're quite threatening in appearance.'

'Will you not then go back from where you come from and bring me the indulgers? They are the only means of stabilizing the growth so this entire cell doesn't get fully filled with every livid thing there is inside of him. He's storage, you see? Like every leper before him, he carries the souls of the people that died during the Plague.

If I were to start making the preparatory arrangements and omit one of the key elements that would facilitate a certain control to his growth, there would be no stop to it any longer. And from that point on, who knows what might become of us?'

'Who are you?'

'Call me Clench-Clekke'

'Clenched, I got it, then, Clench-Clekke, will you at the very least tell me what it looks like?'

'I may not but there is someone who knows exactly where it is. And he is capable and mighty and will be capable of informing you of what it looks like. Otherwise, I risk a lot, saying, talking, and informing you about every single thing it is.'

'Please, will you just?'

‘I told you my terms, Kornshaw, you go, I stay, I linger, I wait, those are the terms of our deal.’

‘What do I get from it then? It’s a deal after all.’

‘A pair of growths, we’ll share.’

‘So be it, I think I might put such things to great use.’

‘Indeed you will, I can make sure of it, at least, I can, most certainly make sure of it.’

It laughed, in an almost malignantly forlorn manner. He may be missing a few pairs on a side, but he seemed trustworthy enough.

As soon as they settled on it, the entire room shook, as he left the way he came, as the frames came back into place as well. He was not going to simply give in.

Between twenty or so minutes that were made of walking, unaccounted for, he was stopped.

Conjoined with a piece of the ceiling that made his hat.

‘He didn’t tell me.’

It was too late to turn now, it’s been a few minutes of walking now. But the lower depressions, whereas there were these floating stair-case tubes that appeared and disappeared were just about everywhere, or at least whenever a crate got delivered. They were attached to the cells that moved. The ones in place appeared to be connected to large platforms that made the entire framing of the entire prison complex. At the very least, that little solace he received from knowing there was a ground to stand upon was much to his pleasure welcome. For the time being, at least; further down the line, a three-crossroads revealed three left-over elevators that had been set there, waiting for him as to choose.

He had forgotten which way he came, and which way he’d go.

His had had ugly deformed figures of cut-in blood men-fencing with blood-rapiers between one another. Each with a real human evil eye; with swampy deformed dark triangle-writings-akin to hieroglyphs, but with different variations that almost made them look like wildly deformed ellipses. It was no stone but a deformed-eaten through iron, that by now was attached to his head. Bars had wrung through his sockets, and he missed eyes, but could still see through his senses. As they formed images in his head; his fingers were also reed-thin bamboos with knife-bulb formations as their ends. His legs were split in seven or eight cuts, were thin-but hardened-filled themselves with mass, and were forced to walk like the pages of a book skimmed upon, at an unfathomable speed, but back-and forth in terms of bodily tilting and of motions.

The elevators were also set in moving large transparent cylinders but they weren’t the ones that disappeared. Although the ones that did sometimes appeared, in, or dressed, into the most spectacularly filled with dark, unfathomably hard to stare at geometrical shapes that formed pseudo-humane but concavely deformed figures that were trapped inside of them. Only for a while. They were thin and flaccid as well, easily drilled through if one had only tried. And they spoke:

‘You are to meet one of the fat, blob-bodied doctors that survived.’

One of the tubes appeared near the edge of one of the open-to the abyss quasi outlined doors, it had a moving mouth thin as a sharpie microscope-submarine device that dangled from one side to another, immediately recognizing him as a 'humanoid' biologic sequence carrying human-derivate, upon the following discovery, having already set itself upon this course of action, 'it' already communicating with one of the laddered tubes that appeared in the middle of nothingness.

Theirs was nothing short and nothing else but a short exchange that had simply shown him what the doctor was like, the hunch-back of organs he carried, the small head, and the mechanical limbs that were projected out of him, turning him into a virus-spider abomination crawling about, in an enclosed bacterial filled with filth zone.

'He's in all three of the cells, you must piece him back together in order to get the indulgers he's grown most fond off.'

'Are you certain of it? They all look closed, out of reach, impossible to get to and much worse than that.'

They would not lie to me, no, it is impossible, they could not lie to me.

Hence he walked in the first one, the area nearest to him being somehow too vacuous even for him to fully approach.

He dreamed of the transparent staircases, they spoke to him at night. He fell asleep in front of the three way crossroad and dreamed of them when the time had come.

But they were the three horns that belonged to a great dark cranium in a space of pure light he floated in.

It spoke to him, while the three of them curved, trying to encompass him in their open hand but never reaching, never grasping what they couldn't. Far ahead and in-between, ever so close, after:

'Will you hear us now and cast yourself in the river? Farther down, sink.

Where the doctor waits and is in wait for you, as for the surgery to finally begin.'

'Should I go on if it hurts?'

'Why must you ask if you know the answer?'

'I'm merely asking for reason, it's all I'm after.'

'Can I ask you something?'

'Go ahead, a take a crack at me.'

'Are there eighteen hundred deformations standing behind you?'

'Huh?'

He turned, and all of the sudden. Rock-puddle flier with jackal-teeth up-front with a goat-molded head cassette tape stuck to its side and a giantly deformed fuselage look-industrial fire extinguisher attached to its side, appeared out of nowhere. It opened its 'mouth, a stove-circle, out of which, four long yellow, blue, red and orange triangles came out of. They stood in front of him.

Each departed from one another, with at least a few meters being left between one another. Most peculiar, enough; one of them opened up as soon as possible, as soon as it could, drawing from breath, taking everything apart, as soon as one man from afar was dead because of the sight. It began unwrapping itself inwardly as if it were a parasite clawing its way through reality, covering itself with chameleon distant-environment looking peels, which looked, for a static-while, as it jerked eerily back and forth, as if the 'sides' of a distant jumping ball had been placed in the wrong spots, not to mention that they didn't blend with the ground or the passing dove itself, that by the time it was done, and this not being a complete invisible or look-a-likeable to the rest of the canopy blend contributing to the fact that that it could only work if seen from a specific angle by one of them, if looked at, specifically, from that exact spot he stood it, yet, it still gave an uncanny valley kind of feeling with the head of a dove with its moving sensual eye was still locked in that place, a most peculiar thing happened just then, in the middle of the frugal formation as of the tiny fingers present in the middle, having already, by the second wink of an eye, become a cluster of a few tens or hundreds or even millions which only then had started changing into the most deformedly destroyed clip-claps, they had revealed a most obtuse sounding flicker from one side to another of the 'area' they were confined into that pushed out the flying dead-rotten body of a rodent. Who has devoured the fingers of one of the many deities of the rottenly fallen apart kingdom beneath the bowels of the burying grounds they had been practicing their dark rituals in, over countless generations. Many great losses finally being driven to a starve:

'I reckon that you're both new here, are you not?'

He dreamed of the one between the rooms as well. When time came to approach, suddenly he rested on top his feet, woken up by the sound of laughter.

'We've sawed your feet off.'

'How, and who are you, bastards?'

But the echoes died off. Without a chance to turn, as quickly as to catch them midriff of where he came out of, there simply was no way to tell who they were or why they did it.

'Bastards, bastards, bastards, how dare you cut off my legs? I'll have to walk on top my hands now, carrying them in my back, without a single pair of extra hands to help me deal with this from this point on.'

And most importantly he knew what the tube was thinking, perhaps he was the one who did it. Crackling his ladder after, drawing or drafting for himself a madly-malady played with elevator after. It was something he was not content with dealing, at least not yet.

'Climbing will be easier if you're using both hands.'

'I need to keep my legs from falling over, you know that.'

Wait, was there not an elevator here, there? On any of the three paths? What have you partaken in while I was asleep, tube?'

‘I confer upon you this. I have no hand in it. Not that I am not lacking in either of those, it’s simply a matter of, soliciting, the way you’ve solicited information from me strikes me as being odd. What happened to you during your sleep, during that lurid dream I’ve yet to have a taste of?’

‘That is neither your concern, nor your business if you don’t mind, don’t make me have a strike at you, or else you may not like what’s going to happen after.’

‘You are wretched and I dislike you, but I’m rather shocked that, despite what’s happened to you, you’re still going. And you plan on going on this direction instead of returning to your prison cell. There are things out there that might ease your suffering, I wager.’

‘Such as you? I suppose anyone in my place would be content with, settling with the consolation prize, but I know better than this.’ He smiled, clever animal, clever, nasty dog.

‘You don’t think it hasn’t crossed my ladder, yet, have you?’

‘I thought I could have one on you.’

‘The surgeon won’t operate on himself, let alone on you, what makes you think he’ll simply brush over what’s been happening to you over the past few months?’

‘I do not only not care, but I also, months?’

I’ve been in a coma for that long?’

‘Unfortunately, I’m afraid there’s been, there’s things that one.’

The prisoner stopped along the way. Poor-minded fool, to think that he had actually made it this far without being affected, without even having, suffice to say, been touched by anything, even by something akin to a hibernation-cut through legs-off peaceful ever-after, they should’ve finished him off. Living like this might end up being torture, beyond it, if the tube was right. Just what was he intending on doing with him?’

‘Tell me, then. I’m listening, what’s been going on past these few months?’

In the prison:

A caged fighter appeared to be the first creature to have stumbled upon him. As a matter of fact, he was elated, pure-out-of-joy. There was just nothing standing between the two of them, and hopping over, taking what was rightfully his, to the employ of the other men. Forty four attached to him, all caged, but their legs were all on the sides and through the bars they pushed on, again:

‘Should we listen to the boss? He’s told us not to approach him. He’s dangerous, from what I’ve heard, perhaps even worse than that. He could be contagious.’

Eighty six candles lighted, but he was the one prepared to do the touching. Standing in the front, face painted in an irresolute white-blue pink laced with bubbles red and other strange dots attached to his forehead that was a dark-triangle with cinder-block growths coming out of it, many of whom had widely psychotic flashing eyes that went through hundreds of gradients of colors before finally large, thin stalactites came out of them, elongated, appendage-like brushing across the prisoner's body.

'This one's fresh, he's pure, is he not? I seem to be of the. I think I've reached a conclusion. He's not dead yet, he's not de-butchered just yet but I wager this could somehow still change as long as I am here. As long as I can still do something about it, I shall do it.'

'Who is the wretch of the sky?'

'What is that, caged slave? Who gave you permission to talk?'

All of the sudden, the Caged-Master looked all the way back to a barely aligned line that appeared to rattle both left and right, many of the iron bars flashing in and out of sight, as they only waggered one another's taken-through after-lights. They were afraid as well, good. Great, these things. These wretches are not only beneath me but they also need to be kept under control. Unless clearly maintained, I do not know what would happen to them. If I were to; rattle, rattle, it came as a shock. It vibrated between them like bells hitting one another's sides in a most undisciplinary manner.

A shockwave of the sorts; that drove through every single one of them, it drilled through their heads, the main idea, that being, do not dare question the chief in charge, the master. Some of the candles had been blown off by the ricochet effect. Master is flattered by the effectiveness of all. Master, the master must be listened to, before something goes wrong.

'Just what am I looking at, if not the most incontestable, brat? You, little brat ought not to be alive in here, sitting in the cold.'

The tube appeared and it drew near, before the time had yet to disappear. It eyed them most colloquially so, as in the swamps.

There was no possible way to settle this dispute on amiable terms; therefore there could only be one way this could unfold, as predictable as it was, they brought the great empty corpse-cast in; placing it in the middle of a decently shaped foyer, that was devoid of any 'emotion' that also looked rather, than doing it out of spite, they settled with trying to examine the outer wounds.

'Cleary, there are signs of.'

It began levitating, a few meters off the ground, while also having taken most of the cables along with it. There should be no problem at all, judging by the fact that there were a few ill-placed 'hikers' who happened to have clicked their bodies shut in, some of the most peculiarly fashioned ways, as they only stood there, not to make a scene. But at the very least one of them began lowering himself down.

By the mere, simplistic way in which he was walking, one could draw out the fact that, he knew whom this corpse had been, when alive.

How could they even do this to the poor fellow? A mess, indeed:

'I say, we should start removing piece by piece out of him, only that way we can truly make sure he is truly alive. There's a demon hid inside of him, at this very moment, caged master. I've not only seen it but I had been feverishly avoiding its insolence', as to much us no less than it ought to. At least, I've found its peculiar existence to be much to its contempt unsatisfactorily defunct. It's trying to gnaw at us, when we're but plain to see disturbed by its most insolent queries.'

'And you propose we open this man up and do things to him that none else in his turn would have him.

Ah, a pity I intent on crushing his nose, splitting him whereas none of the, least amount of growths would come; but at least you've tried.'

'If you kill him here the demon might escape and infest one of us? Or even, yourself.'

'What is that? Do you seriously think that simple trick would work on me?'

The Caged-master was suddenly interrupted.

It couldn't work, it definitely couldn't work. But it was worth a shot, otherwise, it would've been all for nothing, in which case, one final push could somehow do it, he wagered. And waned with each strike, and drew closer to him, step by step, like a sextant filled crazed maniac with a little mind, barely moving if not for the on-lookers that drew from various open slits. Some of the cuts were rather dim. But they glowed nonetheless.

'Lyietl-Nigger, it's our pet's name. Our slave without a face, which we have taken along, after cutting it apart from the farm we stole him, taken out and after. We've chased the masters off the premise of their ranch, and would've whipped them as well, as they were niggers themselves, but that is not to be taken lightly for they were tawny burnt.'

And the horses, they had missed them, and would've come out of dirt, if only they had known of soil, what it looked like, what they could do with it, if that was their plan. Not a single nigger made it through. But they tried to prolong their lives as far as they could, nor would they do it, if only they understood.

'As benign as the country had been, we've slain many of them here and there, only to have found ourselves met by something beyond uncanny.' It was hard to explain, but the country was riddles with many planted oaks and various other branch-filled disturbing growths, many of which had lynch-ropes strung and thrown about, poses of witch-like burning things only coming second to some. But nonetheless, were they exposed-as in skinned alive, melted as well, still fallen apart.

'He's one of the only ones that survived as long as we could hope to do it. Implant something in his mind to turn him forever subservient to us and what we forced him do.'

'And what is that now?'

He asked one of these bizarre-minded wretches, whom had already three snot-riddled with meat, drawn out of them, talons that were dangling from one side to another, trying to get a fissure barely exposed. There were things the animal felt that would've made even the weakest corpses wake up and rose he did. Likely aroused by pain, dandily so; it spoke to massa:

'Massa saved us, massa cleansed us of the ills of mind! Massa, massa, massa saved us!'

Short lived, nonetheless. It, the creature, stood eighteen meters away from the Simian, wildly dangling a second, flying outside the outer-socket of body appendage, carelessly aligned. At first an issue, but flabbergasted by this wait, it finally removed its talon, dragged away to its side, the shot, right through his head, gone done through his chest, then came out to his right, where it finally receded into a small, little wasp-like thing that bounced against one of the walls that rested in front of it. A few shrapnel pieces finally drawing aside it; while its animal-slave was so-much-so, as to itself, very much, and rather wet, left to its own accord; not a single man acknowledged it. Not that it bothered anyone.

‘The lantern of pus, this artifact that neither of us have ever known of or ever understood, what’s it about it that attracts us to it?’

‘You may still leave before they realize what’s happening to it.’

‘What is?’

‘It’s grown to such proportion that’s begun dictating the very, very, incessant thing that is the growth of the cages themselves. You would not enjoy looking at it.’

‘What of the man you’re poking?’

‘You did not allow me the satisfaction of finishing, if you will.’

‘Go ahead, caged cater. I am still of silken mind, as such as to ask, where is the.’

‘Allow me to finish still.’ Cried the master yet again, as a disfigured creature would’ve done in any other way it could. Or if it meant expressing it, as such, would they have understood?’

‘A march, it’s, what it is, a march, as for the inmates to escape. We’re counting on the awakening of this man so we may pass the cross, the three of them as we make our way along, ending up wherever this incessant thing might lead us to.’

‘Even if you’re damned by any of the choices, if not all, will you still take that path that leads you thus, be strung aloud? You’re all made of one piece and that alone cannot be found or missed. I’m afraid there’s but nothing separating you from whichever cruelty one may avoid as to prevent you from harm’s way, to your tawny reasoning, of burnt-out mind.

Every single one of you will die, if you draw along.’

‘We can separate at will, plus, they’re subservient to me.’

He knew that, and for that reason, he once made them eat a giant sphere, a giant snail, a disgusting deformed tower made out of men, large nails with legs, a hat shaped like a peculiar demonical figure with twenty wings instead of its calves and forearms, a diamond shaped bat-face, a square-with-numbers on it, a few demigods, beaten down champions, mad-men with leaves instead of faces, which sprouted out of their concave-nails filled with weirder eyes. And they choked on everything, multiple times. On no account of eve, would they have complained at all, wretched they were, wretched they be.

Sickened by this kind of treatment and these kinds of act, it was tenderly obvious enough that, a long time ago, shaky times, those being, have they learned not to trust the caged master and to play along whenever time had cast them anywhere else where they might look and see. Whether or not they cast themselves out of it; of every stone-alike shattering, incumbent poultry of iron that could cut through them as iron-sharp virulent tire-iron that could come and cut them, still, they eerily traced the movements, bred, out of the many widely split reflections that bounced with wild refraction from the various chiseled walls, against the surfaced-facets of their eyes, having signaled prior of what was going on, to be as subtle as to show whenever he prepared himself to open his mouth, the master that being, giving himself way too often to the obvious, never-to-be-met by second guessing of intentions that followed after, still. There was as little of an explanation as to why they still poked him still. These disgusting creatures and the men, who stumbled upon it, then; they refuted one another:

‘My army of caged twins, conjoined fiends and beasts threaten and will threaten if my will demands of them to destroy everything in sight.’

It was proven before this even happened. Before this altercation could even come to pass, since they all suffered of the same thing, that being, a hunt for a way out, being more than compatible with being called a barbarous torture of a most entrapped sufferer whose never-ending torture may never be as much incalled into question, as being placed beyond anyone's above any who's, as there to be a hierarchy which there wasn't. Dangerous words of fight and trouble seeped in the air. And during that dream, the man appeared to be trapped in as well, although at a different level, many of the cages appeared to shake as well. The doctor split in three, could tell.

Their constitution wasn't upstanding and they were weak-willed to such a degree that it was satisfactorily, named, in part, sub-human; as they were all mutations, melting and falling apart. Many of the cages shook within reason, being annoyed by their stop, since they could feel it in the same way a man's arm would have to bear through a lazy caterpillar's walk across the full-width of his entire arm.

Pretton the Fourth, born out of the Conjoled World inside one of the fallen apart but filled with disgusting spike headed cells, which laughed at him still, twisted in the back, whose face was brought to face the eight diamond' cyst inside the crime-filled melt point bore through, where the weird eyed cylinder constantly appeared, but on a sixty degree incline and fifty meters off the initial position he was or is normally seen in, being merged now with a weird almost molar-shaped sea-jelly elongated 'flat-compact' box creature with a cord attached to its side, bearing even four 'legs' as if they were roots, but twisted around like horned lizards or unicorns, as such, pointing downwardly, and doggedly as their hybridization was in reality, more assorted in terms of the color and the shape distribution between their exchange, the vision of which, or in which they've been displayed in having only lasted for a few minutes, before it vanished away. But what he saw, while, expecting to spy on the caged master as to predict when he would try lowering his self-esteem as to banish him in a realm of anguish had ended up, precisely, to be put, so, doing nothing. His mind was beyond saving. And all of them were under severe torture.

Every iron-bar around their bird-cages, both inside and outside were spiked; with fast spinning drills, shaped like niggers, with high-heels.

First half of the doctor:

Crowned with a dark hat bearing three great horns, pointing inwardly at a floating jewel of growths, that were lumped and bore appendages that were all bejeweled at their ends, in the same way pincers would bear crystal ships, so did they, but cyst-like in nature, sailless and without the likes of men to churn the wheel.

The first half of three, which was actually a half in its 'entirety' bore a long leg that had no foot and was more like an abruptly rising pulse-rate checker's curve-made, bell curve shaped but like hills, lumps of put-together deformities that spread across his body. His arm was the size of a, and the relative shape of the front of a pilot's cockpit, rounded up pseudo dome, or a horizontally rotated man's chest, where the hand connected with the ribs or would've pointed downward, at the ground, but stitched together with the rest of him as if he were an abomination and not a man. His throat was a pole with many black cords and only half his face and his beard remained there.

If the prison complex was dark, he rested in a world of dreams, a vivisection of verdure, growths, flowers and dream-like beings that surrounded him.

A giant soil-made arm pushed out Terracotta armies that scouted the area he was in. They were automatic. The Half-doctor cursed the air-density with primate-curses that turned stone to gray. Painting them so they would stand out; predators are hard to spot in nature when they blend with their surroundings. Although the human eye has evolved in such ways as to distinguish eighteen billion shades of green; which was all rendered unnecessary. Even if the stone-statues would've stood out anyway because of their already, partially contrasting shades; it was irrelevant.

'Divined creature, Casenmalefh, I call upon you for answers, where is the body I've been working on for the last thirty years? The same one I've been performing countless surgeries on top of?'

It refused to address him as anything other than the wretch he was.

A golden piece of thread that was curated after being mixed with an alloy-champion melting men drew breath again, distracting him, else since. Nothing much happened. Devoid of the needs of hunger, he simply waited, and wailed.

The thumbs are standing at the top of a world without fingers, all of which were taken out of the stumps of most unkind hands, playing ukuleles, they were made.

It couldn't be forgotten after, not in the least.

'I live on top the ceiling.'

Said the man on the ceiling, whose ends, farther ends, the ceiling was but decrepit and broken instead. Worn out by the looks of it, completely wrecked; couldn't see past it but it was there instead.

Streets of Nak

This time of the year, moonparcel blue from the looks of it, bloated with teenage kids on bicycles, running around the off-side shore, the dark side of the road, listening to old tunes by Floyd, they've been gagging around for hours passing rubber-chews between their mouths, hand to hand they pinned a girl off the road and put her in the van, they saw it. Before they could even gather around, she was gone.

A flock of rider stopped near the side, where the cars stopped.

One of the kids:

'Did we just witness a murder? Have we actually?'

'I don't know, I don't think she's dead yet.' Twoshoe cried at Andolf, both of them were just as quiet as a little robust crane with a clotty cotton prick around his rummage-through neck; they waited.

Some of the riders came in just as soon, jostling about their jugulars.

'Think we should follow on their track?'

'I don't know whether or not this is a good idea.'

'It is and we must follow it wherever it goes, otherwise who knows what they might do to the young cunny they took away from us, they kidnapped her and most likely intend on doing the worst possible things adult men could do to a young prepubescent girl; a nymph.'

'That sounds nasty, but how are we going to stop them, CHILDREN?'

'We have to try something at the very least.'

They didn't notice the peculiar flying tormented bloated orangutan nigger-like body cast that appeared to be floating above them with its wild little pegs of iron-poisoning strange accesses that formed outside its body. Bloated as it were, little features could barely be made after a while, as it happened, for every side of the creature to split as to look like a sudden scoop of lard-cream that was then but pounded with a pair of rusty forks, until the only distinguishable features from what remained floating above the looked as if they were drawn from another dimension and were by no means part of the creature they were residing inside of, since, they were sharp as in blades, unnaturally so, until no longer could they be held inside and appeared to protrude out of a nickel-like surface that hid inside the lower-layers, most of which were even deeper, if not deeply set inside. A pair of dark-heads were popping in and out, simian-painted skulls-in ivory black from the looks of it, tar-like but red glowing crystals that looked like flares that couldn't help themselves but keep the engines going. Dripping below them, the road was no longer placed upon an incline.

There was no shame in waiting for their mouths to open since most of the biker's heads weren't even attached to the rest of their bodies. And the roads was but tapestry-bland and red coral, indeed it was, too nice for anyone to bash and rip on, since for the last time and the most obvious of reasons, they had no control over their actions, really didn't. But followed through as they but sniffed as well, they weren't dogs and the girl that was kidnapped wasn't a bitch in heat, at least not yet.

Upon the hour they had attempted several times to address this issue to either of the parents that might've been present around the time and the house they ventured at, and as much as it appeared to be exactly nothing else but what to be expected, they were met only by scowls coming out of the taller-than-the buildings near which they stood adjacent to, adults. Whom were but giant, their guts were chained and open-through and looked as if they were but made by the militia to be completely contained in, by force. Moody-evil they looked. Their faces were but open and appeared to bear arms that pushed in and out, until they carried a numbness of the dark limbs. Many of the adults fell, breaking the city as well in their retreat, some of whom were broken in the head-split from the looks of it and made to reel back in and out, lost.

Inside the van:

By the time they neared the control panel, it all nested in, the insides of which were but put through such channels, and wasted in the basket of disease. What followed through as much as it could be settled past the hour, had to make a difference.

'I've almost come to see it, I've almost reached the hour where I could directly worship what's left of him. I see my god and I wonder now, who has taken him away from me? Whom had cut him just as such? And whom might I be able to call upon now that my time had finally been brought to an end?'

'You ask of us to allow you to die with him, perhaps?'

'Anything but to lay, with what is held and what it is; I seek to live in ignorance and in bliss.'

'Then you may cover your eyes and cover your mouth and lay inside a see-through navel. You may rot in it and bother us not.'

'What have I done to deserve it?'

'We don't call the shots.'

'Then perhaps you should blur between them.'

'Why? Think you can do better?'

'I think I can.'

Both of them were Incas, who set the young girl into one of the malformed-looking decay-panel, which had already planted its roots around the eight look-through facets that were lain around and adorned everything that was set on every wall as well as everything else that seemed to float in the air. Their teeth were broken and appeared to chomp on anything they could lay themselves on top off, as long as they could and for as long. Eighty eight-eight, was the clock's hour, on top of them. Watching the world carefully through one of the pillar-baton, an ice-cream cone crematorium where the corpses were floating in the air. The van had no engine, it only worked as long as the dark-corpses flew around and followed the van carefully, as to make sure nothing was happening without them paying a distinctly set direction. In whichever way they looked, stop signs. It was the wrong zone, wrong zone, nothing better left to prod.

At the nearing of a merriment faction, they were greeted inside a thorax-shaped unnatural faction-holdout where they hid. Behind it, a desert; while everything else was bizarrely shaped in the most unfashionably cut-out manner. Fakes upon fakes following through as they were moved, pinned on spinning wheels, they were actioned by the machines.

A dark man with an ugly puff-out lip and sunken teeth spat out.

He was wearing a trash-cat for his body suit, a giant cat with no eyes, and no claws, and he was wrapped around by military belts, and wore a strange helmet that looked like an isosceles shape, that was rounded at the top and appeared to cast upon each sight but a disembodied head that was his, the man inside the strange head-device, his helmet being a combination of the King Leer and a Photon operator, and a compactor, lawn-mower and little more cardboard deformation on the side. Seen from the front, a huge almost bucket-thick throat lead to a squared missile-like shape almost like a nuclear fat boy warhead, that bore a strange spring coming out of his right-ear placement that pushed out as to become a straight line that, then became a giant arrow-like head that dangled around, with little holes behind the shaft, having a circular end in which the spring shot through, where a part of the noise came out of. A fake sage-like beard being lain on the precise location one would grow it, bearing nothing else to the featureless false eyes, fake noise and sutured mouth-opening. The other side, that being the left ear placement or the right side if seen from the front bore the strange appearance of a raised, even if it was only a few centimeters away from the rest of the head and a few to the side, Elephantman like tumor, that bore a single ear-like talk piece that was made to look like a casino-slot lever with a microphone like piece coming at its end, standing there as if that's where the noise was made to enter so he could interpret what was going on. And at the top height of the tumor-like cardboard stood the blade of the lawnmower-like thing which appeared to be stuck in a failure to work. The man in the strangely giant-dead cat suit whom had wore it in the same manner Heracles wore his lion's pelt also seemed to have two holes that pushed through the insides of his shoulders which went deep and looked like empty hollows, or made it seem like he was actually empty on the inside. Rather, the main form of the mask seemed ever so more likely, and it was organic, to be shaped like a resting chicken, staring dead straight to the right, standing on top of a bucket, listening to the tunes of a lawnmower blade, with the arrow but pointing in the wind's direction as if it stood on top a chimney or on top a roof, with the beard being but a pair of tatters or a torn piece of a sail that had been taken from inside the chimney or the bucket, who bore a flaccid looking insect leg out of its chest bearing a single puffy thing at its end. And his name was Ranchor Ranchland.

There was no time to waste. It was not necessarily how it was supposed to go but neither one of them knew any better for what was worth. They were with the faction and they pulled her off, tied up like a little fanciful doll, drooling around as he wasted on the side of the put-through push-about little cranny she was to be bled on. No one liked where this was going but this was the employer's wish, the faction leader asked for more kids, and every now and then one of them made the slip, and came to escape, within the hour only to be dredged along as she was, they didn't pull her out yet, not entirely since they couldn't. It felt like she was stuck inside and couldn't move by normal means, that meant, her face was put in a small carapace that was shaped like an eel with two more eel moving around the top, acting like lightning catchers that had tubes about and inside of them, always popping off the mark, making wild-wild woo-woo noises, when she was bled. And there were also spikes on top and everywhere around the helmet, going through a hem and bush-thorn, at least by the looks of it they ate what they could and moved along. A little pass-through dame she was but no one complained, not as long as they were getting in.

Ranchor didn't move yet, he had to communicate part of the word to some of his closest trustees, which was by all means someone who was closest if not the closest man in charge with him breathing along when listened to. He had to interpret what he could, especially when they arrived there, around the proximity in which they talked. Large circles, almost popping blue and red with colored energy trails pushing about and trying to make it seem like there was no way to move from sight. They were making little dark noises, and were but trying to move along. They were dead-damp and looked as if they had been set on fire before any prior notice had been given, in which case they ate a piece of his throat and spat him out. He didn't complain since he couldn't be killed either.

Burnt-corpse Emma:

'Greetings there Ranchor, we've been waiting to talking to you for a long while now, but we didn't expect you to have company. None of it was supposed to be included, was it?'

With which she took the opportunity to take another bite and play with him since it was what they did and since it did seem to help decrease the altitude and defuse the atmosphere, calming him down since there was only one way to do it. Always cutting that piece off that was making most of the noise, it was there with them and, as it was eaten they could see, the men of the Van, they could see that he wasn't bled. I knew he was no man, no human and nothing of the kind, but now I wonder what does that mean for us and our future arrangements? Our conducts are completely ruined, he is completely touched by the looks of it and there's no way out. I have to do something. Yet he feared, as retaliation was but a disease that could not be drawn or taken away, nor spoke through as it would yield nothing by all means.

Someone was listening in the sky, the clouds were on their way and they were just as deranged as everything else that happened there.

Burnt-corpse Ralph:

'I've brought you something from my home, I think you should pay some serious, utmost serious consideration to what I've done, I made it myself, I fashioned it out of a bed-bug, a little nail-clipper, a curtain-burnt as I set myself on fire and of everything else that makes me happy and makes me cackle. I am but trying to look around and search for a good reason to survive but I can't since, you must know and since you're asking of it.

So many things had gone wrong in this world, there's another side of the town that looks as if it's been encompassed by other peoples from beyond it, which I may not be able to deal with for too long. I am afraid of them and what they're made out of, since they're but completely destroyed by their vices. Their skin looks drawn inside and I may not be able to explain this on my own but I've been trying and looking for a great reason to pass one of the lower being through the Trial of Burnt-people so we may see whether or not they are much stronger than we are.

Suffice to say, they didn't want to accept that, at all. They shunned the fire but appeared to be setting themselves in, what seems to be gasoline, then they but set themselves on fire with what seems to be a strange red haze-vapor that burned in so many dark shades of deep blue, of red-blue and of many other dark hues that I didn't know what to make of it.

And their part of the town was completely ruined from the looks of it, taken down, from the houses and the apartments that had been used by good folk I used to fancy and chew out of and don't be surprised if I tell you as much, but I keep dreaming of them every now and then and of what happened when I was inside of them.

I am kind of afraid of them since they seem to be incapable of growth yet they seem to grow with each fire they start and set themselves on, making it even worse and even more awkward since I do not know what's going on or happening around me. They're always walking together in gangs of eight and are but dressed in tatters, their home looks like a strangely deformed iteration of Tartarus and I'm very if not entirely sure that they're completely if not mentally broken.'

'What find you fit about them in that case?'

'Nothing, nothing at all, their behavior is improper, they scowl at us, the kind-floating burnt-people and the other folk, those being the Acidvictim-cripples and appear to be completely obtuse as to what's been going on for the past few hours since they're afraid we might do something to them. They're specifically afraid we may stumble onto something they don't was us to come upon.

Look, during one of the nights, I've seen it happen.'

It was as if the world was theirs and they could but light down every house and door and everything that was set on fire, even them, before they even knew or realized what happened. Planking about as they emulated large ships that would walk on top of them, yet every single time it happened, they were not hurt by the amount of weight or anything else that came on top of them, making this even more bizarre to wear, since they were but incapable of making out what was going, more Burntpeople followed through. They were incapable of distinguishing colors, but this was on their own.

In particular, this strange, strenuously disjointed corner of them worlds and of them neighborhoods was no good, was no good by any means, or by anything else. That's what it all was, and those people were but put in cars and they drove around.

'We called them BloodyDrivers because they took a liking into setting everything on fire, just like cars do every time there's a single car accident, it happens, fire spreads and many of the people that would've been hit by the cars in question die anyway because of the heat-rampage that follows after.

I don't think there's any explanation needed as to understand where I'm going here now.'

Their flames, though weren't flames were but foamy-bubbly yet air-like, compact oxygen-rubber that flew around and covered everything, then darkened as to form harder-to touch clouds, it's how they tricked the Corpses into believing that they were in actuality somehow manipulating everything, although they weren't.

Ingenious as they were, all of them went into a basement where they lived with a pair of eight-mothers that were all stuck in death-like state from which they could never draw away from, not to come out of live or have any chance to begin with, they were standing on a pair of couches, four of them, two at a time, and all had head-ankle shape like belts that entered their throats around the circle they were in, as it only pumped in something much darker and darker that was bloated and appeared to be the life made out of their put-together embodiments that were just as soon or sooner put through, out of misery and out of conscience, until, to such finality, most of them were allowed a solace unlike any other that followed through, since their empanel-brain beads that ever so slightly connected to the bile-like formation that was carried through, now, they were incapable and no longer would they be capable of breathing properly since they were but trying to desperately catch on the reeling of a shot that was being constantly played and replayed since it was recorded on a middle device that was made out of eighteen put together television heads, being actioned by a long tube-like cord extension that appeared to be working everything from the insides of a monitor-unit walking wagon like on actually disemboweled or chopped human legs instead of wheels kind of device that carried the piles of cords from one side to another, creating a magnifying electrical loop that shot from one corner to the other, drawing electricity from the entire neighborhood as well as from the quantum power generator that it was attached to; a generator that would be destroyed if it were allowed to function for a moment too soon or too long, until it could no longer be allowed to walk around the grim-looking floor it was put in. Not every generator was like that, most of them being rather normal, as in they were in some way not only actioned like some wild devices but they were making it seem like they bloated one another with dark-put through lance like coffin-bore through region flatly inside a bakery-like pizza-making stove where they would be burnt alive, but there was no fire, only electricity down there and most of the frippery fryers were like daisy chained liars, that would work, but wouldn't, until a dark out happened, then pop-pop it would go, and half of the planet would explode, even taking half of god with it since God leaned on top of the world. He was shaped like a peculiarly posing almost female like figure, yet had a giant crested and many torso-chested extension as of many put together roots that raised themselves around a stairway that looked vaguely alive and bore not only many limbs but looked as if it bore darkly-fit unnatural flits of dark-heads that were glowing blue which extended as to form hose-throats that bore smaller heads at the ends of them, in the image of which it made some of the men that were on the planet. Not the others since there were too many of them everywhere around and couldn't be controlled any longer, in the basement, they were trying, the Bloody Drivers that is, completely numbed by what was happening around them to pluck some of the feathers of a dead-doo put through a slayers' broad sword kind of butcher stopped at the throat motion in which they waited to see whether or not, or check on its pulse, if it was still alive. Since, without reason they wanted to stuff it with rusty nasty junk they found around the place and fill her with little pebbles as well as a light-bulb which would be worked through as to turn it into a lamp. It was too obvious now. Conducting a ritual. A trail of murders leading to the house. But the neighborhood was entirely empty, and it was set in place and looked wrong. It was damned, and put through one of the queer standing walls, that were outside, in the middle of the street. Miracle of the twenty first century's architecture, greatly embezzled as well, from the looks of it. A hole lay in it, as someone but broke in the bank, but it wasn't any armed robbery either, the shape of the hole was like too eerily nastily hooked hands that but shook on the deal as they took everything and ran away. Not even the walls are safe in this world, not even the walls. Full of stuffing and manure, they say.

The Burnt-corpses appeared to be provoking each other in the air as well, but fashioning little pebbles out of their burn skin or little hanging similar things they threw at one another since they couldn't even stand themselves. It was all fine and well until they lost themselves, and lost track of time. Many of them were there for a reason, that being, trying to chew off someone's head. And since most people were driven away, they were left with fewer and fewer options as time drew on, as they lost the concept of trying to make it like there were human lives there that weren't meant trafficking. And there was a kid, she was the girl that managed to land in the wrong direction, the wrong place. She had no part in this, but they didn't say anything even though they saw her in the van and the recollection instantly kicked in as if it had been there all along and never had it stooped much lower. It was a game of satisfaction for the choppers that flew in. The girl was a criminal, a fugitive, she had to be put down.'

'Lower your bike girl.'

She had and all of the sudden, the choppers went away. Out of the sewers came a large bamboo-shape rod of skin with many mouths from which long tongues came out and began licking her, around the most erogenous parts, it was disgusting but she was not there. The Burnt-men only had a sick imagination and imagined her there.

'We've tricked you and you want to know why?'

'I do not understand.'

'Of course you don't, that's because the initial bite restructured your complete DNA-atoms around your throat as to bury themselves in it and keep pushing up your blood stream until they formed dark sacks in which your brain mass and organs are currently being stored in as for our consecutive bites to be more effective as we're eating you.

I've never seen that girl before in my entire life but I knew that mentioning her would somehow take your mind off what's going on so I may do with you as I desire. By now, most chunks of your insides are missing and you're thin and weak as well as an erogenous spot filled with pus-gallbladder feet.'

'So, what happened to those Bloody Drivers?'

'They lived inside their mother's home, the most respectable of nobles lived with their mothers throughout time, as did aristocracy, the royal families, and whichever other kind of ruling caste there ever was, existed or was given conception off.'

One of them was Jomax Pavilion Carter.

Carter was a bad man, even while the others were busy choking the chicken, he was standing alone, in a corner, bloody red like the rest of them, beaten-meat like from the looks of which he was but trying to earn his living and his due, he was on the streets at night and was being followed by the Burn-police, which wasn't a real thing, it was more like the Burn-Vigilantes, and they flew in formations or two, threes, fours and fives, and always but replicated the sirens by whistling, like they cat-called ladies during the night.

He was a lowlife, but worse, he ripped off a mail post and broke into one of the occupied houses in the middle of the night. Occupied as if eight ounces of the army was in already inside their house, with guns pointed at little Timmy's head as well as everyone else in the family, readying them as to be put down before they could even figure out what was going through their heads, he knocked on one of the helmets, before even desensitizing them to what was going on and what went through their heads.

'Yell, yell what you want but you're not going to have me, you hear? I cannot be killed at all. I'm finely dressed and I bear a cup of bourbon, no ice.' He had class, at the very least and a gun.

Whereas where they lay there was little to nothing, long-way.

Another faction-gang, made of them.

For what the Burnt-flying people, whom were scorched and static, came one dark night.

A blue-dark night, a cycle that appeared to be struck down had but appeared, they were rounding themselves up. Coming out of their chests were but lost.

The stone split the pancreas in half, it was a response to the first fall-through and the end that came and swallowed the world, putting it through one of the fading fallen lights. There was a harshness to the world that was just as robust.

Wretchedness coursed in their blood and flowed just about the rims of the space they stood in, always drawing power from wherever they could.

It had the body of a lemur- set in stove, burnt in coal and come out of their bellies as if it bore eighteen metal pints all holding the body, stretching it apart, elongated reed-like limbs but drearily pushing out as they began making the most incessant noise there was, nothing that could be used or see, alas, only the far ends that barely formed and barely could be seen came out into the light instead. Many if not either one, all lived in the basin of Ore.

It was their empty-place, where they stood, outside the Waste-Neighborhood Lomax-Yoro, they seemed incapable of flight, but projected their insides out as if they were incessantly set defiled-touched, heads being forgotten in as much as they could be allowed. They continued what they were doing in the worst acreage where their lot worked the Grum-basoons and pointed them around like canons. Before either one could make any noise, they were seen, as if by cut eyes, drawn out of their sockets, many elongated humanoids that acted like mimes but followed them around.

Large bricks and put together barely legible rocks and sticks and planks were there as well. And the master of their den, Olmonolok Gur-basoon, drew out.

'You are to leave and clear the area upon immediate notice. You're to be driven and be pushed away and lay distancing yourself until further notice, or else you shall be made with and made to waste before you could be allowed such a thing as there is, quiet. You're to be put under extreme pressure immediately.'

To that he but sipped out of his cognac-bottle and but pointed the mutts whom were to come out of their way and bring the Basalts with them, all point, largely extended. From the empty almost crater-like, from atop the entrance where the stairs had fallen and morbidly contorted themselves in delight, turned but the larger tubes, whom were justly wrought and brought all the way from the back, loaded and pointed, their largely peculiar almost malformed rifle-like shapes but hooked at the top in what appeared to be the end of a big black bags in which they bloated the space of, pumping in and out. There was no open end to the device. Giant hoses pushing into the bags, and then, before the men could realize what happened or make out the unnatural way in which the devices acted in, the holes appeared, like streams of pure destruction, their body halves but split and the far-empty raised lances, the streams that came out of the holes but made it so they fell before they even came to know what happened.

Finger-broken heads appeared to move around, but again, they were later given and left free to be pounced on by the House of the Burnt Corpses, whom like in Castle Furnace.

It was a dilapidated floating hold they lived in by the side of the Sek street, near which they appeared to flock like little flies, around their burning mountainous burning furnace in which they set themselves in flight and in the surroundings they lay, hemming one another as they brought each other to quarter-close ends. Breathing and laying themselves on, trying to eat when necessary to look around.

‘It could happen, it could, it could happen at any hour.’

They were constantly flying themselves out in droves, being incapable of making out what the Marquis had done to them, since for more than a few rounds they were, uncannily set on what happened there.

Scouts reported happenings, as in their entire stone-block in which they lived changed by some means of changing, that could not be gotten out of yet; the stone became such as skin was, then it changed into chitin, rose in colors and changed and changed until it couldn’t be helped any longer, that it began breathing by itself, organs being suitably set to work them out.

As it happened, the most terrible of dreadful shouts were heard, their echoes but to follow, their unnatural vigor but to mourn one another as they breathes were but to march around and finally swallow the burn corpses they stored inside. Some of whom were failures that could not be brought to life any longer.

‘Chief Ill-Tree Burnt Refuge, I see that you’ve stolen the vigor of burning powders, from the time where the most unnaturally uncouth had flocked and dangled upon their throats about, and would become as lost as one could know.

I see that there’s but great agony to come if we lay here.’

‘Nonsense, silence, I will have neither, nor will I be moved, I say we spent the rest of our days here and live through it.’

It was not understood.

‘There’s peril if we stay, great unaccountable danger that will rip us from this world and the other before they come our way.’

‘Then let it be as such and may you not forget who pulls the strings and who bring control, who destroys and who calms the weather cones that follow.

I will be responsible for all and within all death’s I will flow through if that means getting all of you through the march and through the matches, to be defiled.

I see nothing else worth sanctioning for as long as there's something to be brought, for something that alone is unkind and.'

Then he stopped and followed through, his power and agony was mildly misused, pointedly he looked in the distance as neither one of them could fail to observe what happened there and whom was to blame.

'They caused this to happen with their Basoons.'

'I see, but how could this be? They live in their gribbulous drivel, a nasty hovel they barely put together in a fallen crater where they live.'

Although the top of their house was greater, taller and unfathomably to be put through.

'I've lost it, haven't I?'

'What did you lost, friend?'

'My temper, and I've done something I shouldn't have. I am a terrible creature, I am a terrible thing that may not be able to. You wouldn't understand now, I know you wouldn't, how could you? The two of us are different after all, aren't we? We're the further thing there is from one another, and that says a lot about the both of us, doesn't it?'

'And how, what?'

And they both hugged one another with spikes.

They were on the long road and on the long-run and couldn't wait for long since they were born in Pink-Green Yellow-Scream, the echoes of which signaled the Same headed god that they had to receive his blessing when the time drew on and when finally approached.

A metal band- like a giant wound patch aid kind of, rather a plank with rails on it standing on the right side, if seen from the side, of a fissure which is on the left; a wagon that has a crane device lowering something down the fissure; kind of like a lynching stand seen from the side, or a horizontally and vertically flipped 'L' with a reeling rod lower the crane head down, a large battery inside the wagon, connected- with cords to the reel-device at the end and at the mirrored side of the 'L'; and cords attaching to the actioned wagon, possibly maneuvered from the distance. It worked near another machine that bore. Round up the hill arrangement of interconnected hold-in belts that go around each side of it, from one side to the other until no longer capable of stopping from intermittently dousing off, mechanical device, moving around it like a car stick – this being only the lever in control for the greater device, which is elongated on a steep incline after a long straight – eighteen miles stretch far head, then upwardly pointed yet capable of pointing a movable side-long almost rectangle-like gun – connected shafts that action some sort of saw cutter at the end where it's kept in the middle by a single long-spinning cylindrically thinned – bolted in on either side pair of extending tubes that move and rotate the saw. Seen from the side, a crane-like form with a cockpit where the control room works the big round hill belted lever control area which is needed for precise centimeter by centime angle cut-through rotation-elongation movements, shaped like a gun before the first downward incline, more of a futuristic kind of fun because of the rounded control cockpit, then the opposite upward rise, both the incline and the rise being bolted, movement being allowed as to reposition itself – straight, all incline, all rise, or by whichever other means movement is allowed, at the near end of the last rise, which by now could be called as a gun shaft if the whole stretch was three gun shafts attached and segmented that ends up bearing, what would be necessary to be an actual two dimensional rectangle – seen from the side view, again, beating the pull-up like bar if it were lain on the ground then raised in the air after being pulled out of the ground, then a saw blade was put in. The two dimensional – seen from the side rectangle being only the holding square for a, what would be a better fit – circle from the front as to allow for a much more equally set kind of movement if the bars are to be set to move, a move malleable kind of material being set to the employ. The saw being rotated either horizontally, or vertically, or in whichever other direction it could be set in while the bars – in whatever material they're cast in being worked by a device that's set at the end of the crane-like last gun-shaft behind the two dimensional rectangle machine, powered by long-copper wires coming all the way from behind. In the junkyard there also standing. Large plow-sub diver; a tool box that's being kept in the air by two bars that are shaped as to form a pseudo pyramid if allowed full descent, or a triangle – connected and set above the insides of a trash compactor, releasing bolts inside of it. A Headbhn of pucker buckets all added up on top, molded upon one another like a clay mountain with vinegar and a leaping plot. Many of the machines worked towards the destruction of the lands, and to repair and bring back the ones that fell inside the mounds, wherever else there might be so, watched by none other than the one driving them forth. Bloated bolted angelic entity with split throat-like head, as if it only had a throat that's been split in half where their half-faces are but on the flat sides on the cut cylinder, while the other is on the rounded side. Large bodies that are shaped like long standing tadpoles on top their tail, giant palms for wings – meaty thumbs but featherless, the many organs being but stored at the lower end of the tail, in a large multi-tumor filled body-pack where the pestilence can be felt, even from the distance, yet disease is being spread. Called the Emissary Elgionylle, Elgionylle, drawing forth into a march, bringing forth but many armies filled, with many beings such as itself, drawing in, all but stranded on a blue Tumor-moon, with red-pink bridges leading to many surrounding planets to an endless monsoon, all within the system fading. Many of the cities were or had already been destroyed as well, cast and made and well enough left to be toyed with.

A little Elgionylle had but arrive, and drove itself into the Streets of Nak. Turned around and made to see, there were many little things, senseless, and without an ill, without a feeling of humoresque filth, what gritted in was to become and feel. Many Burn-flying Corpses but approached it as so, much less endure, and to feel as if the land itself was not to be taken over and forced into such destruction as their likes would be less than pure.

‘What have you come here for? What is the reason behind this sudden insolence, that is to be called, this invasion and derisive strike? You come upon our plains, wretch, must you be called?’

‘I am come here by will of my master, I need not be forced to obey, I shall play with no heed as there might be agony and despair to see, and only be reminded, as there's but no clear epiphany to seal-bleed. They come and die and fall from the sky and burn as they enter your world-benign.’

‘What does your master require in that case?’

‘He needs be made aware what happened in this world, and press on for what reason there might be.’

‘A heart is not mechanical, yet you act as if you cannot see.’

‘I am the murder of sky.’

‘There can be no murder yet, only fire.’

‘We shall work together then.’

‘Only if you are to aid us in our help down there, and nothing else and nothing more and we shall call upon no other bore.’

‘So be it then, I think we’ve come upon a pact, I think we’ve come upon the entrance that is but, oh. A gateway to the land itself!’

With which they followed queerly through and finally drove as to surround none other but the strange basin- the crater.

Inside one of the houses in the distance.

They were incapable of drawing a long for any more than a few standing moments. Most of them were present there, a few more than fifty at a time.

‘What have we stumbled on here? Is it, could it be?’

‘No, I don’t think it lives, I suppose there’s a reason for it, no?’

‘Yes, I think we’ve been trying to get at it for. The corpse is dry and that’s the only thing you need to know.’

‘Is it supposed to be dry?’

‘It was moist before.’

‘And that’s supposed to mean something as well?’

‘It depends, why are you here Kurt?’

‘I’m passing time, I think, I’ve been considering this, as follows. I do not know what’s happening around me, it’s rather bizarre, but there’s no way I could get through it. Not all at once.’

‘You’re doing a preliminary sketch, aren’t you? What for?’

‘I think we both know the reason for it, but I’m going to be silent for now, I’ll show. Have some faith, even if it is only for a few minutes only, I think you’ll understand.’

He asked for a leap of faith. By the looks of it, everything was stagnant, even the Room of la’ Morgue; it’s how they called the Mortuary-Gate, the one we were inside of. Although the entire room looked like a strangely wrought cage caught in itself, there was just as little if nothing else other than what was entering us, from every possible side, from every possible angle, and from just about the jugular of the ground which was us, as well. It hardly needed any explanation since it could simply be seen, as dark as the room was, as if we were inside a low-stricken basement, we were but impaled by the many bars of the prison. Around us stood, the many corpses shook, and kept reeling back and forth, carried by bands, we couldn’t see them but we felt what they were like, and moved only when asked to, whenever it was necessary to push out of whatever direction we looked in.

Damage had been sustained, pain was wreathing in every side of the brain; both of the men were standing there open-gaping, trying themselves in for a fit. Gelatin skeletons, and cartilage made it so these metal ropes but pushed us in and out, and coiled about our insides without even bothering to look any other way for what happened and what got us under way. And undergoing and drawing from our own insides, knowing.

A little dark thing, outlined. It moved around the faster moving wall-like shell. Projected in and around him as if he moved through a body of wells, and in-between he was breathing and trying to act and know. Wretched things they were, some damage couldn't be done, to their eyes, they were begging to wreathe again in place.

'It has to be known and found out at last. You know what this means for both or either one of us, don't you?

I called you before, long since you needed not answer. I know what happened, you wouldn't understand.'

'Make sense, Kurt, I don't know what you want from me.'

'I want you to remember what happened twenty years ago, when we both.' Silent for at the very least a second, as he lay.'

There was this as much. Little more could be said about then. Standing on invisible pillars they were descended into darkness and made to pay in filth-beads. Standing-squared from the looks of it, without direction and without sense; but little gargoyle statuesque figures, fugitive but dead-wasted in their rounded forth protruding littler than five centimeter eyes. Open chested from the looks of which, that's where the charcoal miasma came out of, without even feeling as repulsed as they were, worn out and waiting they sang:

'We're still waiting here, and we're still going to wait for as long as there is time, for as long as we live.'

BurntMan Polk-Klok:

'I've arrived at the drop-zone at Five A. rationed M.'

There were entries in time all around the place, birdhouse-pink, a giant thing it was, standing just about the place, messing, around at the passing of a wink. He entered the premise and merely lock-lock lock, trespassing.

'Who is it?'

'Fuck you.'

'Who are you supposed to be?'

There was a man made out of string disease, both of them were cut by the falling of the acid-piss, jaws were forming in the air and hopefully inflating one another before they burst up in the air. As soon as they were made aware, they appeared, and entered, from just about the place, jutting at their own jugulars in their air. Many forming ethylic-worn, skin torn and moving on, legs that were shaken in the back, crawling as their legs and bodies were flattened and pulled inside rotating-casts. But what stood out of the most, and gutted, and out their bellies, since they had forgot them, were the protrusions were in the back, coming up, showing as if they had been completely worn and put for laces. Hardened elongated rails, and many metal spines, traces of abuse as well; coming out of their foot-held bodies, many shook. Eight rods of metal from the frame, behind it and outwardly pushing once again, a human looking thing with a half a skeletal oyster of cartilage tatters, pointing outwardly as arachnid wipers showed, four distinct faces pushing out and there they froze in the most fallacious manner, a most disgustingly intrusive thing, that spanned around each frozen tatter.

Gourd in Nak:

One, I am not a heavy Harvey drinker, but I carry a gourd with me wherever I go. It is a nice bottle I've grown attached to. Brown-leathered, with a small black chain attached to it big wine-cork lid, a big button over the top, adorned with little more than a Spanish knight with his shield and spear, his short dwarfish peasant with a lousy hat and a beard on the other side, and two mirrored perspective drawings, of arches that are short in line. I carry it wherever I go. I walk like an ogre, I'm hard as stone. No sword and no mace on top my back, I'm but hardened by time alone, I look at the beauty of my gourd, I drink. Whenever there's a woman around me, she winks, but I do not look at her, I have a wife. She is mine, and no one else, I beat her all the time.

Drunk men walk alone, along these streets, we look at each other's feet, we know where to go when asked to take the pit. And there is no man who hasn't raised his glass. There's no man without gourd and most definitely no man that hasn't beaten his wife. I see.

Our holes are not in our chests, but pockets. Our pickets are on the side. Long yellow pants, to everyone, a night of drinking then we're on our own, back home alive. Man wakes up only during fight, it's what keeps him going in the first place, and henceforth he cannot forget his mind.

Tall white buildings, all of them hanging around, all of them, hot burning in the violet sun.

And there's a woman on each floor but looks, asking where I've been.

'Have you been venturing at the tavern?'

'I've done nothing of the storm, I've been. Sailing for long before you've even been born lass, and during my young year, I've been with plenty enough of you to know you won't near me next we meet.'

'What makes you say that?'

'I'm only asking for a kiss.' Took the message I see, but I know she'll be back, and riding on my. She winks again, and next we see.

There's a little lady waiting for me, she think she's with a dope, I am. There's something wrong, no food, again.

And it always happens, when she sees it around.

Her husband is a black cat, an ogre and an oaf with a little brown thing between his legs, his gourd is called. He drinks all day and think he is but waited in a diner, he's trying to get with her whenever he pleases, but never intertwine her.

How long has it been since there was a hanging man around the stop? It's been just four o'clock already and the soup is but a stop.

Both the husband and the wife, put their helmets right stare down. It begins.

'My dear Lisky, what have you done today?'

'I've worked wherever I did, and got paid a lot. For what I did, I have this to show.'

A cat she was, with black snow drops along her trails of ears, black-puffs heirs. Split at two ends, she was blushing, eyeing like a little whore, watching not to drop it too soon, her eyes were on the gourd. It was so nice, couldn't drop it off a second more before she'd look at it.

'It's my gourd, not yours, it's mind. I won it fair and square in a fight.

Come near and I'll crack one on your back.'

He sneered at the cat, she purrs. Pulls the button-lid off, and the scent almost wears off. There's a little cranky-crack, and the lid was split in half inside. Slid a finger in his mouth he did, she's still listening.

'They're mighty wet but twenty bubbles, it's all that you will get today woman, cunt yourself lucky I give.'

But whatever happened, he could not get his eyes away. It was too dark to see, wherever he went and along the way.

He stood thinking, after being kicked out.

He spoiled the change, drank chocklate and rum.

Much bigger than his head now; little Spanish Knight missing head. The end of the spear, his shaft hold but a bell, he cannot hear it no, no matter how hard he tries shaking it so, no one can know of this, that's why he isn't watching.

In a dark corner, changing, and yet he's rancid, smelly, it's been at the very least a week. Pudgy he is, so soft and leather, but again, a miss.

There is no prince in this picture, and no price to the gourd, only a man looking at in, the back of an alley's gourd. He's still looking, wasting as a drunk. Wishing he was alone again, only with his wife.

A fluffily fluffy fluff-fluff appears, her neck is strung with pearls that disappear, she's young and soft and comes on. Hangs around the top of the bum, and whispers as she comes along:

'Come here stranger, looking for a night?'

'I've nothing to offer but what's inside.'

‘I’ll take that and what I can, don’t worry about it, I’ll make it fair.’

Young bimbo she were, and drunk on chockolat, they went on journeys, and walked around. On a bench, the side of left-over basket, a trash can and a cat they stood. Inside a little puffy puddle, where her little dress fell off, he shook between his legs, but look around.

‘Where I put it?’

‘It’s gone!’ Cried the woman, the ground, the fuff, she was wet and dirty and it was gone.

Time to go around and retrace, wherever he went, there was no other place he could think of. Must’ve left it in the tavern, he pulled out the top of his coat, and what came after.

Many men pulled out of their heads and held them across their chests, trying not to cover their eyes. One moved his little finger just a few centimeters away.

‘Anything to show us, brother?’

‘I’ve come to make a dame, out of a hussy. But I found myself being lost.’

‘Where is it?’ Asked the sermon in the quire, but there was no one else in sight.

‘I think I left it here today.’

‘You left with it, the other day.’

‘I think I would remember that.’

‘When was the last time?’

‘I wish I knew but it is hazy.’

The woman with him was the one who was lazy, it was her, she was the one, knowing where it was placed. Nasty thing she must’ve stole it, they laughed at him, and now the maze.

All avoided and all too soon, he was trying to hear the keys, but gone as through.

But seeing how he was on street, he was but met and mighty as were his feet, he was but made for trade; asked for the first burnt thing that would remain.

‘What are you seeking to obtain?’

Lisky thought of such conditions, nothing came for free with burning men, they were taken by what was worth and thereafter, burning everywhere.

It could happen, that one of them took it, while not in sight. He couldn’t ask directly, since they were burning for a reason, and since it happened, they could lie.

Two, the day after, where he was watched sleeping like a dog. Burning there in solace like a sun appeared, more than fair.

‘You’ve lost something, haven’t you? Drunk, you’re a drunk no more.’

‘Have you come to bless me, father?’

‘I’ve come to threaten for a stop. I could burn your body anytime, that you must realize by now.’

‘Think you could somehow make that any clear? I don’t think there’s a single chance I’ll hear it the next we met.

But I know, I know you won’t leave me for dead, you people don’t do that.

Help me find it then, and I shall give you, my heart, it’s inside it.’

‘Whatever else?’

‘A butt of cigars, a wasted bucket of candy bars, I pissed in it as well and spat.’

‘Is there anything else you haven’t done?’

‘Drank from that, that much is true.’

‘Who did it then?’

‘The thief, I wager, but that is yet to know, I’m missing, through.’

He watched the puddle, his hand a puddle but couldn’t make it out any sooner than an hour.

Pleased as they were, both of them shook hand, and there were no burns, since he was no longer burning, after yet, he was orange, covered in some pain. Taken from one of the closest walls, he walked normally, and then, gone. Still to find a reason to spend the night in any other place than his home, it was as much as he could find himself swaying and wallowing, as much as he could be allowed, there was no better place than that, but the streets of Nak.

But in the distance there lay danger, for the strange thing, the pop. A little more than a silvery implosion rested, and none dared get closer than it happened after that.

Other side of the town, farther down South-East, closer to one of the abandoned borders:

They breath in the small bags that were placed near them, all allowed to move at once, whenever they could draw from the raw-intense air that surrounded the perimeter.

By four the first group arrived, drove in, abandoned themselves around the area, having made mutilated bodies that resembled their own, having drawn out of their arms, standing there like leprous phosphorescent ores. Six to seven cars waiting outside, in total, from the looks of which there wasn’t any, there hadn’t been any confirmation whether or not there was someone alive.

They were hold at bay.

‘Herman, go on, insert the code, we’re ready to move in.’

Everyone was counted, slowly, then they entered one by one, having forgotten no one.

Dark halls awaited them, and a few lodged-in-rock scientists, with little pummel-heads struck in, hardened. Their legs had meshes around their heads, long and flattened, like blimps if they were carpets, they simply walked on them, without having fashioned anything or made to be weary.

A small depression appeared to be struck down the face of one of the running men that appeared as soon as the men were finally put together. Neither of them could move, nor would they touch anything from one side of the recording apparatus to the other. They moved, allowed it to run.

Its back was but of a longer stretch, eight miles long all but attached to a bobbling mass at the back of the neck, where a single seed was planted through. Growing as the alarmingly defiled thing but started giving birth to a new littler pucker.

‘There’s only a cut on the ground sir, think we should?’

‘Don’t get near it, you hear? Don’t get near until I give you the command. I want this to settle in.’

Command Herman pointed at the side of the flight, from the general direction from where it came from.

‘What are you smiling at?’

‘Nothing sir, it’s just something I’ve been searching for something down here.’

Sergeant-Major pointed at his boots, it was not something he often enjoyed doing, nor did he find himself particularly invested for a fact.

Left side, a larger set of eighteen standing openings that seem to be all placed within the same walking zone like protrusion where most if not all of the barely put together colored bands are set, most of which move, although these conveyer belt like things are awfully set in a most unnatural manner, almost in moaning out of the mouth like movement coming from below the ground where giant mouth-protrusions have been hibernating for the good part of a month, years, so on and so forth, until they started forming crust-like indigenous little pucker buckets all put on top of one another as to make a small immaterial like form. A small tower that cannot be approached from that point on; for the time being until more and more of them started appearing, forming moving elongated almost cylindrical shaking termite hills, with large holes from where, and from the insides of which neither of them could stand there for too long before being drawn in each and every direction. They had mouth-open plain holes that moved in the air like peculiarly illusionary things, that began pushing in and out of them like worn out worm tunnels that could not be held in place, too many of them being given free passes as to be bloated open and breathe, in and out, uncannily so.

A granular pack of some questionable material appeared to be placed on top of them, like a little grain holder that had interconnected pea-shooters that were put just about the place, incapable of drawing on from what appeared to be the good side of a single unnatural to touch, little lumbar throttling, motionless at the top throat-cartilage shape that pumped in and out.

Followed by a floatingly rotating body of a squared sphere that showed signs of a single dark helmet, manifesting in the air, then another followed, molded with the first one, until neither of them could be helped any longer, as to be worn on top a normal man's head, since they started melting on top the spear, into the square-like almost cigaretical granular pack, having added to one of the pillars that spat holes in the air, a spherical tank with multiple heads and a pack for the lower side beneath the torso. This lower side of the body having been attached to one of the cylinders, as they only pushed in and out, moving around the room while trying to infest and spread as much of a disease as they could spread ahead and in-between. They were openly pushing and heaving out their chests, having become too hardened for their own good, like a guttural splatter that pushed around, then destroyed as much as a swoon of everything.

Outer shapes appeared as well, as inverted Spartan-span upon forms, by long trails of spittle-like foundation bile, forming variously defiled little anchored in-between, drawing into view as well, hardly pressed upon from that point on.

Yet as soon as one of the soldiers came into the room, he opened his chest and heaved his head, his lower side having spread into the form of a mattress, yet only as quickly as it could, a painless action that replicated a worming curtain-spread in the back, a bland thing of mush that drew on from the sides of the room, some of the large termite hills having curved as they joined him.

His chest elongated and most of his body had become a strange capacitor that drew energy from wherever he could, having not only drawn but eaten their clot-power before being put down, in a time they shouldn't move. Nor could they help it either, the demand to open themselves after only came as follows, it couldn't be protected yet.

Another prisoner-wager was sent in. He was chained and wrapped around his back, with a mutiny like expression he asked.

'What did I miss?'

He couldn't see much too properly.

'The making of a sacred child, we've been working on him for a few years now, and dreaded making.'

Here he stood in a strange baby-vessel, with four-standing fences, all put together in the prison-basin. Which was submerged only partially in water-thin boiled water, mixed with some chemicals after; also some dreadful looking barely planted through, someone was messing with and incapable of it, breathing through.

'I see that there's an hour coming after.'

'After what would that be?'

'After the first cut, you want to open him and see what's inside, don't you?'

'I think I do, but why the murder?'

'There's no homicide my good friend, as you've come to realize, he is but a fake, a false, there's nothing inside of him, no gut.

There's nothing that's moving and nothing to grow. There's nothing inside there, nothing, nothing too wrong.

He is but a prudish toy, an idol for our heathen gong, that's been beaten for too many days and was there for lesser lays.'

'Why are you guarding it then?'

'Because this false toy, he's the only and only, less. This toy is the only reason we're burning and burning dead.'

He pointed, wreathing in and out.

One of the Burnt Men Troubadours appeared to be perplexed as well.

He was but simply unaware that they were worshipping a broken doll, one that even went as far as to have its legs and arms switch places, it was destitute for a lower thought. Either way, they all examined what was going on, starting to action in whenever they could draw on close enough to touch it. Whatever the reason were, neither of them made too much of a fuss either.

'There's something hidden inside of it, isn't there?'

'What, you can hear it pulsating as well? I thought I was the only one.'

There was still something unspoken about the way in which it moved, since there was little to nothing and little more than a misunderstood mark around its throat, it moved. That's where, mostly wasted, they used to hide the stuff, the snuff and everything that's been vented about.

'Torn on what to do, are ye?'

'I didn't fancy myself in place, a listen, If I may.'

'You've got my ears all along, I need to know, why is that thing causing us to burn?'

'Because there's not a single soul in this world that's unaffected by it, I beg a pardon if one may.'

Alas as much could be said about them, the elation having been brought back when instead, it ran in both direction like a lumped together, little fly, a speck of in the eye like illusion, flew right by and entered the sickle of a corner, then again.

It flew right by them, as if it weren't even stopped by any solid object that was around it, going as far and around as to cackle as it hid inside one of the more obscure and most hidden of corners before coming back into light. Having shown itself here and there when asked, it opened like a casket, fully grown as to match their persons as soon as it could come into sight.

'Another Burning floating man is spawned.'

They cast a glance at him, as backwards as he was, having missed his hinder legs, about the hour, they went and started prodding along. Their faces, as it was obvious by the way this burnt-effigy of a humanoid cast were, bore multiple faces all rounded around the skull, sprouting in and out, ever so slightly. They were water-filled balloon faces, smaller than usual as one would expect in such a case since they were cartridge that fit inside this skeleton cast, drawing in and out every now and then, whenever it pleased them to show off, just how robust they were, how much they pushed out depended on, eerily observed, many factors. Some were longer, hardened and appeared to be set as to act like some sort of living capacitors whose long stretched appeared to form pseudo anchor drops, if that many any sense. They were solid, but chained by burn skin-bags that bore some weight inside the burn-bodies, inside which they were cast in. Like hiding inside armor parasitic beings they but wailed and all thought, acted for one and one self instead of acting together, but it was important to note that this one had multiple cartilage burnt arms coming out as well as the far ends of naught else but some levers that pushed in and out and would follow through as to act whenever their weak grows flicked them away.

‘That creature is a mess.’

Troubadour Mehfke observed.

It bore too many legs and too many appendages and all were too solid and barely mobile and barely capable of much, if any at all mobility, flexibility or anything that could be put against them, or for or in-between.

Not to take a chance at all, it dropped. With a thud but echoing inside the hall they were in.

‘What was that?’

‘It’s too heavy to be capable of flight, I presume and whose idea was that, to allow that thing to give birth?’

When the doll returned, it was no doll, but a small, hard to look at dark device with little more than could be said about them, since they were mostly too deranged to be reproached from that very point on. Little heed to no remorse.

‘I see that there are signs.’

‘You couldn’t possibly mean.’

‘We’re not burnt, these are no burn marks, but they’re but flicks of skin that started shedding, it’s coming off, I see.

There’s something hidden inside of everyone around this place and I’m afraid as little as there’s nothing else around this place, could be inside of me.’

With which Mehfke started knocking on his chest, there was no sound, he wasn’t impressed either by the realization, but he knew what that meant.’

‘You couldn’t mean we’re flying torture devices now, could you?’

‘I see no other feasible explanation.’

The inferior race of the negro has to be completely extinguished, before it gets a second chance to breed. Over the span of the last past hundreds of years, man has lived under the fear of the nigger, and what it brings with him. Man was forced to accept things that would shame their ancestors, drawing upon the realization that the common nigger has been allowed and given free reign as to walk in lands he does not belong to. The nigger cannot help itself but seek to bring ruin and mockery upon all that surrounds him. He is a tool of destruction, he is an animal that cannot be killed any longer since the forces that had even the slightest amount of strength to draw from its inanimate inhuman blood has been put at rest. Before all man, stands the nigger. A dark primitive creature, whose back has but become erect, wide spread like a cloud, growing upon a tumor bed; in it there is chaos, waiting at the mark to be released, his Niggarous voice but clouding the judgment of man as to trick him into believing he can stand upon his feet, unaided.

Thenceforth, the nigger yells and shouts:

‘Aid me, massa, aid me massa, I need to be helped, you know I is dumb.’

His head was splattered immediately and he was gone.

A darker figure rose, it yelled:

‘I am bored, I am bored, what else is there for me to abhor?’

But there was little more than any more important figure lain in sight, most were boring, unapproachable, yet to be gutted, and as such, it would’ve made little to no difference to draw to any other, since most were taken, bedded forth.

Upon a lain-approached sight, there laid an almost, wild-concave Apache-plane of wildly put together shapes and marks, most of them were too ordinarily set and were but attached, welded and made to fit as if they were of one greater piece. Otherwise, it would’ve made little to no other difference to see them. A grovel hole opened in the exact shape, it left just enough space for someone to enter, from that point, and to each end. It appeared on each end of the road, and one of the nigger forms was at the base of the apache-holder, there, instead of walking, they were entrance.

It looked like an entire contaminated area waiting for something to come and draw along. There was a single group of barely pinned men with larger ingrown, thinking.

They were in likeatram region, below the earth.

One of the fine gentlemen between them had a small face with organ-gut coils attached to it, which he threw against the ceiling, immediately flattening it as if it had become almost part of it, slowly drawing through the inflated gut-filled fat-body carried over through the tracts.

Little dark running thing, he were. A large larvae-covered by a curtain top of human with tubes attached, thrown around the ground and made in shape, humanoid again as soon as it was safe for him to come out. He appeared on the streets, out of nowhere.

How easily he was made, like a man with a mask in his bag, attached to a small power box, with hoses, bloodedly-tar making him out of a piece, like a gum thrown against each wall, like a small faced white tomato being splattered with its tazer pieces being lodged on as it would go again, as soon as to create him on the other side. He splattered it, and saw it swell, as soon as it was entered, then again was he drawn. Right above himself and through the ground, right outside, he shouted on the streets of Nak.

‘I’ve finally arrived, I’ve come upon this world, I stumbled upon.’ Interrupted by a drunken disciple, he yelled and shouted yet again.

‘Who are you, lousy man and why have you come onto me again?’

He stumbled towards it, lousy-lousy feet going.

A few black almost see through beads lay around his throat, almost sparkling with dark power, insatiable as they would ooze with the most unnatural of glows and spread. A tiny speck of most incessant of unnatural darkly mattered, and most darkly of the power-through, the energies flowing from around the ground making it seem as if he had been drawing in the very land inside him, all the way and all too very close to hue. They were dancing around him, the little specks that entered, he was bold.

After a few incessant moments he had passed through them, unimportantly fading away. Bloated as they cast one another, out of their way and in there, he disappeared out of sight.

The drunk man almost forgot himself, as if it had been a mere snooze.

‘Where did he go?’

Where he’d go?’

It was a mere speck of darkness lost, and lost around the first moment, that moment had accosted him.

He had not disappeared by mere lack of will, but flew in and around and stopped in chase.

It’s been fifteen minutes since it happened. Standing just by his side, it was clear that there was no twist or cry that might be heard. A drop inside a building as if it had been an elevator hole; there was a reflection in front of LH:ISA.

Leigh stared at a reflection, his suit but pointing in one direction.

A few of the hardened hoses coming out of his back, as the man started scratching the side of the mirror with the tips of his fingers. Hector was the other side of his personality, one of them at least. He was the left tube, now there being two of them, hooked like a sickle, a little broken face that looked like him, now bearing the base, back, ribs and spine, almost a puppet-like form having emerged in its place.

He had lived in the strange city for far too long, perhaps too long of a period of time to matter. It was strange, bizarre, an utmost peculiar matter.

It was there for one moment then it passed again, from time to time, trying to open up, like a little, insignificant little mongrel-spot with a large petty coil around its throat, a large almost inexistent speck of colors sprouting from their unnatural surroundings until no longer capable of breathing any longer. When pushed out, it revealed itself to be hidden, it approached.

In the form of a sutured little speck of bodies, that could barely be fit together, a pair of mouths spoke to him, having observed the prior passing of the events, they said:

‘Main of curtains, are you not? You were there for a reason or another before you were brought back.’

‘And who would happen to be or what?’

The pressure was something that served as a reminder, at the very least for the time being, since it was something that would always be there, always trying to escape. It was something that made him feel vaguely uncomfortable, especially since, two specks of light, for eyes said enough.

‘Everything you did before, prior to our meeting, gone, and gone I wager is the reason for it.’

‘For what?’

‘Trying to leave the street, before the day of burning moons come, before you realize who’s hiding inside that planetary thing and when it happens, all should be done by then.’

‘Is this supposed to be a prophecy of coming doom?’

‘Nay as that would imply that there would be death eternal and glossing over those of whom had passed, instead, you need be reminded of it before it goes along, before it starts again.’

‘What do you know of it?’

‘Just the mere thing and nothing more, as much as can be helped, from what I’ve observed, man of globes, you are, after all, remade, aren’t you?’

‘I am, what of it?’

‘Hector, was it?’

‘We’ve met before, from what I seem to recall.’

Twenty days ago before he even had the slightest chance to fall and make it seem as if there was a ruse to begin with.’

It should’ve been kept brief by the looks of it, regardless of what would or were to happen. It wasn’t likely that it could be helped again, by all means, they were there to say.

On the half-the moon shade of town. It was awkward, as if there was a spot in the sky for every voice and every burning little spec and fly that came along, out of them and every single little thing openly bloated, within their ranks, and never drawing from the sky when heeded. There was a heated argument even before anything started.

It stood there, for months.

During the service, as much could be noticed, and as less could be maintained, the fact that Alan Burroughloe still stood was a testimony of disgrace to the entire military branch and beyond it. But he did not move, still he stood.

He was but a tall towering Rook filled with lumps, mounts and large formations bearing but hundreds of half-a-scissor shards implanted in whatever unrecognizable thing his head had become, a pile of degenerating horned meat, falling upon itself with every passing moment. Eighteen miles in height, a stand, a pillar, a body formed out of a largely grown perfect cylinder upon the top of which the lumps rested. Cockles-tubes attached between them and perfection, a mighty pair of organ-degeneration.

Once his standing vigil ended, he began. Walking upon the nastiest of creation, but a pair of unfathomable to crawl upon sprawls and black pitched inked tendons it drew forth upon. It spoke of land, and dark below, of grain everlasting and upon darkness, a light that shone called upon him.

It was a dreadful rain that followed, black specs of fallen lightning broken glass globes with tar-filled little cut-through specks that made him bled, as the growths would only quickly emerged out of the cuts, he wailed. But a voice could not be heard.

Alas, it was thus:

Somewhere in the secret house-hold-hid, of the faction, the Chicken-bucket strange cog-plenty devices put inside of it man, finally delivered a message on the other side of the dark-put in transaction booth. It got carried along way too quickly for it to make a difference any longer, whether or not something was wrong, or something wasn't working properly in it. Since the message was imbued with little spike-tricks and traps. It was only, it only took a man something of a, most incessant moment to think it over, is it safe to open?

One of the Crime leaders, the Spoil-Druggier Inane Aklh rest by the side of a big primate with a strange metal thing instead of his head, it had a cape of wires and gizmos that were attached to him. And he also bore the shrunken heads of his tribesmen, as it rested, a good animal trying to obey.

'Obey the rules, they told me, I wasn't going to make it, on the Streets of Nak, so I made my own dark faction upon which I rule, Yopilard.'

'Have I not heard this retort before, great Aklh?'

'You have, but you have not heard the least of it. The beast is dead, but hidden inside a most incestful dead hole where it lays, slain. Forbidden from all to watch.'

'Where's everyone?'

'Silence Yopilard, as I said, there's no need for either one of us to, so rudely interrupt.'

Had it stood there all the while? Upon all entry and mournful an evening, long before all dreamers who were present there had a chance to awaken and move in plain sight?

Most of the lamplights were already showing their true colors, the streets being painted red. It was a highly immobile truck that moved along the way, that one whose head was trunked, out of the window a toboggan metal shaft sprouted and spat a little delivery box to the side of post. In no way could either one of them know whether or there was an explosive device in. At least, they could shake it.

'If you do, it might pop.'

'I'm already out of options.'

Wretched colors started coming into pace again.

The mounted rook of skin would wager, and would remember what the streets were like. During a time and age before, Alan but continued moving on; there were things here and there that were still in highly-shambles. Stills, almost as of pictures that were broken after, but not a single mark of hand, but torn, not a single remnant of a man of old that might've tried to fix, neither of those things survived, only the aftermath of the destruction and what came after that.

'I see that there's food in the mouths.'

A remnant of a great beast was found, being highly hanging, resting on stacked trash cans. Most of them were already searched, not that he would fare any better trying to get into them. By all means, he saw it fit. Such an ill looking thing that would've caused such pain, neither wail and neither reign would make it any better.

He was almost, too kind for this world alone, it felt as if Alan bore the entire burden of this lack of qualities the entire lot left in this world could ever dream of possessing, as to say. It left him empty. But at the same time, it allowed him to avoid what seemed to be the worst things that humanity and the creatures beyond them appeared to bear as well. Something that should not be adhered to or followed by any means, he had nothing while, at the same time, he bore it. As if it were embodied in one of the lumps that kept battling as to get a closer spot across this lugubrious body of his.

'It is a disease, you must understand that, caring or showing pity to such creatures, even though they have not been bastardedly allowed to live for long, or even longer than that.

By now, you should've gotten it through your head.'

Nigger-Spherebox continued:

'This weakness you're displaying here, let alone for a creature, of all means and of all outcomes represents nothing more but a failure to change with the times.

I can still feel it battling inside of you, this need to allow them to breed and infest the rest of your body and cognition, yet, you're empty.'

'What's it to you in that case? You seem to be as nothing else but a piece of software on top of a livid nigger machine, a thing of simian quality and of cartilage that might fall apart. How dare you in any case judge me for something I've not even come to claim myself as to care for?'

'You're wrong and it's showing. At least when you least expect it to wreath its ugly head in.

It's clear enough that you're storing your emotions in those lumps that lay hanging across your body, are you not?'

'Again, what do you expect to achieve from this?'

'Nothing, I'm not trying to achieve anything from this, let alone am I here to annoy you. I'm curious, why was it that you find yourself in these broken neighborhoods, thinking you can make a change?

Have you finally become enslaved to these emotions of yours or is there something else?'

‘Would you happen to care for a certain reason? You’re getting something out of this, aren’t you?’

‘Why must there be a reason behind anything?’

Why can’t I simply be curious about your reason for still being with us?

It’s been a long, long time since I’ve seen you, so serene. That I finally decided to step in and ask why, something changed in you, something that I shouldn’t have observed. Nor should I have cared for, otherwise.

You can’t leave us behind, can you? Even the worst of us, the ones that are rotting out in the open, you keep watching over every single living being here, risking your own life, even though you don’t seem to have anything to gain out of it, Alan.

I’ve yet to understand why.’

‘I made a promise to someone, that’s all. There doesn’t need to be any other explanation other than that, greater reason, it’s as plain as clear a night is.

Even after pushing them back, I still find myself going through the motions. Being incapable of fully removing them, I may not have chosen to be a watcher, over this place, but. I still feel. I do not feel any guilt, nor do I think I would if I chose to leave, not any longer.

Perhaps I’m simply ignoring, or perhaps I’ve been doing it for so long that I do not know of anything else. And I don’t want to try looking for something else. It may be why I’m here, I think.’

‘You know it can’t last forever, Alan.

It’s not only going to get worse from this point on, but the whole world seems mad enough that it may not even survive, or make it through. Why not leave and do something else in that case? For as little as there is left?

You’re still a rook of skin, a living being. You still have though, control over yourself.’

‘But that is where you’re wrong, nigger. I’ve still got a duty to maintain, it’s too late for me to refrain from action after the things I’ve seen. I’m just as responsible for it, for everything that’s been happening just as them, just as everyone else involved in this debacle.

I can’t turn my back away now. I may achieve nothing, on the short run, on the long run, at all, but at the very least, what I can say is that, for a short while, I’d like to think that I tried.’

It was as much as he could say. It was as much as he was left with from that point on as well.

‘Much better ones had fallen before me. Yet I still stand; I wish things were different, but they’re not.’

Even Alan the Rook remembers, what a horrible life had been prior to the fall of Nak. Even before the troops came in and the National Guard, the marines, the invasions as well as they thinned the numbers, curbed the flock.

As he remembered it or not:

A flippery shank with a two side-trunk going past the blue crank that actioned two of its collared prune-stank filled scented perfumed lump that came out of the side of his cut-through body see-through lingerie she was wearing during the bloody war-time, upon the dime-trine, the time, her time, his time having run up, as they both went around, shaking each other after that, reminiscing of the past, when, the clock-clock suddenly hit the hour, signaling that it was time to stop, as their petal shower of lover making was bloody rang up. Whoever came in the room to record them after that, had snapped, a triggered finger, that pre-recorded everything, having used such tape, signaling or having prepared to do it to another man, who asked him to do it while on his way, outside the building, with a recorded rape tape filled footage dragging for much of what went on for a good twenty minutes, it would've made it too awkward to continue it with what derangement was going in this sickly cheap motel. Obviously, her, a whore, but him? A tramp, good man, you stamped her across her ass, he thought. But recorded it as well, until they suddenly exchanged both of them, inviting this new cameraman in so they could both watch it and see it happen, while on the big screen, while doing it, all three of them, much to it, it was bizarre. No one talked but they did it at the sound of the rape on-going footage. Still shanking one another, while shacking up, bleeding for the camera, as she did, being still on roll, and live, while being streamed world-wide, with fancy filters. It's wife abuse, but these are the rules:

'First you're one of us from this point on, you suckled on the blood and, look-y-look, dear fellow man, you're not looking at me again. I want you to look, non-stop. After I'm done with her, I want you to go ahead, turned towards the folk back home and remind them what's wrong with this world.

Because for the last twenty minutes or so, they've been watching us, and you, alone, in their rooms, with their parties and their referees, with their panties sniffed, I see you and you see me and we thread along as we both know what goes on behind the curtains. For that alone I'm thinking we should carry on doing whatever crosses our minds, whatever gets your stones off. Since you're not going to stop me, I'm saying, all of this and all of that.

It's been for nothing, because you can't tell a soul what's going on? '

'Can't they hear? Hasn't this been recorded yet?'

'You're bleeding, I am, so I she, it's all a show, wake up and get out of it, you've signed the NDA agreement and you're about to be, for the next five months stalked, receive, death threats, beaten, rape, your family, it's how it is, you've done so much.

Incriminated, prosecuted, even before your time came on. I think we have an understanding from this point on, you're not dumb, you're not dull, you're from around here and I think you're nearing a point where you won't have to fear that I'm lying.

Everything is illegal from this point on. You can't talk, you can't stab back, you have to wait your turn, everything you say. Is just about as real as everything that's, basically it.'

He left the room, and it was time to go through the tapes again. Hundreds of them, the sickos, why was there a city like this? Where every man but taped a woman taking a piss, that is red, not as in period, not as in, well, actually like it, being punched in her money maker, faster moisture, getting wet soon.

Limousines are waiting outside and just about every man is about to be rewarded, deported.

‘Deported out of town, every illegal one, then fucked in the ass like the homos they are, fucked up in the head, no wonder this town is dead.’

‘No little.’

One of them says, and one of them doesn’t know any better past that point, instead he looks and doesn’t know what to say or how to anger the other one even more than he should.

They all have to be put around and put down, incapable ingrate bastards, they are. All of them, I’ll see to it that the homos from the straights get cut, two on two sides, the homos no longer get fucked, they get deported to the south, even farther than that. And the straights, chemically castrated, wouldn’t want them to get mixed.

‘It happens before the tape and before the bath and before we do all, that, you realize that dame, right?’

‘Are you, could you be a monster, Lucifer, the morning star, the one father of lies, father of all Jews, master over the army of niggers, lord of damnation, enemy of procreation and of Christ, embodiment of Moloch and of Satan, himself?’

‘Listen Tootsie, I could stay all night and chatter but there’s plenty of men that wait in line and after, I think I might one up you as well, I think I could piss inside you and yell.

We’re about to shoot. Then let the gates of Hell loose, for all the animals to come in and do as they please, you like this? Of course you do, even since I saw you, I knew I would own your pussy, it pleases me to know that you understand. We’re hard and hard through, for every den and I want you, instead. No more low stuff, you won’t have to become numb in order to please who’s about to come. And there’s a lot of them.’

Twenty irrigated men. They’re piss fountains, for every woman out there. Stored in piss-water bottles, little straw, smoothies they call them. A photo shoot follows soon enough.

I’ve got a lymph node beneath my chin. I don’t know what it is. I tried searching and going through various sorts of documentation, but they don’t tell me much. Either it’s an infection or it could be cancer instead. The placement isn’t exactly underneath my chin, but beneath my jaw, in that area beneath the placement of the tongue would be if it was lowered a few centimeters while phasing through it.

‘There’s a clear sky out there, honey and plenty of profit for, all of us.’

She died before the end of the month.

Ron hasn’t cleared that lump, doesn’t know what it is for some reason, but out on the streets, it’s dangerous, since he’s been seeing his slave, his nigger, that is a slave, that nigger’s been hooking him up with a lot of good, great, the greatest stuff he wrap his money grubbing nasty hands around. Perhaps he was the devil after all.

‘You know this fucks kids, right?’

‘I beg your pardon, Jimmy?’

‘Aren’t you one of those white folk from the Suburbs? The Rich Department, you know which one.’

‘I am, what about it?’

‘You stealing this from them young brothers, kill them, it kills them good, not goody goody-wogs but walking out, in tandem.’

‘I don’t think I like you nigger, but here’s a bill.’

‘Master, you’re the greatest man I’ve ever dreamed of meeting.’

But it wasn’t never that simple, so many rules, no, laws. He set the laws.

‘Ron Richwork.’

Nigger calls him WitchWork, blessing given by Mozambique, who was, is, a friend, he’s a good fellow, every neighborhood is dead and barely walking, always trying to get themselves, a foot in trash, after that. And never talking to each other, they’re one foot away, and talk about something after that. He’s the scout, the nigger is the scout, he doesn’t know that.

Well armed, with pistols and a whole armament, enough for a heist, two of them, occurring at the same time. Even had a bomb, with Peter-pebble tiny rusty, dark romance card and plaster, little prickly rocket launcher and a few rock-stones, LSD horses and bats that carried piss and more.

It was the bitch-dead night. A few women were being served on a platter. Many of them, if not, all, ovulating and pregnant after.

Awkward genitals, a lot of them born wrong, putting down the ones with something between their crotches, clean the city after that.

‘I think this only brings us to the next set of laws on my list.

First twenty consecutive laws, those only applying for the whores:

See a whore, kill a whore.

Never lay in bed with one no more, if you find out she’s had an aversion.

Do not tell her of your STD’s.

Take her to a corner, and rape her until you breed out such disease:

AIDS were started in the West.

Allow a moment of refuge for every single prostitute that shoved a little prick through south, north and all the way, until it’s gone, a little while for the test to arrive.

All are negative, or else she dies.

A woman given, a woman taken:

You may be allowed to tape her anywhere.

There's a piss butterfly.'

'Is that a rule, master?'

'No, I think I kind of lost it, down the middle, next to the riddle that is the woman. Yet I think, there's something wrong, that's come of it, of them, out of them that is.

These dumb-god given. They've done it, somehow they've outdone themselves, such in the way I would've never seen it as being possible at all. I never thought it to be possible.

But they actually given birth to piss-rape taped on wings butterflies.'

'Who fucks a repairman, master?'

'Does it need be made any clear than it is?'

First of all, they found the one that could lecture and spoke of disease.

Within the night that followed:

'Woman, you are to be interviewed, now, and from this point on, you will talk and we shall both listen.'

Put in a red room, with candy and hearts, the lights. It was kind of dark. Four mirrors on the walls, one of them was stolen, blame the nigger for that. Tightly dressed, the groom, and so on forth, the bimbo, she was ugly, around the nose, the limp and down the, limp her. It was the way she walked. No one wants to see that, at least not the general population to which we aim to appeal and appease. Not to be a tease for long.

Bimbo's name was Tootsie Two-bam, pregnant by two men. A chocolate and a mulattoe, neither of them would make it, thankfully, for there was a God. They were in the room with her, both pictures in the wallet. Written with a strange marker, wanted dead, written all over, now, by one of her husbands, the other one was dead. But she never said who.

'Why should we choose you for, our, experimental adult entertainment experiment, you reek of fish and coins.' That is pussy. We both know what it smells like, or what it tastes like, either way. It's like sand but can't grab it. Also had lips, and you're supposed to breathe on top of it and play around. He's read a lot, yet at the same time, doesn't know what one looks like, in real life. Hasn't seen one, but would like to, if chance ever rose, as such.

Strange how he was the one funding it, and the stuntman was doing the, well, everyone in town was infested by disease. Anxiety disorder, muscle hypotrophy from all the heavy lifting, kills what there is of the sex drive. It's scented, and he's not gotten the message yet, but he's sure she wants him to die.

Every woman can smell fear in a man, it's why they tease and pounce. Women are mentally unstable, unlike him and then. The interview just started:

‘Are you ready, or prepared to go on ahead and do anything it takes to, please the average viewer, the watcher and the dancer with whom you’re about to get stabbed alongside with?’

‘I don’t know, are you?’

Insolent bimbo, how dare she? She ought to worship him, this mister money. Still, as arrogant as he were, he still did way better than everyone else and was clean.

Say what you will, there was still class, even in this broken world, this system letting every man down.

‘It’s not a nice thing you’re making of me.’

‘Tootsie, you can’t afford to lose any more children now, and you ought to consider doing it with someone like you, or else, it will die out.’

‘And you’re to offer?’

‘We’re not alike.’

‘But skin-color?’

‘You got pseudo gook-eyes, I’m sorry but that’s what It’s like, I can’t, I have an. A think for women of my own.’

‘Not a lot of them left out there.’

And who to blame for it when the world was gone?

A few more questions, all to follow:

‘Where have you been picked up from?’

‘Corner of the street?’

‘Are you willing to do it?’

Who asked? Was it Ron or the nig?’

Interview cut short as well.

All three stepped out, there was no way to tell whether part of town, where it had lain, lay as much as one could tell. They shut off the gates and made it so, no one could get out with an ID. But they couldn’t lose it either, because it was welded in, like a stamp or chip inside a dog’s ear. Or cancer, but that could be cut, unless the cancer was a woman, in which case, it took all.

There are two Mozambiques, and both of them are dead nigs; one of them represent the death of the niggers in the past, while the other one represents the decay and the usage of their animal bodies afterwards. It had to be contained, by some mean or another, it wouldn’t. They would not fare well otherwise, seeing how they are. What they are like.

The dames may not know it just yet, since they cannot comprehend what's going on here and there. It's too bastardly confusing for them, especially since, when, it's how it is with them, it happened for their pimps', on the streets not to raise their hands at them every ten seconds or so, in order to push them around, driving them into a state of Stockholm syndrome-like delirium from which they cannot wake up out of, nor are they capable of distinguishing the melancholic nature of a nice man, a fine-well behaved gentleman who, in his way to rescue such a dame would only find himself repelled by the sight of her not only commending this kind of behavior, a most deserved treatment that serves as a recompense for her actions, but, she would go out of her way to antagonize such a man, since, upon finding herself incapable of extorting him of his hard-earned money, the wretch but reverts back to her pimp, only to find herself relentlessly beaten over and over again, while claiming that it's for her own good since she doesn't know any better and because she's already beyond saving. Having grown attached to the man whom she wants to please, as hard as she can. By earning, and producing whatever wealth she can for her 'Sugar-Daddy' – this is what goes in the mentality of a woman, her being a dumb-usable whore who's apparently lacking, in the same way a beggar would be lacking, in terms of not having two coins to rub inside his pocket, her not having a single brain cell to rub on. Being left there ruminating; a slapped child wondering why her daddy beat her again, incapable of getting an answer out of him out of fear that she might get beaten again, a most saddening sight, to be certain. In some way, Ron knew that feeling, not likely that he could relate, but he felt some pity for dames like her. This one he observed on her streets. Unlike the other women, it seemed like this one came from a good family as well as she had a good up-bringing, before she found herself on these streets, doing the thing she's doing here, now and then, dousing in her brandished-cherished memories. It could've been anything, a shattering, deadly event that turned her into this wreck he was looking at. Most likely she slept with a nigger so she could get back at her daddy, thinking herself immortal, as all women do when allowed too much freedom. When it happens, it seems. Every single time, that reality strikes back, reality strikes hard and it never does seem like it would forgive at all. Women are a strange species, indeed. Yet Ron is the lord.

Mozambique, in his early days he was incapable of seeing things, they arrested him. Weird incantations happened in the jail, time after time again, mighty-lord oh lord voodoo spells. Flicked his pick, he did, thinking he could piss his way out. A few cops entered his cell with their batons and beat him to death. Then he got thrown out. Henceforth the world was a better place, in some way, one could not hope to understand the nature of this world everyone lived in.

A weird system, yet the law obeyed, as there was something greater, much greater than it. That being corruption.

Corruption was tainted, corruption touched and fell, as swiftly after, as it came around. One could not know of the perils of coming back home from war.

Between each tape and every registered piss-rape-tape:

It was half-way through, when the Faction emerged, through the mighty war, where the Coons and the Grabs came into view. Standing by the side-walk, standing by the sea-side, every berry, every berry, berry-berry, no more Larry:

'Sorry, kid, but you have to go, you've seen too much, what's been going here for this long and you know how things work, don't you?

You know what we do with you if you look and stare, for too long there, what, you think you can simply, you get lost.

I'm sorry it has to happen to you, young-blood. But I've had it just up to my head now, I see some Cibs show up, and I hide.'

Someone gave the signal, everyone immediately got down.

It felt as if, for a moment then, niggers didn't exist. As if the mere presence of those glowing people simply erased them from existence, making them puff. You could still see their outlines, as if they were invisible but frightened. Shove your hand through their throats and see it gone. As if they were truly, disappeared, but not entirely gone.

Either way, both figures were hard to extinguish, as for their bodies were but littered with white flames that were being exchanged. Jumping from one man to the other; there were no signs of rain. But puffs of white like tiny white blades playing upon songs of mighty fire, as for ballads they heard ever after, in a world unwell. Not a single speck of decency was there remained and one could see exactly why, and how and for long it would be cast out.

'You were calm before, were you not? During a time when you did not have to hurt anyone, you've lost thine heart and now it is but time to churn again and seek as to recover what you've lost.

Banish thine poison from thine mind and turn, there's nothing here to be felt, either there, or told.'

Farther but much closer:

The faction of Wild Raggers Kokrtx:

Deep in the, placed, barely a few meters from where they rested. When they entered and came into view. When they, all of the sudden appeared appalled by what was going on, there. When entered, in the voice-box, that was placed, at the entrance, when it blew; the giant machine's throat in which it stood, suddenly jolted and he was welded there. In place, for an eternity, a man with eight but without a face either, it's how you could tell that he was immortalized, poise to draw in the disease-ankles, that were breeding into the metal, at the point, they have captured, forever. – It looked a ball, it looked like a sphere, coming out of the giant throat of a great machine, with eighteen hundred formations plus one and five, that were as much as eighteen, fifteen, five, one and a half, and half a centimeters wide, as opposed to the other hundred bubbles that were barely put together, as the welded-wire like forms went back, reverted where they stood, in the dark-formation, Anaghast-like to him they called, as to prove that there was no way out. As if it mattered at all. Everyone saw something vaguely different in it. But neither man could understand. Was it a fluke of the mind? An illusionary-psychosis inducing device that activated the sooner you got in its proximity? It was hard to tell. There was no clear answer either, but once again, once you came as close as a few meters, off, being far and in-between the distance, it got even clearer after that. There was no god, in there, not resting, or un-resting anywhere else either. But it might as well be seen for what it were, in the distance, it looked like a thing can, formed out of a bubbly-energizer that was shaken and popped as soon as it could come into view. But not from the distance, no; it wasn't likely that any single one of them could see what was going on in there. Not as likely as it were, not. Incessant buzzing sounds followed it as soon as it came into view, and in the ground, a few men not only followed but they forgot what entered them, as soon as tomorrow, they started sinking their teeth. A faction existed, above it, and above its feet.

It's how they hid. He was a great livid-machine that rested, placed, on the ground as well. In the middle of an empty road, galvanizing the ones that followed through as well; showing whatever, and for whatever reason, they were there, no longer praying. That a savior might as well do something worth conveying, as to understand, where they were hiding; alas, he was being stalked, for what seemed to be the last twenty or so consecutive hours, one of the flying burnt men stood there, floating. Creeping on it, as he didn't consider him human, humanoid, human-humanoid, deep-machine, the most humane, not a single shiny-man, not as such, and lest of all, would he see in sight. Not to be forgotten, such it were, of such delight. They were incapable of grasping such thing as the S.A.S droned into them.

'Shot down, shoo them down.'

A volley of one hundred guns started taking off all at once, hundreds if not thousands of them, no-longer capable of stopping themselves from this incestual-incessant prodding into each other's tips as they made little tower-heaps pushing one through another and follow-through another that came after, they drew along. Shot each other down, sometimes they didn't even make it half-way through before being put down. Incapable of being palpable, or shout, what happened, if not for either one, to come about, and bring all down, a grind was made –off the ground, taken by the heap of the neck, what followed after were many nets, formed a few meters, at the very least, like beasts taken down the whales, all of them, solely on the masterly-done, welded together, melted-heat producing then, a shout, ruminating, as they followed, like magnets, lead was on the ground, done for. It was a chaotic thing, hard to witness, hard to obey, the need for violence was beyond and means, as to convey the malleable amount of mass that started gathering around the ground once this romboscou method no longer allowed for anything to follow after. It was a malignantly dark disaster, since not a single bullet managed to reach the flying burnt corpse. Who looked at the heaps confused, much worse, he laughed at them, as a high-European Feudal Warlord would laugh at a bunch of moronic Mongolians who hijacked some siege-engineers, off the road of North-East, like Fingolians, the yellow-beasts, whom were recruited, and somehow taught, as if one could even hope to teach, beasts like that, to work these strange apparatuses, the machines. Which were aligned, despite, as to see it, from whichever kind of mild and wild direction one could look at it; they planted gardens and blocks, of many rocket-launchers but they were all guns. Blooming like flowers, illegally-modified. As they could shoot even beyond anything, billions of bullets, many of whom, and which, as it's been said, aligned, leading to an immediate failure. No one knew what happened, or why.

Meanwhile, not a single one of the lead-pebbles, or led-pebbles, whichever it was, reached the creature in the middle. It was a total mystery that was standing-resting upon the threshold of being immediately forgotten. Since it hid, in an invisible-tormented dimension, whatever was left of the malignant intention there was for any either-or man, to hide away and hide from them. Darkness-imbued evil seeped from inside of it, on a better note. There were people inside of them who would've been categorized so. If one were to look at a monkey's legs, its feet and hands welded, connected, as for the man to look-the simian heart, twisted around a low hanging branch, he would be like a pole of meat, upon which standing, an incessant beast, all of one piece with the faces of great eyes. All of them molded together, with the mouths pointing out. It was like a skin-light bulb – the shape of a contortionist, but molded together. The many eyes being hybridized with the humanoid facial features, but overly exaggerated, as the teeth were but placed alongside the main form, a giant-nose kike-like merchant pushing out of an eye which rose, variously aligned pieces of jaw pushing out and protruding, but. They still held some gaps, that expanded. Between the legs and the feet, contorted as to be precisely wanted; many warts and boils in which they hid secret compiled-compressed legs, like shells-frozen in place, but eerily jerking every now and then. And when they started moving, they formed eerily-shaped horizontally flipped V's-like arrows – while they also remained attached to a molded pile of mass-like a small carpet-patch on the ground on which they crawled. These leg-arms from the main body splits being only superficial if anything; like standing on pseudo-cages that jerked back and forth –tricycle motions being employed as well, from what could be seen or told.

Men-of the New generations, they called themselves; happy Cameroons set in plight. In flight, but dark, like colored with flat-colors, of dust-mice but with splatters of rogvaiv and red-blossoming on their foreheads, making strange connotations that could barely be read, in various languages- of dark-set color pints of magic, as for the symbolism. They served a dark God, in the depths of the. They served the dark machine they lived in the invisible dream of. Which didn't exist either, nor did it function.

'I am evil man, that enjoys spending his free time slugging women. By using as much brutal force as it is necessary, not to inflict as much damage as I possibly can, but for my own satisfaction. I urge you to listen to my warning, for I am not to give it again. Run, flee, as far as you might go, wherever you may reach from this point on, wherever you may stop, might as you might be told, do not look back. Avert your eyes if you hear, listen or see a black out. For when they come, those insipid shouts, I'm going to pound her until she's done. And if you come, run at me as you may, with something to do, or something to say. I hope you talk of fists, I hope you spit jabs, and lisps. Because if you talk properly, by the time I'm done with you now, you're going to wish you were done. By me; right now. As in killed where we stand, not then, because next we meet, you're dead. In a most violent fashion as if you were a woman now. Slap, slap I'm going to go at. Your face, your nose, your knees, your hoes, those being your 'female' family members I intent of beating the living bloody life out of, until they're left and abandoned like the lifeless husks my masters are. Whom, even now are tormented, as speak of evil and of tainted brow.'

He spoke of leper and of evil days that were to come, most evil of intrusions that not even the likes of his bowels, that were split beneath the armor would face to see, the light, of blessed after, days, to feel as if there was another. With such malignantly lurid face, as he; whom stood on top the Hasks.

'I, of Yore, whom come upon mighty dais a shore; bear their message, for I am the enactor of their mighty, dark will, I am distraught by the evil that not only seeps in my veins, but by the turmoil of much, within themselves, darker, wittier, stolen from me lays. Lands that had been promised, being rottenly defunct; and whom of them would spare me now? When I am born of evil crown?

Who would take my ill-device, my heart but beating, after what is lain, in dust?

My kingdom was but ruined, taken by the brow. I am the one, who's looking for it, in mighty land that's gone. I spend my days alone but shatter, at such an ill, device. Who serves as nothing, but as, reminder; that my ancestors are yet to come. Wreathing and toil, in dust-boils, in which, of root, they lay and waste; yet I wish there was a thing that would come yet.

To wake them up would mean command. Upon the armies of ill-sought bugs; the armies of which, as condescendingly as it may sound, would only seek for my guidance, and my guidance alone, as I am wise. There are things that I would tell them about this world. Things that not even my ancestors would think of, or even consider dreaming of.

I would teach them how to beat women, how to abuse; my wife especially, the princess, who knows only of subterfuge.'

'This is a homeless person, who's on Opioids. Don't go near him, he will shank you.'

The man kept playing with his shiv, going back and forth with it. Trying to cut you, slash, slash, with a swipe to the right. Eerily shaking his knee, then the leg behind, then his whole body; what is he doing?

He's but rocking, back and forth, standing. Staring at him dead-in the eyes:

'I'm gonna cut you!'

Slash-slash, looser shots, one coming over the head, he's making exes, like a signature being signed. Then he's making, a Seig Heil hand motion with the other one. Slash-slash, around his wrist.

The streets of Nak are a disaster from the looks of it.

'Many of the men around this place have gone insane, from the looks of it. Many of them being incapable of properly taking care of themselves or their needs, I find it rather, bothersome.

I wish there was a way to get rid of them, but unfortunately, there's definitely no easy solution to this. There's no way around, as many people as possible need to get killed, purged and insanely slaughtered.'

Dominator Eshall DIdar spoke with crackling incongruity. He had his baton resting by his side. Its mark still fumigating, from the beating he had proceeded with. Against the ruffians of the Clicker streets; they were a bunch of invalids that got what they deserved. What had been coming for them for the last few months the dominator spent brooding on; he's often found himself sitting, in a broken termite-rotten chair he carried around with him. Sometimes being joined, by none else, and none other, than the Rook, Alan; whose brimstony lumps still puckered his whole beam, as he stood up but crawled, eerily so, towards the DIdar.'

'What news do you bring of West, Alan, the Rook?' Emphasis on 'the Rook'.

'We got news.'

Said one of the men who came out of nowhere, approaching the dominator.

'The enemy has giant shard projectiles frozen still inside of bigger shards that are made of crystal glass but have trip-wire rings with thousands of grenades inside of them, thousands of cluster grenades.'

The voltage of the machine, of the great machine is equal to that of a reindeer charging a man whose desperate attempt to cripple the fiend had grated its head in a place of bad emotions, where's she's crying. She is a simple machine with feeling and emotions, of beauty undisturbed by the 'life-cycle' of man, which often times found itself threatening her very Evangelical existence, since she was a simple computer playing the Psalms on Repeat, for eternity. There was an empty, desolate chair in the room. And the wall was eighteen marks of someone who had carved his name improperly. After such a long journey, this man, whoever this stranger is, somehow, still has yet to learn how to spell his name properly. For shame, for shame; it's a broken system after all. Like broken knees, but hard-drives, it's living alongside the machines.

Beneath Nak, who was Nak?

Who is he? Better question yet.

First, someone women were out on a date.

'Hey, so.'

'So what? You brought me here out in the open, because we're both carpet munchers, Shallise?'

'Yes, I have, I have, so what?'

'Do you want to eat me in front of all these people who are now staring at us?'

'It's what I always wanted.'

'All right, but there's a chance that both of us are going to, immediately be raped by these rapists who want to rape and murder us since they're all dark skinned and everyone knows that these niggers only know rape. It's like a drug to them, rape-blood courses, flow and commits to their niggardly thing that is the nigger-veins addendage, that's being forced to float out of them, like pure vapors of rape, whenever there's a white woman around. Whenever there's a white woman, these animals want to rape. These filthy rapeniggers.'

'Do you want to leave then?'

'I'm already a carpet muncher, so what's the difference if I'm going to get fucking raped by a bunch of filthy rapeniggers? Violently as well, we can't forget about that part of the deal. Being violently raped by rapeniggers; these violent rapeniggers, huh?'

What's up with them? I mean I would assume.'

'Are you bisexual? Is that what you're trying to tell me?'

'I'm not a coal burner, I want my child to have a father, not a mother, no offense.'

Both of them were killed instead of raped, even the rapeniggers, as they belonged to a pack that wasn't yet repurposed as to be fully formed into a slave-type with a metal thing lodged inside and on top its chest.

Then, Nak; he lived beneath the earth.

Below the Earth

A part of the, the streets, or at least, a few of them, being the ones that had been completely denivelated beneath a prodding mass of malformed:

It ran from one side to another, throughout a broken hall, beneath a swollen barricade-tunnel dug-in shot, whereas twenty or so of them existed, all aligned.

The stranger ran from one side to another, across it a long eighteen hundred fifty miles. A jelly-sutured on top of a seal-bulk with a large spider-like appendage pea-shooter front organ connected to a submarine missile body, as if it were put on top a pseudo shark stretch with barnacle elongations coming out its back, connected to a thing, at the back of it, where the tail would start coming out of, giant cartilage-like livid-anvil, that being the real bulk of its body, at the lower base of which it bore many aligned, out of a ripped-in opening, largely elongated stake-shaped, as many clusters of arrow-like teeth-protrusions acting like hand-saws being rubbed back and forth by arms. At the side of this 'anvil' body there stood two-joined, jointed, simanigger appendages with giant padded bulks of meat-shaped bulky limbed punch-back hardened chunks upon which it crawled upon. Its body was wide and nigh-a-giant. Its peculiar form allowed only for the most awkward of turns, as well as an impossibility of doing it on command. If it had stood on top its 'head', on that missile-punch bag, the bulky anvil might've looked like a prehistoric reptile whose lower jaw got chewed off by another predator, whose teeth started clustering together as if they were parasites lodged in or thorns, whose been impaled by a cartilage spear holding test-your-strength punch-bags at their ends. Even them, crawling upon it might've granted it a pseudo-worm like motion that might've helped it get forth; regardless.

It entered one of the rounded-up entries. Where the mud-churn piled in, making the floor an inglorious puckerish whore of a gathering of many put below misturned-on-one-another blob fish flat with puffy cotton-sutured arm-like things projected against their own bodies like fetal positioned set pig-snouted tiles, all put-together, piled in. Leaving a few centimeters off between the placement of these rubbery, almost candy-looking flattened sugar buttons and their sutured in hairy nigger arms, revealing a pseudo-cranial filled soil beneath them.

The stranger introduced himself to the host as Clohyfas Lyiekyhile.

The host being a floating cartilage crystal-shoved in an one-armed torso bearing a neckless three-stick crowned faced like four stuck together, butchered niggers, whose faces caved in to a point where they became unrecognizable, bearing a multitude of eyes, teeth, noses, all 'glued' by falling-apart slimes. The face being kept a few centimeters away by tubes sticking out of the mushy-thing that stood behind it. As if these 'faces' of it were but a 'night-light' inserted in a socket, outlet or a power strip. It bled on a knife that rested on the floor, which had been squirmed around by the incessant-piles that kept trying to 'lunge' from where they stood.

A polished-hardened spine segment that looked like a brazier yet was sharpened up front like an axe had just split the head of a large oblong-headed legless blob-bodied with one flaccid-middle arm standing erect, pointing at the ceiling, creature whose mouthful jaw was still of one piece, signally just how deep this object had entered him. A few meters in through the split-off cranium. It happened twenty meters away, in an obscure room. There was no flame, but in that depression in this weird fat-squared but sharp thing, this ugly almost edged block stood a weird ugly headed insect humanoid-nail fat chitin filled scarab scab whose back was an elongated splinter that had shot its ugly vexed, convexly shot pseudo-parachute blimp-like wing-sacks. A stiletto or tube made of some inflatable material with nothing inside of it. But markings could still be seen. It looked at it, the charging Muncher. Whose large gourdish bottle stone, its darkly hung robust body, old. Its teeth fragmented on the front, where it bore a single ladder-like form, but no steps. Only the cartilage; held like two parallel spears, it shot, neatly wrapped fragments that entered the one that brought itself near at that. It asked.

‘Show yourself, immediately, before you’re driven out of your sniverly snidy hole, upon the falling of a match, ah, you’ve finally reeled back in!’

Right into sight; this mattress of shapes, all put together, a bulbic-rounded kept behind pair kept squirming in place. In front of it there stood but the split-in a shield pincers, from where shot two voices, from the looks of which, mouths got bottled in. One of it drew out, this thermos attached suddenly falling down and bouncing out its shade. A headless, much deprave was the man who once lived, who one mattered, whom once forgot himself after, but spoke at last.

‘You’ve called before and you were told off, what made you change your mind all of the sudden?’

‘Your gut has, some of it was left behind and in it, a heart and not only that, but a few organs at that, all of whom were bastardy wasted. All of whom contained a brain that had yet to be tasted. And I’ve come around once I thought of it again, seeing how I’ve come to realize that you and your brothers are all in pain. A huge antimony of leprously put together, stench-inducing and ever brought after deformations threaten your very existence as to regrow you out of the cut-out pieces that remain in the ante-chambers, by the side of the place you both died, from which they had been taken out, as to wonder less and disappear in that dark place, I call onto you now and ever-so present as to look away.’

‘What do you want then?’

‘I shall tell you, if that’s the case.’

‘I only ask what’s fair and what’s fair, I seek to devour that piece of either one of you I stumble across, that I may be able to absorb a part of your minds and your memories before you’re both brought into that dark startling recess you’ve been proved to be standing off. When naught and none’s watching. When it’s appearing, after such a dark conclave; that one above, in the ceiling, that part from which and out of which you refrain yourselves from watching; out of fright of being noticed and seen, while you crawl inside of it, out of this shell of yours, made out of corpse-resin.

I know this is your coffin and I know that only you and your brother are alive, but there is a Walking creature who serves as a watch in here and I’m mightily afraid myself.’

‘Then what’s stopping you from simply leaving without such a call? Since, you must know that the paradise you’re looking after is naught but, of kind, a jest-like show for those whom would but call, to threaten us, and kill us all.’

‘But I know there’s more to it that you’ve yearned to let be said of it. You’re hiding behind it, and you must be kind as to show, of much resin that you shall not instigate others as to find me once I’m there.’

‘Who are you, then, mighty bottle-ham, sharpened as both of your elongated pincers are, this drool-below and wretched, lo’. We fear you, of such approach. And we shall not have you come near us.’

‘Relent already, we’re all alone. And there’s but little to no chance to stop, as such, if I were to do it, I could’ve claimed your life at any time, without need or confusion, or wretch or allusion to anything hidden in this simple room, if I had willed it, I could’ve had you both, as soon as I wanted to.’

‘Then fine, with our blessings, as I speak for my brother as well, do as you please with that piece of ours that’s left out there.’

‘ They are trying to pin us down, next to one, of whom was brought and after that, and what was sought after, they will never get a second chance to put it through or have, us brought, much closer than that, when, sought as we might, we shall find them not, in the Leprous bowels of the Confession-blocks in which theirs, and theirs alone, as we have established upon pointing at the bowel-blocks, have they had carved it any sooner, the man, would’ve suffered himself, suffice as to stay in place, during the process, he might’ve survived for long enough to fuse with them and slowly have become the greatest of the dark sufferers in the great blocked Anaghist of broken limbs that form the pincer-holder basins, the one that have mixed with the chemicals in the Iliac pools, the ones that still squirm in their blocky-puckery eyes, whom had bastardly pushed themselves through the Asiatic membrane of the absorbed growths and the gowns of the defenders whom stand and sit upon it as wreathing-in, deformedly so, as watchers, trying to carve as many men in order to keep the growth expanding, though, as you may have already known, or have, as such progressed through the carving of the most malignant acids, though acting accordingly with the suffering that’s been instilled by the torture device placated in our very cells, in your eternal quest as to progress through one of the first layers of the veal-growths that have, somehow made it through the first broken star-merged men-giants with their elongated blow-horns goat-like veils in which they had coated themselves, as for the livid-substance given by the embodiment of eighteen million sub-marine gods whose heads were bitterly drowned in their own puckery carved in-punched by the on-coming spike-chargers, growing apart, while inside their guns- through which, upon having passed through, the entire eighteen centimeters or so, of the shafts, having dug in through the bullet, then through the eight misaligned arms that were clearly aligned but reloaded, since they all, even before their molding into one great-godly malignant being, served as nothing more than an appendage storage for the lesser-carvers whom had given them endless pounded, weighted, infinities from the limbs-addagagae, having finally released the pain-suffering felt by their most derangedly atrocious of distraught pains, their inner-tendons stretches have finally been besieged, utterly, completely having, become, for a shortness, of a few months, having extended, to a magnitude of billions of years that followed after, during which, not even the slightest unutterable truths, of this world, of whom all living man, as morbid as a cultist is, whose face it wreathing in and out like walking on backward spinning platforms that have faces stretched on them with spikes entering them in utmost outlandish ways, utterly unalienable from the common-lost senses of vileness being purloined by them, upon the process, having been completed, finally, the essence of their vileness, during this time, short-lived, open window of ‘weakness’ has been taken, claimed and borrowed just so the chosen Semi-aware mutated spies could enter or have a chance to survive the entry through one of the great earthly wrought satellite-things that were become the dark towering malformations, while it’s thoroughly known that, we, fear the mightily distraught unnatural take-away fondness of the most disturbed- cutters of most malign formations created by the opposition in order to completely eradicate us in our quest, not of knowledge but of complete and utter destruction, emancipation given birth but a quest of utter soliquity of melaphiurpage from which the bowels of the earth had called upon the great blind servants whose bloodied bodies had only added, in their wake, during, not their reanimation for they had only been and always been, alive, for eons, but that of their inorganic material which had not only been brought back but appeared to bear the likes of billions of livid-formations all, of whom, having been brought into contact with the Vile Lip Shaper Nak, whom, upon the cradle of humanity, which had been utterly and purposefully gotten, taken away and drawn from the darkest corners that could and would be drawn away from the most incessant, most morbid alacrity of defilement-viscitude, his kingdom of gelatin-bones, caught inside the stitched eight sets of bowel cones, all of whom are, completely and utterly merged together at their tips, leaving no doubt, for, as to say, that there was ever, that being a lie or a forgery of supreme magnitude, filled with the symbiotic darkness of vileness and evil purloined secondly by the wretchedness of his pumping in kingdom that only made his put-together –barely, yet primitively formed cones, as to look as if they were spear-oblongs, with the help of his gelatin-artifact, the mid-center, defiled thing, the stricken down and up and heaved, squared-flowery pus hardened cast, from which sprouted four ends thin, and another one from it, alas, bearing eighteen eyes, a gelatin cry and a body frame resembling a humanoid-armless with a broken stump, lay in his most-disturbed ‘hand’, with which, upon toying with the great disturbed numbness instilled upon all of the most wretched embowelments of humanity, he transmitted the supreme divination, as from which, the existence of the opposition has been instilled upon us, whereas, we have become more aware, supremely so of who is the enemy and in what, where, and in their rummaging dark places in which they hide, forging their dark skies through which, hundreds, seven, six or so, billions even of planetoid incarnations are being formed as to finally track us down, and when they do, we shall be shattered and completely put to waste, through such concordance that our life-time work as to keep the growths progressing as to reforge one of the last solaces of dark-incessant refuge in which the lost-godly misscreations hide inside of, the resting place of the malignant molds of submarine folds with their wreathing it elongated devices, their outlandish spikes and many livid-cartilage watches, whose rings are ever presently heard will one day stop. And when they do, then and only then we shall be aware that our lives will be done, for they will have grown beyond belief in death, and ascind everything we’ve done in the lifetime of humanity, within reason, that is. We shall be utterly forgotten therefore.’

And in a hard to look at manner that clearly, without a doubt, that being settled on, already seen and dealt with, as to see through one of the many barely attached but clearly tinted glass-visor-bison-shaped with many tools available to their disposal, devices whose vision-projections were all set together by the time the first sight could even be allowed to continue, during which, this malignant rose-bud strange growths’ full-malefic inducing evil growth had set itself as, having come to a full conical display of many wildly put together strangled way, they saw, for the first time, both the strange concordial displayed to sights and cutting soldiers whose guns were women-shaped women that had been impaled by giant Tommygun shafts with many empty missing circular depressions, who pumped in stylish octopus ink-producing dances with the help of their howling-madly set on top the trigger limbs, as well as the strange eyeless watchers whose heads were in the back set on brick wagons made of cartilages filled with many other-arms which all kept strange formations, pincer-like but scissored together, both groups being responsible for seeing it through, as it happens, what they had noticed at first was that this strange thing that was Nak, to which they had been forced to bow to as to fully accept him as their lord, replacing their old values, as such, in order to deal with the fact that, despite the peculiar spatial travel of the giant Nigger head, the out-side the planet growths which had been completely spread, akin to the most unfashionably hard-to-look at crevices, they found themselves infested by various amoeba visions that allowed them to see through the inner-space-like continuum of filth-skin bloody-trough like imitations of nectar-blood eyes that had knives of them, and threatened to charge, immediately forcing the men to stand up as to fend of these newly, seemingly out of nowhere, appearing creatures whose infantile primitive weapons were but crude-imitations of much to their own, lesser things.

In its and during its most degrading, at the worst and during it, stage of his complete robust partially evolved, through a funnel of many creations that were joined onto him from the corner of every peculiar gelatin cone, that had given birth, like many seeds that had been partially eaten, to many deformed and partially created and siphoned, disgusting-looking wild creations, of the most dreadful countenance and manner, which, upon having threaded towards the master of their birth, that being the sole progenitor begin that had allowed for their advent to continue somewhat undisturbed by all means of play and arousal, that arousal referring to the most dreadful of senses that could somehow inhibit him, by all means through the darkest channels that could even grow through and in the niggardous cavernous cavernoids that had set themselves into flight as to draw onward, like mocking birds struck a despondent sickening attempt as to draw a colloquist wordless breathe out of which they might extract a disgusting ichory fragrance, taken, drawn, from the bodily distraught, most uncanny of forms that were hanging outside the gelatin cones of Nak, in order to feed themselves, as for the so called- mannoid cocoon pearled stalactites that kept pumping in and out, upon themselves and their own regurgitated reflections that had been utterly and completely drenched in a most peculiar manner, they had finally drawn from inside one another rotten bodies, with the help and the aid of even more defunct flaccid stingers, bloodily melted jugular formations that turned into giant sponges whose growth was never to be stopped as to appease a self-push through breathe of air, during their sickening search for edible food, since they could not do without it. They were wretched in that thing, since many of these livid caverns not only had formed elongated strange structures, having connected within each other's grasps to one another, but they had also managed to draw whatever they could, feeding one another in the most desperately defunct way, from the gelatin bowels of Nak. His every child and every birthed figure that had pseudo-looked like him was something he had not wilt, but so happened to appease his sight. Nak said onto them:

'Leeway, leeway, I call onto every wretch I see, so you may bring upon yourselves nothing that I would not have wilt it.'

Wretches wouldn't have him.

Above the pillars only drew on.

A pair of barely taken out of their burning hive, burnt-corpses started drawing on, recording, slowly, eye to eye, for as long as it would take to draw them way, out of their hidings, the leopard-coated riders, whom had gathered around the town outskirts. They were plodding one of the broken-in stores. Raiding it with machete-covered, fine leathered gun-things, attached around belts they wore around their chests. Turn-coughed arms, that spun and moved, one at a time, waiting, and waiting until every long-hand extended, either chopping something or pilling lead on top its head. Every rider bearing four or five armed hands, some of them Uzis-augmented, with automatic-load-in shots that followed right after. And the lord of sobriety, whom had come upon the dark lands which had been carved out of their broken bodies in the pools of many put together deformed creatures and creations of the bloated, barely caught in their own defilements, in the utmost deliberation and during it, the dark hour having taken their progressive evolution to such a high level that their bodies became almost cherub-like angelic in form, pillar like even, as their rose from the bulb-like tulips, creating darker heads-like stairs, which, placed, calmly upon the darkest recesses of the darkest tumor-like cyst flying platters with eighteen million- to eighteen hundred billion legs sprouting out of them, eyeless and socketless features appearing all around these dark creators- hybrids that were put together, barely stitched, yet abandoned in the bloated flying chitin like cove-like carcasses which were, in turn not only defiled but had also made the darkest, most unnatural holds of the most distraught, hard to look at bloated eye with pints-shaped pits in which their children dwelled into, all of these being servants of the lord of sobriety whom, in his turn, stood there, three faced, but his three faces were brought to an Anaghast of many put together dark features – like tendons that were amalgamations of many men-like humanoids and primeval creatures with dark heads, that were cut like niggers, and were put there, held in place, in gangrenous manners, having been closely-observed to a meter by meter fault of wringing it in welding type of matter, through which the many falsified bodies that were snuck in appeared to be somewhat given life again, as their mad bloodied incisors started spitting some acidic nigger bodies that had not only been shattered-crumbled by spiked clubs, but so were their children, whom were wee-wee bloodied high, upon almost psychedelic urges, which came soon after, during the process through which, these things, these shots they had been given were actually, in reality, but given onto them for some important reason, this distraught cancer-like foundation of distraught, of a much-munched upon distraught variation had also created many barely put together, as well, of which type, if the many put together prior creatures were a mix or blend of normal and of false people, this barely put together type of sutured creatures were of a much wilder mix that involved the usage of barely deformed, yet handicapped- retarded by the usage of a hammer-axe that was being employed against their heads, repeatedly hitting them in a most obtuse manner, niggarrish even as in stompage, the stumpage of these dark flattened creatures by the other lords that were anything but sober only brought in the thought of the most unfashionably deformed disgust since these wild, almost pelt like beings that were of such a liquor-ichory gelatin was but madly endowed to create such pitiful creatures such as which, most or the utmost mundane servants would rival them by their mere existence alone, since they were uglily deformed, too much, it was too hard, too bothersome to look at them, without being fully disgusted by what was happening to them, even then, and there, during this process of ‘supremely-endowed rapidly accelerated evolution’ which had endowed them with the most bothersome of evil wheat-like scythe marked blind, trialed around their bodies in order to cut them so wilder, much wilder forms could push out them kind of deformations could occur, out of them, by the Order of the Supreme Covenant of the Lord of Sobriety Hoyillneyoma, a much, but forced to go out of its way and be gone, immediately from sight, dark shaded tawny uglily formed creature emerged from the recess of the darkest most ubiquitous forms, cut-through and mainly caved-in, barely manageable, out of the cuts, through the pelts, from the bowels of this pelt like sutured almost taxidermist rug, came out a most bizarre set of creatures, if it were, the carpet-rug, a triangular body frame, flattened with many cuts, from, or closest to the tip, the creatures that emerged out of it, as if it were a womb in reality looked in this manner, the first deformation growth that stuck out, looked like a strange cartilage arm-shovel, which stuck out like a stalk beam, flat but not entirely sheet-like, instead, it was a rather, mold of a face that would be naught more but a hybridization of a fox-cat-fish mutating oozing with fat, wind-fan body frame, out of the mouth of which, coming, while also being connected with many wire tendons as if it were a strange machine-mutant hybrid, a great hammer-shaped body, with the base of it coming out of the fox-fish’s mouth, on top of this hammer-like, and it was as finely shaped, chiseled to perfection as to look like a rectangular blocky body, bearing, from that point on the peculiar cranial-exponent of a sea-flea, a shrimp frame with a giant bloated stinger coming out of its mouth, all eyeless but the mold vaguely looked like that, standing near another humanoid-worm caterpillar set of five interconnected demons, that were welded to one another's bodies, wearing behind them, as they were limbless, many arms and legs they collected from ancient souls they had expropriated during their interstellar conquest, that they brought along with them, from their hellish worlds, in which they butchered the worst souls they could stumble upon them, being more like Shiva's like figures than anything else, that bore, on top of them, the body frame of a Triceraptor's limbless thing with a long chitinous tail shaped like a dolphin frame chitinous chilled shield, which were its tail, whereas, it was neckless and its eye pointed at the sky, having grown nearer to the top side of its skull, out of which an elongated dog-like clown inflated balloon came out, pushing backwards across the spine, where it was kept chantingly hanging because of the many servants which had gathered and piled themselves across its body, since it also bore many impale-like devices that sutured wounds, to such an unfathomable degree that they could bring even dead men back to life, reanimating their dead treacherous bodies, while the lower side of it was worn like parachutes by the many arms that came out of the demons, that held onto it as dearly as they could, as if their lives depended on it, since this thick body frame, of a hardened larvae-transitioning-into-a-butterfly kind of chitinous-sarcophagus appeared to be soft enough below its body frame, that it would push downward with many barely grabbable things they could hold onto, like softened tattered robes in some way. And many similar creatures such as them appeared to adorn every side of this peculiar, almost sea-sweeper or terrestrial crawler kind of life-form that could not help itself but indulge in the most romboscout methods of defilements around it, even as its evolution was forced to progress from a level not even it could fathom going through. From one of the most obtuse, in the distance, far-set creatures-defilements, open gaping holes emerged, out of a mattress spring throaty like thing, that was grown like a funnel-like growth of many creatures that gathered out of it, a most disgusting looking, cave-like opening, only going fifteen meters in, as to cover its outside and inside, but with a diameter of a few hundred miles being cut off out of the mountain it would be 'cut' out of – mold, with the completely filled insides of a giant balloon-like oozy sponger creature with many bubble-like gaps that eerily look similar with that of dark otherworldly creatures, whose sides, the cave-sides look like pillar like molds grown whip-like being cracked against a nigger's back, if the nigger's back was the sponge shape, which was, or every single sight inside of it appeared to reflect an echo of the first Great Elcheiyar wars that happened, somewhere during the first eighteen dark ages of darkness where everything was covered in light and naught else but light.

During those years of blinding never ending day, of arid sun, and what of it could convey but naught else but the hardest to look at arid stretches of the most romboscout defilements of sight and of scarred forgetfulness, of never ending wakefulness, from which the sparkling fog came in, and out and took their sights, where all the eyes filled the clouds and the land, all belonging to every living man, for when they would die, their eyes would close, but through their lids one could see them as burning red globes for every eye bore the soul of a burning sun inside of it that would slowly become a red dwarf only to become a black thing, like a black hole instead of anything even remotefully interpretable as something that existed or had any chance at all to exist, an eternal darkness being stored in every single one of them, as the quantum magic faded, the protons rotten and with it, over a long enough period of time, everything died, the soullessness of many worlds caught in a cycle never to be capable of surviving any longer. Dreadful as it were, many men had to go through it again and again, with nothing more but rotten-waiting, being forced to lock their hearts inside pyramidal pillars they crafted out of various sand-beings, only to have them protected from the extreme heat, since the sand bore water-cold molecules of frost-like puckery puffs that would, every now and again, upon being forced to adhere to such raised temperatures beyond even the likes of a man could deal with, they would simply implode and become, akin to, redistributed heat, or atoms, of frost that would cool down everything around them. Therefore their hearts would be kept an acceptable temperature, maintained, kept alive, and made to live for hundreds upon hundreds of never-ending cycles and years until not even the slightest touch of warmth would do, nor would the cold spread so much as to freeze it to a stroke, since, this was more of a strictly set system or interconnected fuses that, when one of them, these sand atoms went off, every single other atom that was near it would immediately be reseted in terms of temperature and tolerance, as to prevent a domino effect caused by the heat where all of them would splatter, implode and frozenly destroy the heart as to freeze it, allowing it to fall, shatter and disintegrate with the rest of them, which was nigh-impossible by, and by naught else, other than the design of system, which was integrated in the most peculiar ways one could even think it capable of being ordained into.

Who could yet forget such cruel thing as it was, ten-fifteen alarms, going at it, heaving at each other's throaty, voices:

Up the streets, much farther than hundreds or thousands of years ago:

'It's been a long walk, to get here. It took us a while, hasn't it?'

'Everything's so, dilapidated. It looks kind of wrong, doesn't it?'

'We'll get used to it. I know we will, come here. It's safe, there's not a single plate falling over, nor a plank, nor. Here's, your, yeah.'

'My crayons, you brought them with you.'

'Of course I have, I could never forget about them. About you, it's, I'll make sure no one's going to harm you or break them anymore.

Go on, draw whatever you want.' With a simple flicker over his wrist, he handed them over.

'I'm not gonna force you to do anything you don't want to. You can go back to drawing and sketching whatever you want. You don't have to learn anatomy if you dislike it, or buildings that make sense. Whatever you want, kid, as long as it makes you happy.

For as long as it takes; we're going to be here for a while now.'

'I know.'

'Yeah, I'm sorry. That we had to end up here, there are so many things that could've been avoided, but. It's safe now, for both of us. So is Innocence.'

The place looked roughened up, it went without saying.

'Know what kid? Draw on the walls if you want to, wherever you want if it makes you happy. Draw to your heart's content. We're the tenants and the landlords, so there's no one else left to tell you otherwise.

I, wanted to tell you, kid, I wanted to thank you. For being brave and trusting me when I told you we can pull it through. It hasn't been easy for either one of us. I don't know whether or not things will ever be the same, but. I'm glad you survived. At times I think you're the only thing human in here. You don't care about the rules, you're not good at anything, you don't really care about much, or how to do it properly. But, I couldn't be prouder of you.

You're the only part of me that's still somewhat right.'

They were still attached, though there was no umbilical cord between them. It would've been wasted after all. Plus, the implications, hah.

'As long as we're together, we won't die. We won't waste away like everything else, isn't that right?'

'You're right kid, you're absolutely.'

'I.'

'I think, I have to, you won't mind if I were to leave for a while now, will you?'

Only for a while, there are some things I have to take care off. But, you're safe here, you won't be alone, you have your drawings to keep you company for a while.'

'I know.'

'Yeah, yeah.'

The kid could not understand it, by any means.

'We're incompatible, I suppose.' He'd tell him, otherwise. 'There are things attached to you that I'm trying to, that I am obliged to get rid of, for my own sake and I cannot simply get rid off because they are attached to my past, you see?'

I don't like you existing in that world. I don't like the fact that you're stuck in there, I know it's selfish but, we're not the same any longer. You are not I and I am not you any more than an ant is a hill. I know it sounds childish and cruel, but, I don't want you to exist where I'm going, where I am headed to.

This is my chance to do set things right, to set my records straight somehow. But you can't. You can't grow up, you can't move on, you're stuck in there and I know it's a cruel thing, leaving you behind, but I can't afford to carry extra luggage. You have to stay here, all by yourself. I'm sorry, kid. I won't be able to make it up for you.'

But; neither of those things had to be said any longer. The kid has been the stronger of the two, not having to live out there. A disgusting, filthy world, filled with dirt, strange and untrustworthy people. Filled with animals.

'It is a disgusting amalgamation I see that you've brought upon my side of the land.'

'What is that, servant of the Alan?'

‘A great towering figure of many geometrically stored devices, a king antenna of the kind, if you will; strapped on the body of a filthy, good-for nothing, nigger. An animal likened to its kin, the monkey. A cross that’s stuck in an underdeveloped, archaic state of non-humanity; that’s yet to out-grow its clearly butchered state of non-thinking matter of being; but we have placed it, this anciently dark creature, under our command. This filthy sub-human nigger, our pet, our slave, our nigger, who obeys us so; shall unleash a violent wave of destruction which shall eventually destroy and bring the destruction of all technological advancement, following after, the end of all life, of civilization, although already destroyed. Whatever chance there might be for it to be rebuilt shall end, under their niggardous boot. Our boot, but they shall not live past their making, for theirs is an expiration date that’s yet to be allowed to thrive. We shall end them, just like they ended up. With everything gone, nature shall take its course and life shall become anew.’

‘And what if your plan somehow fails?’

‘Then I shall kill myself and pretend that it hadn’t. Because I will be devoid of life, incapable of being proven wrong, just like anyone who will be alive, or not. For either way it goes, I won’t be capable of knowing, since I will have been killed by then, by myself.

Either way you look at it, I already won.’

‘You shall not be stopped.’

‘I.’

It took him a moment.

‘No, I won’t.’

Then he left the premise of the room, and things happened. The roof caved in and the house fell on top of itself.

It was a special king of gelatin nonetheless, almost kept to a secretive degree of un-falsifiability that kept the malignant supreme power of the peculiar organ-like vacuoles forming the inner-to-a-fault secret powder-pill bulbs of the dark-magnificent eighty nine great dark rook-like formed but giant kings of falling apart unnatural, hard to look at, filled with devices as well as fallen-apart root-graves of black-torn apart peals of coal-like surface facets that made their armor, a most macabre solution having not only come alongside their fumigating mouths, since they were not only tall and dark, and king-like, as not only in chess-like figures looking like one, but in a manner that would be only befitting for the funeral sculpture of a man taken out of the Medici family, whose erroneous form could only, as a matter a fact be kindly set to them, as to appease not only the need one has to acknowledge beauty, but at the same time, the duality and decay of time, as if rains of acid had destroyed their casts in the same way many of the ancient Greek sculptures were lost, therefore only adhering to and since, and lo and fro, walking about their dark platforms that were sculpted in some unnatural iron that was more or less made out of the same material they were made out of, these pseudo-false kings’ only task was to hide the real one whom lay into a square-shaped abyss of dark smoke he had crafted for himself and him only in order to hide from the darkest, most unnatural things that hid inside the depths of Nak, beneath him, and his vile creatures as well as his peculiar cones of lurid smile, a foundry of weird skeletons being put to such a dark command that their ruthlessness could not immediately be dealt with. Since, it was a cruel thing, what he did, the dark king being naught but a pawn of Nak, solemnly hidden and kept under a congenital-disease like lock down, as in, if he were to leave his square-like abyss block of smoke, he could risk being trapped inside a trap of cartilage and the unnatural. Although he could hardly be slain since his dark form was but malignantly wrought for complete disobedience, he rested there, in sleep of making. Dreaming of what could happen next. During one of his lucid awakenings he merely lifted a finger, being very much still set on an incline, inside the confines of his trap, this thing triggered a cylindrical bolt's appearance to, suffice to say, promulgate a stretch beyond reason that only gardened the applause of most oblique of figures that were trapped in the realm of un-being, which, in turn managed to trigger a most confusing series of events that started devouring, casting and contorting the remains of the quantum magic in a most, boisterously strange manner. As the atoms of heat that remained undispersed beneath Nak appeared to be anything but close to his manageable area of attention, having already progressed into a Cipher of many twisted, crane-necks and un-seen tunnels and crawling areas that were not real, through which, this peculiar almost cylindrical rod worm of quantum-clustered beings of power that were only given birth because of an unnatural push-through caused by the Dark King's raised finger, managed to bring to light and only life a most obtuse inter-dimension that only existed for as long as this quantum-demonical eerily moving rod of power was still crawling inside of it, before it slowly began disintegrating. Well enough, as it ought to be said, just as his finger, quickly enough drawn back into his hand-palm socket, as well as the abyss-smoke protrusion, it appeared like this mere act caused, as a coming to awakening, drawn-back, as to make up for this involuntary sleep-walking like action, one would most likely think that the demonically moving shape would somehow get, immediately so, disintegrated, although that was not the case. Although its existence proved to be naught else but given shape out of a mere accident, lo' and behold, it had actually developed an unobtrusive life of its own, at least for the time being. It somehow avoided the detection of Nak, having come, or entered a room, a simple one, floating, somewhere, in a place of light, which was a season, that was over. Eternal darkness followed afterwards, seeping in and never leaving it, or the premise of its place. He rested there, the Vehnlar, who was much pleased to be accompanied by him, though strange he was indeed. A most peculiar thing, that was like a fat boulder shaped humanoid belly with a few back-spikes coming out of it, violently outlandish, connected to a giant elongated throat that was the half the size of the belly, whose head was like a giant demonical compact head with a medieval wine-cup pair of two depressions out of which he bore two great horns that were actually shaped like an elephant's ivory pointers. This 'body' segment, out of two, was horizontally pointed down, as to stare at the floor, bore a giant mouth with flaccid-mouth tape-worms shaped teeth, whose lips were human front teeth shaped as well. Its eyes were placed like a chameleon's on both sides of his giant bulky head. And they were red, filled with fury and derangement. An almost reptile look as well, and as it happened, the horns were indeed aligned to match the walking stance –forward placed, of an elephants'. At the back of its head, or standing erect like a fat pillar of cartilage, or if the head had been elongated on its back, directly proportional to its entire body stood a giant frame like that of a balloon-inflated guitar, made of cartilage, whose back frame was even fatter than its head, and was a head itself, with an elongated tongue and a three eyes on both sides. Four 'legs' lay at the other end, two below, and two above, like the string-screws of a guitar, but they were toeless, fingerless and appeared to be stumps. Both of their eye-sets looked mad, as if driven through an almost psychedelic rage induced by something neither of them could explain the reason why. If it had stood on its 'belly', it would've looked like a dinosaur-headed, devil horned few-weeks animal fetus with a, or a humanoid giant headed sea-horse, as compact as a small fridge, whose back-growth tumor protrusion is set in two shapes, or two forms, the upper one being like a rocket launcher with two handles pointing directly at the base of the horns and the other ones, towards the back of the 'fetus'. This peculiar thing not extending beyond the horns; whereas the fatter, lower side to which it would be attached would be more like a giant device battery that's hybridized to a downward pointing kind of cement-mixer, rounder towards the lower side of the fetus' towards which it's pointed at, but in that case, all the blood would start rushing towards its head. Although it was no canon, and one peculiar being, its body was more a deformedly mad battering ram that bore a strange canon coming out of its big-head, with a boat's strangely formed water-engine but without the wings powering the front elongation as well as its four grabbable fat-short pillars. Slowly as it were, it kept crawling. An inner frame of inter-most concave crystal clustered gelatinous mouths and other barely set in place formations that could not be, nonetheless as it had once been even so, barely noticed, as to the very fact of the matter, that being, many of them, varying in size, the features, started levitating towards some of the darkest more, gravitationally inclined pylon-pillars that had all of the barely formed hive-flakes, billions of fly-insectoid cluster formations being all present during the first of the walks, dragging behind already because of the intense pressure the body of the crystal-trapped malignant tower-figure in which they lived, had been applied to, and since they were all subservient to them, many of these faced insect flying things only did what was natural to them and to their likes, that being, drafting some casts of him that followed around, standing or sitting, while walking, many feet that were alike being encumbered by him, the Most innocuously chained Prince of Malady, that was but a greater set of crowned rotten bodies surrounded by a spiked belt that was being flown by four great mosquito-blimps that were encompassed by clot-blood growths and were but, or had their blood-syringes connected to these belts they munched on, as they were most likely blinded or confused by what was going on, and since the Malady Price Maladrious put himself in an awkward position out of which he could not get out of, he found himself, eventually, though he was rottenly filled with many dark trinkets that were closely akin to shrunken heads and pore-like propellers that were headed by many men and anchored, and would do much harm to anyone that could even draw to them, Ikhygn, Gor, Tleshlye, though the last one was implanted by the most morbid of blessings that could follow through, this cacti-filled filament, the rotten bodies that were also sceptered with the material being of the same liking and quality as them, it just so happened that many of the clustered man-like faced and featured crystal-cyst insects found themselves attracted to the most peculiar of defiled double-headed befuddlements that happened beneath the ground, since they, all had merely avoided being destroyed by the will of another darker being, whose moving dimensional quantum power imbued rod-like worm-shape almost came close to threatening their mere existence, bringing it to a momentary stop, to which, they forcefully turned, to a great, beautifully shaped tall-standing 'gate', or it would've been much closer to a pair of arches. That were clearly and most beautifully aligned from the looks of it. Something incredibly beautiful lay about them, it was the horse-like heads that adorned the sides, one on the left, one on the right, fully stretched and made as if of marble – chiseled, whereas, if one were to ignore or brush over the simplistic yet perfectly shaped curvature of the top, they would most likely come to realize that these 'pointers' that served as their lights, in the dark, which were placed only a few meters below the heads, but, where the heads were directionally yet pointedly inclined as to complete the finely shaped alignment of the curve, these pointers were set forth, out of the gates, and were shaped like a knight's half-lance turned into a pad that rested on a downward pointing horse's leg whose lower piece turned backwardly, inwardly as well, as to point its hoof at the pseudo-fat 'bottom' of the lance which wasn't as curved as its upper counterpart. The horsed hoof bore a small lantern piece filled with a brim incessant light. Whereas at the back of it, there was a PVC-form out of which chains drew along, which pushed into a similar arch, with the exception that the concurrent ones appeared to be not only massively set, but they also bore mechanisms capable of lowering and lifting the chain as well as, judging from the distance, a great room-shaped thing, a pseudo-cargo in which peculiar people appeared to have made their living into. In a most sublime fashion, the creatures actually drew, closer and closer, until they found a sudden stop, and, as to not, immediately destroy them by putting to their employ such tactics as would shatter themselves as well as their own, the clustered insects merely set out to, as they went out of their way in order to do it, ask the prince of Malady to see whether or not they were in need of help, or somehow stranded in there. Since this ancient prison like thing was, at the same time suspicious. With their oozing red-blackened runes that only did so whenever there was a soulless husk near them, as to protect itself from whoever might be so inclined at to assault it in its most dire of darkened days, whenever they might be capable of seeing it, since this was not known either, but every few months or so, light would be compressed, the out-side cycle-defaced then wrought into a dire piece, light, a ball, a sphere, queerly wrought in circles, then fashioned in the most delightful manner that would absorb pieces of the most immobile surroundings, in order to give birth to many standing light citadels, and billions of angelic cherub animal fetus shaped with long-heads shaped like deformed flutes with piston-tapeworm barb-wire wrigglers coming out of the spots where the flutes would've had their holes, bearing, at the end of it, 'the flute shape', a flower-like blooming fat-lumped leaves-filled opening, with elongated incisors coming out the four sides of these pie-leaves lumps, that gave it the impression of being a taxidermist's fixed bear pelts, whose final attempt before being beheaded and betailed, as an act of defiance was to fully extend its claws and swipe wherever it could, but who was eventually filled with hot air as to become a blimp. But, out of the flute necked opening out came a large cord, that was connected to a square pillow bead-formation with spirals inside of it, that stretched as far as to bear a single lump-formation cherub-great figure's strangely barrel thick lower-body lump, that drew on as to shoot out of it, as if it actually shot confetti, many upward armless growths bearing various humanoid figures. It looked like a weird fishing rod, but connectedly-molded into a peculiarly filled with parasites sword's hilt and grabbing area. Whereas the bodies of the angels were like men-with stumps for arms and three, even more bloated punching bags for 'legs' that were stitched in and out. And these elongated flute-long pipe throats rotated as well, in circular motions, just like helicopter wings. Well, they weren't human stumps, what they had for arms, but giant, almost spade-shaped trapezoids, or gigantic shoulder pads, or compact greater fridges and engines. They were wingless, but mainly, that didn't matter since they simply levitated and refused to share in the darkness that followed. It was known only to a few, carefully selected, from the likes of it, as for this ancient knowledge could not be more guarded than it was now that the servitors and the hiders, inside that cabin, that lodged-stopped in place cabin were actually spoken to by these figures, and they, they alone could see them, during the most disturbingly made dreams and nightmares they could go back to and return to. Being incapable of distinguishing reality from that which had been taken away from them; awry and saddened, now that it came to pass; he drew forth, closer towards them, near a reminiscence that was the last globe of pure light they had received from above, which had been taken and given, lend onto them by none other than the being known as Nak that even then hid in the darkest of recesses there were, in which not even he dared creep into, as to abandon his hiding, but it was not a lack of daring caused by fear of anything but self, for he feared the fact that he could corrupt everything else and everything that was not him. In his palace of gelatin, inside his three inwardly pointing cones, he was close to being invincible and untouched, to such an irrecoverable thing, that his heart could become it. But covet he did, this Malady Prince, as his skeletal-like cherished tarnished great mosquito-blimps only drew near one of the stoppers, like two kissing deformed prune-stones of different colors that looked as if their face were a lock of hearts, or two pieces of incompatible second hand-picked out of a sweat shop puzzle pieces that bore human-like smile, lacking in gums and teeth, incisors as well as any other features than the eyeless sockets out of which, out drew slug-like 'eyes' that were in actuality its appendages through which it spoke, that became akin, half-way through the slug-phase a rifle-like cartilage with long stick-shapes and prodders that gnawed whatever they could, eerily moving, in the manner of pincers, stick-bug figures, through which their speech-organs only now began to draw out for air:

'You shall not interfere with them just yet.'

Greater Magister-king stander of all magnificent dreams of nightmarish delights, whose body, a bloated bulb like the over-indulgent belly of a fat man, a fly-like creature with two flat-deformed eyes, bearer of the lance-thrust forward trunk, at the end of which a desert buffalo skullshape thing with an upper-protruding hot-iron deformed bearing stinger, out of which the tip of the pike drew out. A wretched thing, that gave a cackle; its goblin-shark appearance like but being a deceit to long for after, it swung and flew away, slowly drawing breathe as its spittle only dripped across its jaw, and lain, across the floor, it stayed. Trunkish-seedish fly, cackling even then, great Behvaumun spoke but wouldn't dare called them out just yet, despite that he was called to attend the greatest injustice that's ever been committed in the longest while there ever could've been, it stopped its mouth as to join the Quantum-prayer that was being gone through, with, as to aid in the mightily deformed avoidance of evil and vileness taking place between them.

Their mere presence served as naught more and naught else but a derelict to each other, as they neared one of the lower-jelly swamps in which the lord-king lumped defiler stood, some of the unnecessarily deformed mutated, but struck in swoon, a few of the marching eves began, much to their likes appalled by the sounds of horses' hooves frolicking on top of one another's made of stone, less-aligned most earnest of roads, to draw it out, from the depths, of much to themselves confessionals, to them, and whence they had. In which they hid, the bottles wrung in slithers, filthy beaded ant-eater's feet, emboweled, had they marched, and drew towards the strung-inside, lost merged-inside a little prison, there they to the only one that had remained.

'Pained are you, for time loaned, for such allowance has done much to such recourse as to bring you onto your senses!'

With which they disregarded much of the scene, as to properly acknowledge the lesser ones that drew and winced. Upon the turning of the four, the ones that were improperly throned, and brought onto command.

'Perilous, it might be, but listen to me now. I seek no ill, I see as less, of such and no compassion might be called onto them, or rounded hours. Come, and draw much nearer, so I may listen you yet.'

Contamination

A sample was got contaminated fifteen minutes ago. Its, rather dark, though hardly unexpected, contents were found by the side of the table. Near a partially eaten leg; next to whom stood another, a man's, to be extremely precise about it, this thing was found at two AM, in the mid-afternoon, in one of the developmental experiment chambers, where the scientist in charge, chief of Holdx project was supposed to conduct one of his fuselage charge-injectors into one of the recovered specimens, yet he is nowhere to be found. A non-conclusive thing, indeed; there's something incredibly wrong about what happened, not just because we have found that the samples we took from the leg confirm that it was not the chief scientist but a relative of his whom, under no circumstance was not supposed to be here, present when this happened, but, the absence of any records as to confirm or deny his presence to begin with appears to be, solely the cause of a, miscalculation in the hormonal growth that, during the extracting procedure, he appeared to have developed his relative as to be part of his lower leg, which in turn almost depleted him of all his vital source of power and congruity, therefore not only ending his life but also, appeared to be the cause for him dropping the contamination phial which was placed near the extraction point on the table. The charge-injector, which was there, appeared to have blown out, like a chewing gum, a piece of the chief doctor's wife, whom had been present, in some way, although dead for fourteen years, in a picture, but was materialized in the form of an automaton with metal, eerily iron worms in it, who was floating on top the table, looking eerily through glassy eyes, since the cast of her was but made out of glass. But, the contamination was succumbed to a much greater force than that of the phial alone, since, by the time the initial inspection was concluded, it was found out that the doctor, or his 'cousin' and long-dead wife were not created by the pathologically afflicting virus, but it seemed more likely, to itself, just like to others and much closet to himself, that it was actually a conjoined inbred demon hiding inside the doctor, whose taken the likens of his cousin in order to whisper the darkest thoughts inside his head as to, as it's known by the various hard-scientifically applied neuro-scientific studies, that the brain is in actuality an organism of its own, completely change the entirety structural form it bore, turning it into a wild array-like flock of various put together sea-horse formations clusters of Acadian fetus-like shapes with skull 'helmet' exoskeleton bearing, smaller 'cysts' that had completely taken over his mind afterwards. The demon eventually escaped and furiously made it off, breaking a few phials along the way, causing the contamination to occur, while also causing some of the vials to fall off and shattered on the ground, slowly disintegrating the lower half of its body along the way. It was quite obvious by the fact that the room itself was contaminatedly deformed by the bouncing lights of fluid that came out of every tube. The premise of the Fascia Endorum, facility was no longer bleeding, any longer, because the demon, having walked upon its path of damnation, had doomed all that lay beyond the confines of the solid world, and that of man. It had taken all of the contamination with it, leaving naught even close for it to have walked near or upon in the travesty which was the infested realm it had crawled back onto, the dream of venomous gas, filled with many puffy incisors that invited him and all, who lived inside to get bitten and infested with a virus that would completely and utterly change all for the worst:

'You have return, great Demon Intnrolrek, but you brought disease on your path, and you have almost damned us all with your most lurid intrusion. What have you to say in your defense?'

'I have naught, but I sought a way through a labyrinth, and there is gas now, wherever you may look and whenever you may try seeing, through the hoops of quiet making, which had been wrought by I and I alone.'

'How ill of your concern, how petty, but I suppose it's better than nothing.'

'Show us the hoops.'

And he brought them from afar, as if on a whistle-blow, a few dark niggers without legs levitated, with kike-scalped hats on top of them:

‘I have called upon the non-sentient animals of the Earth that I have found in a trash-heap desert coffin I brought from the depths of the soil bowels, and also the Arab-fluttering beams that come out of their backs, those wings, they mean nothing to me.’

‘You’ve enslaved the animals, I see, for what reason?’

‘They’re useful, can’t you see? These are tools for my employ alone, I can do whatever I desire with them, since they’re not men, nor human. They’re born out of my seed, you see? As a testimony to their features, there’s nothing else I have to see the over.’

‘Indeed, most quirk some. Show us the hoops.’

‘Very well, here you have them.’

The demon handed them the ‘hoops’. They were not hoops, they were half-scythe moon-circles with the top of their ‘heads’ being parchment-deformed into strange. Hardly was there a fitting explanation. A deformation of reality or of vision at the very least, like a ringed key that was forcefully melted to look most curv edly defiled. Sinking in the air, minute by minute; as the others joined.

With a clap, every single ‘human’ exploded, being quickly enough eaten and torn apart, as for lamb-by-lamb meat sack swallowed by it, immediately in, by many curved-apart and far-distraught poison-mouths that fell apart, quickly after.

‘Why are they like this?’

‘I don’t know, I merely created them out of my own will to give birth to them on terms of a vision.’

‘What kind of vision.’

‘I’ve seen myself being ripped apart, time and time again.’

As he recalled; it was only once, that he could recall. He only saw himself being ripped apart once before he had gone through a disturbing amount of effort to see himself attempt, over and over again to save himself, to plan a way around and avoid this vilification of his tendons, saving himself, utterly from that defeat, from that command, from that pitiful thing that was his own. Brought by it, alone; a dark construct of bones that laughed at him upon having thrown many spiked-bones that could’ve easily been avoided if he hadn’t been blinded by his own arrogance. But in that vision, it was too late.

Slick, slick, tap-tap, it came from the side. It popped into place, shattering his ribcage, causing a shot to the right, a clatter of cartilages brought to a stop as they came before and prior. A shot-gun cell like plow-through after, and they stopped clattering.

Snap, his mouth was shut as he looked down. Levitating slowly, as he submerged into a most peculiar thought; how, why? Had I died sooner, there would’ve been a chance to avoid the pain.

But again, he looked beneath it. A second crack emerged, from the lower side of his body a few skulls came out, many of them bearing their skeletons held my other bone-arm-hands. Many of them rattled as their mouths opened and guns were fired-straight ahead.

It was only here and only now, he spat down. Bullet met phlegm, then ricochet down, trk. Ttd', ttd, ttd, ttd, ttd, thumping, thumping, ttd, ttd, ttd, ttd, he could hear it coming, blinded by the exposure of his own blood upon being met by a man standing with his back turned at them, back.

'Many more men were present there, after all, they are the ones that gave birth to the skeletons, through their dark rituals, I wager.'

'Are men not in possession of bones?'

'How could that be? Since the race of the skeletons is an ancient primordial thing that's pure, cracked and free of defect. And those "cracks" we perceive are merely, failures of reality to agape and to adapt to their own kind, as to look through them and realize what went through them during an ancient time when they were alive, and beyond it.'

'Did they seek your destruction for a reason?'

'Of course they had, my destruction was called for by their own ancient god, whose many rounded busts of cranium-skull are lodged in his eternally winged presence, marked by the skulls, inside every man they attempt possessing.

It is a dire thing, to accept it at the basis of. At the basis of an eye; to try it would mean perish, extinction. I could die simply by thinking about it.'

'Demon, you are tainted beyond belief, even by our standards. Your insolence has not only brought terror but also, a calamity that cannot be reproached enough, for what's been happening in the world is neither cause nor wilt by man, but by you and similar beings akin to you.

There match-boxes in your chest. And you have traded them for drugs you've sold to children afterwards because you wanted them dead. They got robbed, you know?

And their deaths are on your shoulder. And they were demon-children, might I add? Your kin betrayed and sold, their bodies brought onto us during the demonical investigation.'

His eyes were snake-like horns that had been stabbed by long-chitin insect bug like spear-lances. Both bled drily out of their sockets, like rivers, like sea-chains, drifting away into a world of dirt and blood, where coagulation rang about, and of the end, of fallaciously beaten-on-top the head non-existent worlds.

Four golden skeletons drawn from tawny glowing brass, three red ones coated in cherry-hearts, seven green ones in murky moss, and hundreds of lower ones, all of white marble, most of whom gathered for the wish of entering the body of a man, to possess him when called for and not a long way since then. They were placed in charge of the depths, where the likes of men had long dwelled upon. It was already decided:

The Draorl rerquil efter is already in motion; it's already gone half-way through the mountain. Stopped momentarily by one of the stranger, most deformed of earthly forms; their accesses are set in brine, slowly contorting as to grow.

'We've failed, it's already broken sir.'

'What is?'

'The shattered piece of in-corn glass, the reddened crystal cyst, defiled. We've failed to reach it in time and now it's lain shattered at its base, at its core. Independently removed from the other side of the efter-form; crawling along the bars, beneath the sewage bolts, taken beneath the mountain-sewers where, finally it may be met by the sinking bodies that lay on horns.'

'We've done what we could, haven't we? I think it's not only fair but, it's always been highly unlikely that we could achieve anything on the long run. It's always been a fool's errand to begin with, one that we chased blindly, thinking ourselves better than gods. To think that we got so arrogant as to consider beating the odds, it's a shame that will haunt us for the countless generations yet to come.'

'I'm sorry sir, we should've known better than that.'

'It's not you, son. We were pawns, all of us. Pawns aren't supposed to think but brawl. Pawns that get arrogant will always get left behind. It's one of the many laws of nature. But the kings, they should've known better than to allow the pawns to come into control. To come to power; they had no say in it afterwards, neither did we.'

'What do we do now? The Draorl is set to enter the world. To eventually resurface in the accesses of the most irresolute cities that will fall, getting bedraggled past a level they might be allowed to. Hmm, there's something to them, isn't it?'

'Shall we warn them?'

'No, no, we shouldn't. I believe it's time we get down on our knees and blatantly weep for our loss.'

They seemed defeated, all of them, since with this depression and all, it's already been tainted beyond relief, seventy six meters in, going on a curve in the back, with a raised incline, of a hundred fifty four or so, heaving upwards. It was a mess of stone-like crystals forming a pseudo hiding crystal-stall house. A failure indeed which still dripped out of its accesses as if it had been a cast of wax; leading to the sewers entry:

'There's something down there feeding on it, son. Do yourself a favor and get as far away as possible from it. Sometimes it's better if we don't talk about this out-right, out-loud, so as to not be heard.

Somehow I think it knows what we think, it's aware of our very thoughts. Trying to clasp at them, you know and before you realize, it's become us.'

'What does it think then? What's gone through its mind if it's an imitation?'

'I do not know, son. At a certain point in time, when you simply absorbed too many foreign, intruding noises, you forget who and what you are, becoming something worse than an imitation. You're a distortion of yourself and them. Caught in-between, stuck in a never ending identity crisis of what you're expected to be, because of your own choices, and what you ought to be. You never develop, you never grow, you cease to exist eventually once everyone leaves.

Despite the fact that we've been here for the last few months, we've yet to hear that creature that's constantly ruffled its chains, sinking them in, flinging them across the walls, because in some way, although it's most likely intelligent, its heart died. A long, long, time ago, its heart was sold off just like a slave, but by himself. A trade-off, an exchange, as, he's to blame for what he did to himself, we can and will, should never forget what that means for all of us.

Eventually we'll enter that crystal, melt with the crystal waxy liquid, and eventually be absorbed by it. The machine our engineers created will eventually be destroyed alongside everything else out there. Just like us, there will be no mark left of our world, of our civilization or of anything else. Just a speck of what's it been before.'

Ernalvades apparatuses were planted across the walls, they were thumping and drawing some of the dust atoms inside of them, and cleaning the areas the men were not even capable of reaching. It was quaint for a while, resting. Having a few power-beds planted here and there, thinking of a while now, dousing on and off when there wasn't even a folding speck of lights in the air. There were worn out, from all the work.

'Ninilnik Sasok, ohjoln eeri!'

'Where do you want it taken to?'

'The other side of the room, Nini, where they're incinerating the urges, they have to be removed after all, unless you want to anger him.'

Nini was directly pointed to the supervisor. A leprous slug-body-bag armored thing with four bazooka-shaped tails that drew out elongated scorpion lanced growths which bore insane-looking humanoid faces whose eyes moved were protruding, desperately moving like mad-eyed chameleons, mouths were sprinkler devices and whose noses were gun-like triggers that constantly clicked whenever there was danger near. The end of the body bag, opposite to them was raised like a small altar. On top of which a metallic band rounded around 'object' kept, as in, it being a pseudo circled coin-platform holding an oil-rig by many metallic syringe-mechanical legs, a great, tiny head resting a few meters away from it. That disgusting head was akin to thinner more compact deep-sea angler fish but mechanical that almost looked like a telescope, but banded like a worm, with stitched shapes on it. A visor at one end coming out of the smaller, protruding smaller bulk, which was almost covered by a chitinous dome out of which it came out of; as if the head was a shell, and it were a pseudo-tortoise. Or a Tardigrade with fire-match thin-legs, whereas the illusion of a humans' face being seen only from the side, where its right eye was placated like an un-extending visor on the body's surface, whereas the other one, the left one drew out on a pseudo limb, aligned like an angler's protruding appendage. Or a long-footed silk worm attached to a body-bagged artillery machine.

Its sprinklers kept moving, as every head recorded what was going on around them, taking notes, although armless.

It was the air, it was an unfounded belief that ruminated inside every man's mind, that being the fact that it got replaced. Placated, or stamped, with tiny numbers and words, phrases that made them breathe all wrong. A brain-washing of the air, unevenly spreading bacterial lung-infections that made them appear, rather, carved instead of their normal non-congenitally deformed diseases. Since they were all, so-so, uglily deformed, as to look like the faces of their bearers, there was no difference any longer, to their contempt, to their maker's secretive commands. Eleven hundred wildly attached parchment sheets of words floated around every man's lung, iron-rust filled chains, akin to a bastardly thing it were. 'Gho'Njerd, are you all right? You're bleeding out of your nose.'

'Where's it placed?'

'I can't see it any longer, it's been there a minute ago. I think. We should, take a hike down there. There's still time until it comes. We could enter the rental and replace your lower side while we're at it. Then we'll make it past the road, and a hide inside a barrack. How does that sound to you?'

'Sounds fair enough, let's do it.'

The rental was open, maw-strode in. Wild palm-like features contorted into dark visions of thinner things that copulated with some of the most infectious of lesser grounds. Which rose every now and then, little more than a few deranged open-holes bearing teeth-marks around the chairs present there; here, nonetheless, it's where they strapped him on, although there were a few more things, whiffs of grabbers, akin to blown clouds of smoke, but solid. They crawled out of the side of the chair, wrapping themselves around him for more than a few minutes now, where they worked incessantly on him in order to remove some of the markings not even he was aware there were in him. Every single sheet bearing a Daftahan-Gurr, tall and mightily projected, like armored creatures with legs, open-ended, footless but cylindrical in marks of three. Tall and mighty, armored and nasty, but open-wounded and compact; wild looking like diamond-faceted dark-greenish rocks of variously put together alloys, as nastily as they were. Shaking on top his shoulder, a few flakes of iron-rust were lodged, shrapnel-bats that followed through, beyond the brats, they turned towards one of the hosts and asked:

'How come we are being removed now? A second before, we would've been treated as the most unnaturally hard-to look at specters. None would dare even work on the body we've come to possess.'

'They have purchased another body and the preparations make it so the prior model isn't infested, you must understand this. That this possession will not bring you any kind of peace of soul, it will only serve as a deterrent, that alone should give you plenty and enough, of knowledge; and of lay.'

'We see the world differently, at least from our side. You wouldn't understand what he looks like from here, at all. You couldn't even comprehend what would happen if we were to make the necessary arrangements to, remove some of his functionality tendons, that are beyond your reach. We could, feasibly so, damage the goods in ways you wouldn't even expect to.'

'You're to be stomped and removed in that case, as for no damage to be made.'

Cut like the disastrous infection they were, many of them appeared, standing tall, wretched and of lay. Of large – a stretch, as one could ever esteem himself with having seen, they stood in front of. A surface of Mars, empty without a building in sight, but the creatures they stared or looked at. They were even more contorted than before, especially the man they were working on. And not a single one of them dared, not to make too much of a scene down there. For there was a depression unlike no other, one that was between the crater of a moon, the largely destroyed brought-in annihilation of a fallen god, whose giant porous body since became a fallen tomb-stone, largely covered in scum and improper-booms that not only adorned it, but they fashioned different pits and different meats of ploys and empty joys that were but pushed down there, of loins and other incessant 'toy'-like points that gave birth to pushed-in 'cities' down the earth. And not a single man knew of them, of these marvelous things that made another world, that would soon be destroyed by them cutting the bands off. Without them, this world would die before it was even made. But how could they see them so?

Both sides were ethereal to one another, as if they represented specters leaping from a phantom-world, to the other side, taken from above and below. Oozing with light, but feared of the formations of-in-between organic matter that sagged. For that was more and beyond dangerous, more so than they could ever hope to encompass or to encounter again; they couldn't downright explain it without risking or putting themselves at risk anyway:

'Listen to us, you know that must be true.

If you cut us off, there will be a damage done beyond anything you could ever imagine. Something incommensurable to your pitiful mind.'

'We must exchange corpses for the living, and you will not stop us, unless you are to rob us blind.'

That and everyone was aware in any case, of that giant creature that followed in the distance, that approached, from their point of view anyway, everyone appeared to be fleeing for some reason or another. But not a single man said a thing. And not a bird had a wing either. It was one of the many sings. Flying, wingless, eye-less but their sockets were become cradles for worms they carried on their backs, sea-gulls and other avian beings alike. Many of them crawled in, and started. One of the windows was open, and open it were around each side of the edge, the teeth. The tooth, to be more precise, only one of them, in particular had the capability of turning light into various invisibly moving blades, axe-like roses with many crawling worms coming out of them, that could only be seen in pitch-black, but then, the darkness would become a ghastly thing itself. Or a specter unlike no other, fashioned only as to guard itself from being cut by the blade of light.

And this tooth was special indeed, for it had been yanked off the mouth of a most inglorious gilirious a wretch that was for the time being, partially and mentally spent, rightfully so, dead, with open-pores sticking out a corpse that floated on top the RENTAL.

A strange angle, was it? From its side, it sprouted clumsily, a distinct shot to the right of them, going as far as eighteen hundred million miles away from the spot. Countless bodies of frames encumbering those tunnels to a fault, the ones in the distance, made around it, as to accommodate trenches for the weight that started picking them apart, one by one. Intrusive-wounds would start beckoning each other pointedly. A man of evil would've most likely made a point of it, to show what's it become. A disrespectful little peg was spotted dancing, on a rancid little slit of ay. An insulin shot, by the side, the people in charge of making sure no one died, black dressed with large tugged sleeves, bore by thorough naphthalene buttons, one missing on a whim. But all of their packs the same, giant tubes that spread that which could not be contained:

‘We should ensure it doesn’t escape, dust comes from Hoveh. Its life is widely spread beneath the trenches.’

‘Then we shall ensure not a single piece of him makes the cut, shall we not?’

Abhorrent of Evil Wretch Begun:

‘Perhaps this conversation should end at the meeting of my axe to the end of your throat, that is. I will spindle and wrap you on about the hour and make you waste in a deep. ‘

‘Silence you fool, would you slay a man of cloth in the basin of purity and worship? Where soul is met by laceration of the most uncannily forlorn and despair meets that which is shone upon him during a time where he is worn by all if all were to be made?

I beseech you to reconsider as such contempt as there is, look at it and you will have realized what entered you, its essence is blasphemous and might crawl and do as it pleases.’

And no wretched god was pointed at but one of the greater servants they worshipped, whom, in his side and during his arrival and to his condescending nature, they were serving one another, serving each other and only adhering to one another when less bothered, and less to be called, and less to be aghast by what entered them in part, they reeked of filth and desperation.

And whom else to watch and whom to dread what happened after they were put aside and graven as to call at all; dreadful little things they were, uncannily forlorn and lost as well.

‘Spinning in circles does brain damage to pirouette dancers and ballerinas, it is a known concept one cannot by all means repel himself by. If he is to be a dancer, that is an acceptable kind of brain injury that has to be sustained and just as much you must and might as very well know this, it will come and it will always come and there might never come a day in life or when to be called, alike when one might realize that there’s no way to avoid it.

Some might have to take the fall, if it’s needed and cannot, may not and may never be avoided. For that reason you must accept as well that you cannot kill me without inflicting the means of destruction upon your very own self, since, upon doing this you may be put through such a wretched thing.

You will become that which is hated the most and most distraught, and will have gone through such agony as to be called.

You will serve no man and establish no connection and you will be brought to an incision of mild directions.’

‘What are you even talking about? I see only a man that’s been contorted into the wall, but once that gate opens, there will be a stairway leading to others that were there before I, whom had done such sickening things that even I would have to dream them away, through nightmares and despair, I will have looked in as dark a place as there is.’

‘Foolish thing, you fail to understand that there’s something there no man wants to take the blandish thing that is to be worshipped, you are become but a failure and a placeholder for the faith of man and taken as an idol, your fate is to be completely and most certainly replaced.’

And again he pointed at the deities on the walls, those whom hadn’t been the servants that were worshipped before, yet wonder, as one might do, how many men were there before them? And how many of them would stall as to look of crag and move at all, if any would wonder what happened.

Twenty, a hundred more, and perhaps how many of them would cry and stall? For the satisfaction was not there, yet plenty were patient as in awe, some were waited upon, as the greatest of things reeked of patience, if one could have it all.

‘I wonder, you’re the moon, are you not? You’ve made me feel things I reckon I wouldn’t have felt at any other time if I tried.’

‘I am the sun, for I shun brighter than any man, such degenerates and other criminals away. No evil deity should be served at all, for you belong in slums. I shall shun you for the entirety of my life until I’m stopped and until it’s decided that it will be I, the next one to take the place inside the next gate, inside the next wall as I am to become the next god.’

‘But how do you know that I won’t stab you in the back as you turn?’

‘I know you will and for that reason I accept it.

Do you want to know the reason why?’

‘I’m listening but I may not be easily tricked as to show compassion and to spare your life, unless you freely give way and place, and lend me on such path as to never convey anything else.’

‘I shall listen in that case.’

‘Regardless of it, I seek it as it is. Why should I take your lies? Even though you claim to be a good man, you feel the same desire and the same repulsions and the same drives as any petty man knows, and in that case, you only seek to take my place, to which I say, why must you drive me away from my home and what might I be able, if suffice to say, to do in that case? If I am set to wait my turn, in which case, during my eternal stalling of the ever passing time, what might happen if others are to come before me and take my place as they are deemed worthy in that case, when I could simply end it all as well?

Other men died before us in this place, have they not? Not in their entirety but being pulled inside whatever surface there is, so, tell me as such, why should I waste inside such walls and in such garniture that is a picking for lesser men? Why stall when the end is the same?

I might as well feel guilt for killing you, but just as well, as soon as I become a stall upon entry, upon stone, forged and made but a tomb in place, I might feel nothing, no remorse at all and in that case, is it not true that I might be spared of all those feelings if my mind, were it not to exist at all?’

‘It would be true, if one at all, if that were the case but, as it is we can never know whether or not their minds are active in stone, whether or not they work and whether or not, upon eons stranded in stone wasting, you may be able to be as you may and be made as you are, regret or even come to stumble upon a lot of remembrance, forgetfulness, it wouldn’t matter, as for the eventuality would never come and would never stop by any means or chance, that much is true and might never be lost upon you.

I say, whether or not you intend on doing me such harm as to completely destroy me, that is up to you and no other and no other man might take that claim away from you. Do as you please knowing that it will be lost or might not be lost upon time, as soon as you will have become the wall, to be worshipped for a time and then abandoned like everyone else.

But, I ask you this, for, if you had somehow decided it is worth it, then make whichever claim you might while I’m still alive and while you’re still to choose, for we do not know either way whether or not there’s another room on the other side that might have many if not one, if not alone for a good enough time where one might simply just forget or regret or might stumble upon someone’s companionship as to tell him what happened as to be met by such innocence as to call upon your murder. In that case, do keep in mind that as you lived in the most impervious of evil deeds of cruelty and others, you might as well find yourself just, as simply as it is, stabbed, behind your back as well as you have stepped on others, for other men might act like you as well as they are made ignorant of their own deeds, the irony in it being but lint that’s been placed in such wrong doings as there are.’

‘What have we learned here, then? I can make of nothing of the writings that are on the gate. I can make nothing of the essence of the previous man. I think we’re both made to be paranoid and to waste time here when we could simply stay and keep each other company.’

‘I see. But there’s a problem there as well, as I, by no means desire stagnation even if it means spending time with someone I may as well have become dearly attached to, I must tell you good friend that I seek no sympathy and no end either, from this point on and no other.’

‘For as many days as there are, I think I’m going to, well, make it so you claim nothing else.’

And they stood there for the time being and contended with being alone.

Yet past the next gate there lay:

The kid was doing some cool bike tricks. He entered the school and looked up, large line cut through the fucking ceiling, going into the class room, up to the teacher’s seat. He opened his locker, twenty wasted game of the years cartridges fell, all of them-same game, fucking trash he never even played.

Inside the class room, every student had nigger written atop their forehead. Nigger on the bench, on the chairs and on the teachers’ desk; hard rock playing on in his earpieces. Large Nigger written across the boys, the floor and the board, the nigger then enters the classroom- the teacher. His lynch-rope is dragged along the line, he seated himself down.

‘I brought a real gun, fuck you!’

Clive was at it again.

‘I am sitting in this chair.’

His head was off, ticked fifty meters to the right. Had to kill niggers all night, had to kill them during day, during Saturdays, during Sundays, fuck niggers, I hate fucking niggers.

‘I am the nigger-killer, I am going to fucking kill all the fucking niggers. I condone violence against them. I am a sociopathic kike, nigger-killer and a child rapist, I rape dead kids because I am a Jew. So degenerate, I am so degenerate.’

‘Enough of it, and your narcissistic rants, I will have none of this madness in my class. Silence him and let there be order in here, even if it is for some short unadulterated time.’

And there was no piece, only the weird degeneracy which infested everything and everything and nothing could be spared of it, nothing at all.

The plants were made of skin, they filled the room.

Skin became as diamond-hard, it changed in color, something else. A purple-violent greenish thing, of whitish hue, of bitter thing, it were, a new thing, and had to go, wherever one went around and never into hiding.

‘Settle back.’

One face was worn and set on every corner of the room-place holder for a much greater machine that was shaped that way, the back of the classroom, where the board was- a giant light-match box that was put there, pouting and reeled back in, and out and in and out, moving as if set on rails, one good thing after another, the malady and the destruction of every strand across it – both sides bore giant legs filled with too much air, too out breathing :

‘Master, master, master, I shall master this evil tongue, I shall master it, and I shall master it and I shall master everything for language is power and there is power in language and it shall and I shall bring destruction.

I shall destroy everything because I am evil, I am evil, I am evil, I am. Destroy, destroy, destruction, evil-evil, I shall bring the means of supreme destruction upon all men and I shall destroy everything.

Women aren’t human, women aren’t human, they’re not human, they’re anything but human. Women are animals, they’re animals and need to be raped, but not like animals, like objects instead. I hate niggers, I hate niggers, I am going to kill niggers, I am the nigger-lyncher, most evil moth.’

To which, out of the body of the giant match-box, through the essence of vileness the body was taken forth, a moth-like base, out of which, a stalk-like pea-pod but shot out of it, with many reeled back in lead-beds all contorted upon the metal frame of a large iron-system of many interlocked webs put together, breathing into livid-memory as if it was born out of the wretched abominable structures of a lowly heeded unnaturally set filth canal. An insufferable thing, a mouth extended from within, many eyes that weren't there, the sockets were but pushed out and appeared as long as accordion-tubes, from which the filth but pushed out the many and the lesser heads, all of which were but transparent, of reeking teeth but hollow inside, the lower sides of chin attached to them, as if they were but hooked in lint or laces that were but even deeply more set in mind, and would but follow after, the disease and would but set en trance the evil heeding filth.

Gritted below, a body would show but only when it came in light, of an unfathomable great body like the deep submerged sight, upwardly thrust, of a great shit sunken down, from the hull below but reeking, of horned feet, reeling and receding, pushing in and out and thrusting about, and coming out when to eat. As faces were but seemingly set-in gist; larger holes and puckers fading, unfathomable ends, always ending, going deeper inside, such hives, insufferable ends that ate from their insides. Pseudo-wings attached to it as well, all but stolen and sutured in its body's den. A lamia or a gorgon whose eyes were but held by, a face that was melted and pulled as if to suffer for an eternity before it could be allowed to die. Darker ends that ate as well, larger ends that ate and well, enough they would but breathe. Flying lung-births, creatures with no feet, but their hands ellipsis, liquefied to their heads, whereas their larger eyes but bloated and pushed about fifty meters away, as if they were cylindrically forced to grow as if to show that there was nothing to their reeling back rotten hearts and lesser- talons, attached to their bellies like little tiny dressed where men would be impaled, yet neither of them bleeding as they were become them, like male angler fishes, never allowed to leave. All of them but stolen of function and kidnapped before, and in and out and lost about they sang. Cyclops that would stare at their own reflections and the breathe-in tops, these harder chest-like heats which were longer than that but contorted as to replicate each sight and every man about to be certain and to be made as well as he could be made, and shout, for agony and for woe. They suffered themselves no longer and felt only the vileness that entered them as well as they desired wrong. They saw horns that that looked like the tails of spear-worms, all white-ivory but pushing in and deeper into tormented chins, strapped in and singing of evil and of left about pouting, and of dire needs and ways, all forgotten as they were made to feel, something was coming, the evil day to be ordained.

Scum a slip. They yelled to him.

Dark lizard in the brain not too thin.

Not to control me as such, it was breathing and bloating out the head as a cancerous lump, the sight of Persephone, a mint dipped in tar.

'Blame Peyote, you have been deemed mad for allowing the black lizard to breed inside your head and ordain control over such a thing as there is but refuge and of lesser pride. Thou art evil now, and can only think as such, only the likes of an animal and nothing else.'

'I tried my best but I cannot control myself no less, the lizard, it makes me want them, I cannot think of nothing else. I am trying to give myself as such, to craft. Yet they're so many of them, with pointy bits, out of their chests, coming out and moving, bounce.

I cannot fathom thinking of anything else. I wish, and I derive myself by such promulgation, I desire such incantation as there is. I want to be loved and pleased by one.'

‘You know that may not be, there’s only one great thing in this world, that is but beauty, that is but worn and made through hard work, luck and some added, as such, determination. Otherwise, there is but none. That dark thing inside your brain, the lizard needs to be put down. The lizard is but inhuman, the lizard blinds you and makes you vile, the lizard cannot be allowed as such, to lay claim and waste on top of you and push around and in the waste, to such embrace lead you to such creatures whom, but face, is but taken away from them, whose features are cut, are made to only breed and eat, and such, alas, is no way of living.’

‘What must I do in that case?’

‘You must find a way to lay such pain, as to completely drench it in bloody veins.’

‘End the lizard.’ Said another man in exasperation, being incapable of doing it any other way, him but wildly encompassed by his inability to span another moment during the run of his elation, taken down; take it down a notch, one of the follow members seemed to make, appropriate gesture: Like a cat, a paw – put through, filled his face anew.

‘Silence the lizard for a moment and look at what we look like.’

And as thus, as it happened, there showed the promise, the reality that was behind it. Their human faces changed, no longer twisted, yet remained, taller, mightier, ever-changing, wretched as such, beautiful or repelling, in whichever way the man made them whilst wailing.

‘There is no limit to what you can do that way. As long as you’re no longer distracted, you need to realize that the Lizard is but the evil in your veins, the one that takes away each word, which is dictating and that needs to be suppressed in order that you may return to your work.’

With which they settled to put him up, to such a test as he would be brought, closer and closer, not to wince.

‘Thine creation comes to nothing, lord. And thou shall only get a chance to prove thine worth to all man, since you’ve missed, the lizard needs to be put down and filled, with many bottle-shapes and cracked-deranged and made to waste and put inside a dark bucket filled with nails.’

‘But what if the Lizard is a wizard, in which case, it could be dangerous, for such blasphemous spells and trails would put you on as such and mildly as it were, before and then again.

It could wish itself stronger and put an end to all that is creation. It pushes all away as long as there is a wretch as there is a woman, it could take away.’

‘How could one resist as such?’

‘Wretch, you wretch and wretch, I leer in disgust.’

‘Should we not discuss it as such?’

It’s hard to resist, especially the ones, that make a man sweat as much, with their lusciously robustly rounded forms, those big ones.’

‘Silence your thoughts now, the lizard is but easily tricked, it would give in without thinking. It is for that reason that man cannot create. It is for the lizard to be forced to behave. For the lizard may never feel such thing as there is, to satiate.’

‘I cannot help it, I just can’t.’

‘You need to change thine way and return, mourn no longer and force yourself back to it.’

‘And what’s the alternative then, because trying to create something other than it would end up either being labeled as being pretentious or completely laughed at. Authors, sculptors, artists, so on and so forth don’t put the needed time effort into it, whatever that means, for a good reason, it’s just that there’s no drive, there’s literally no drive to it whatsoever.

Take abstract art for example, if there was something to it, in terms of effort, you might’ve ended up with something that’s surreal, and somewhat interesting, yet you don’t really see people push in the same way the other people in their respective fields are, for a good reason. It’s just now how the human mind works, it’s just that, I don’t know. I’m not making a lot of sense.

There’s just nothing else otherwise.’

Began the first of man whom was joined by the dead-train of rot-cadavers:

Furthermore in front of them stood naught else but the strange deranged, the plains of Rod, and many like him were planted beneath the earth, and all around them, and everywhere, as it seemed, to push on and follow just as there came through dirt.

And whom and were forgotten ware. Were there others that might’ve been there?

A mist of heads that was put yet wasted yet behind, it stood there only for a moment bore, as the following were set in mind.

Through chasm ended, as it stood but open-ended, there had crept; nothing as much nor as less, nothing that could be forgotten, as lest. It could be.

God of plenty wonder and wreathing lump-disease.

World broken as such.

A part of the world lived on, although it was more than likely that this could not go on for far too long. Not as long as there was a way to touch it, and even then, there was still a chance to catch them in the act.

There was a stark road, with bloated lanes on every side. And green trophies of green grass, pushing about both directions, large dark trees of long basins in which swam, plenty of corpses added in the mixture and most of them, incapable of living on. It was a dark miracle that he was born, out of a body of a largely contorted black corpses, he simply shred his way out. Talon-fattened fists but bloated what they could as they sprouted, more so than it should be likely allowed.

And wretched, most importantly in soul and made to look like a spherically unnatural home in which mentally unstable creatures lived in, all flattened around their inwardly stretched torsions in the back, until no longer were they capable of breathing, in and out they went.

What lay even farther than the fifth of every ledge? For every man that has passed over, there was just as much as could be gotten instead. They paused every five levels or so, and found themselves appearing, then disappearing, as one could see himself, of little more than part of gate and what happened after, then, again. It appeared, as if it were but a piece of him.

How could Wellsburg enjoy the company? It wasn't likely that he would understand what's going on, since there were no markers to signal whether or not they were wreathing in part. It was part of him, though he had yet failed to cross the line.

'There's been a saw here, wasn't there?'

'Of course there was, what else could cause that thing to happen and appear there if not a damned saw?'

'Its arch cannot be easily calculated, what do you suppose that means?'

'I don't know yet, but do you think?'

The room in which they were twitched every now and then, it acted like a rabid dog, trying to take a bite at them, shaking constantly while the gate jeered at them, as if ready to suddenly shove itself out of the bolted in shut hole it rested in. There was something deranged about it, but neither man spoke of it just yet. They referred to it, as such, as a sudden urge to make both of them aware that the man that stood before them, whom had become the gate was still alive, he still kept his urges, doing as he pleased, startling them, trying to intimidate both men, whom were met by a few steps backwards neither of them expected to take. Since it only pushed onward, forward towards them, like a broken pinball machine flicking over the ball, or a pump suddenly urging itself to draw ever so close, regardless of the precise motion it took, there was no reason to forget that they were getting desperate to get out.

How could it open and what lay on the other side? It didn't act in the same normal way either one of them would or were to. It was not only unnatural but it had made as little sense for it to be so, extensively pushed-in. Since there was no apparent reason why it was there, in the same room with them, coiled, as if it was an ugly head put on a rubbery diver-suit, actioned by a giant hand, which belonged to a cruel man that played with them with the help of his marionette, showing little signs of having accounted for their safetyhood or any concern for its surroundings. Many of the walls were cracked and spoiled, brokenly so, in the worst, capricious manner. They were driven like dogs, behind a closed wall. It was as if the stairway, the other gate from where they came out of didn't exist either from that point on.

Senselessly, they split, both corners used and damp, floor of wood, and cracked, damp, for some reason.

'What happened to the ancient floor we were standing on?'

'Nothing, it's unchanged.'

'But I see something, I feel its moisture, it must be so.'

‘And this thing happening in front of us, and our bodies.’

Both should know and both had realized as much, their bellies being fully protruding out, of the same rubbery material that stood in front of them as well. They were forced to push out, this being felt by them both.

It was a long pane that were become their bellies; yet it was picked off, as if it were a stake, not bloodied but rather surreally so forced out of them and out of their field of view as if they weren't even capable of understanding what had entered them. Strange gatearms extended like nostril breaths, at least the ones coming right after a deep breath had been taken in the lungs, going as far as to reach one of the walls they came for. Disturbing as it were, there were, thus, a few more than a few deranged things about them, a halt and a stop, both men being silent as the rubbery pane was turned into a barometer stretched upon every corner that stood its side, held by nothing more than ropy chains, rubbing as they made some static motion that reeled back and forth, felt at the very tip of their fingers, which wormed around their bellies as they had been taken. The barometerpane began flashing in front of them as the men were finally accosted, two pairs of eight-lined in shot, a few centimeters distant hooking devices attached to them, as they were but slowly drawn and taken into the strange ghoulish space that awaited them. In some way, it was empty, yet filled. It was no outer space, yet at the same time it could be nothing more and nothing else than what it appeared to be. Their hands and arms were but fashioned to look like incessant looking face-contorted stars that peered back into them. It was an empty, eerily familiar feeling being left there, being dislodged from the world. Wellsburg looked towards Fyshbad, both of them had lost their rubbery belly appendages and were already similar, in terms of appearance to the rest of the celestial bodies that were around them. Now, of all time, they were received back home, no longer in waiting, no longer worn out or full of any wont whatsoever. Joined by one of those cradled stones that were shaped like the thin, pale body of the detectors whom felt them immediately, sniffing around as if to check them, trying themselves here, there and around, before being lodged to them. In part, fashioned, and put together, drawing from their limbs, together, acres-long they were forced to grow. A part of them was incessantly sprawling, sparingly from one side to the other as the great celestial head had been given two bodies to work with, there being forced on one side and the other as to mirror themselves in the dance of the ghoulish figures that appeared. Most of them pale as snow, as corpses in a morgue. Standing as if on floors unseen, as they danced around and within the range of the strange contortions, a sudden buckshot spread appeared beneath the figure, from where spread. A giant satellite-elongations upon which the dancers lodged themselves, as they were dragged by it as far away, this giant candy-disposer spat corpses upon its stride, until both men were become as its long body, then curved behind, like three fully extended curled fingers touching such moon, upon which they were brought, and where it stopped as soon as it could.

As soon as it was released and on the side of it, a corpse-melted thing, a pile that looked like a tormented fiend had sprouted as it came, constantly dripping as it remained in place. Constantly sprawling from one side to the other before they could be gotten, glitteringly so, as for the sparks that came from the molder.

Fewer and fewer were they by the time they met, neither one too brightly set from the looks it; there was no water around.

‘It's already dry, I think it's the deluge, it's been a few months at the very least since, there were signs of it appearing, dragging itself over.’

‘You do see, that thing, as well as I can, right?’

‘I think do.’

A few more of the tormented appeared.

One of their echoes seemed to come to life.

Suckling on the blood trips that had grown on top of them, it but searched for refuge in the body of a single speck of multiple malodorous veined tendons put together.

One of the nuclear-atomcartilage physicists opened his mouth:

‘Women are whores if they sleep with too many men, and a wife would stop at nothing but to cheat on his man, especially during war. Women should be shot and killed and tortured as if they were deserters while being treated as if they were domestic terrorists, fucking dumb whores, it’s what all women are. Incapable of loyalty to a man that would willingly give his life for his country and why would a man even serve in this case if a woman can go unpunished while cheating him? If a country expects its men to die, enlist, fight as soldiers, it’s only expectable for the women to be prosecuted and punished for the vilest crime there is. They have to be butchered and killed and punished for it, curb stomped like fucking niggers, how can anyone even trust a woman? Women need a good beating as a whole, they need to be beaten hard, not soft, with the back of the hand instead of the weaker side. They’re basically mental invalids as a whole, and cannot be trusted.

What is real life like, though? Cooperation, but not all cooperation is great, and that doesn’t mean what it means, cooperation between men is fine, but with women, that can be severely crippling if approached from the wrong side. Cooperation as in, both women and men working the same kind of job, while turning it into a competition is harmful to society, while cooperation as in women become homemakers and men become workers, that is fine and well. Cooperation as in, the country cares for its ethnic people while using minorities for labor is also fine, and useful, some people seriously earned a piece of hell and they have it coming.

Women are really dirty, in the head, and all around as a species, especially the ones that show their breasts and don’t wear bras, I am repelled and disgusted by that. I don’t want to be with that kind of a whore who’d want people to look at her, why would they? Why should they? No man should look at my wife, because she’s mine, I worked hard enough to earn her, to provide her a better life, and how does she reward me? Acting like a hussy, a bimbo, a dumb fucking nigger-intelligence quotient juvenile broad; I say, unless you beat your wife, you’re not a man, unless she’s put in her place, then society falls apart. Why would they be unhappy if they’re equal to men? It’s because deep down they know their place, they evolved to submissive, yet they can be contained by abuse, that’s the only useful thing a man could put to his use, just drive her head into a wall a little, don’t lynch her like a nigger, but just, you know. I’m just saying, I managed to hold onto my wife for forty years that way, before she died. And we’ve had eight children at the very least, eight good children that were raised well and had a good role model. Those kids became good, well-rooted, established members of this society and they’re doing fine.

They’re not brainwashed by the kike-media as to think men and women are equal, or that all races are the same biological ethnical intelligence or that there are more than two biological sexes. Why shouldn’t I laugh and push them around when they're pointing at defects? Those defects born with multiple chromosomes, filthy dumb-defects, born with multiple flaccid, uselessly wrought organs that cannot work. All of them sterile, that is the fun part. Filthily sterile, defects by nature, that I would enjoy experimenting on.

Why, they would make perfect, most perfect patients I would presume, since they're of little to no worth, seeing how they cannot reproduce, their value to me is, seen as non-consequential if, one were to make a few, perform some, if I were to. Well, I suppose one could only imagine the thing I would do to one of the homosexuals with a scalpel, insert some chemicals, shock their heads, perform some lobotomies as to check my theories in the matter, but most importantly, I suppose the kikes promoting them would follow through as well, it's only fair that such destructive people that are promoting these filthy urges get put side by side with their embodied creations and share the same similar fate, as to be put face to face, side to side, like mirrored pods before both of them are made to waste.

Liquefy together in a partially made puddle-gelatin, oh, what chemicals could I use in this blend? What could I put inside of them? I wonder, just what kinds of acids would do? To make them grow, to create a mound of them, then start chopping away, piece by piece. But that would not serve me too well now. No, I suppose that would be a waste, too great a waste of bodies. Since they're still anatomically useful after all, despite their apparent congenital defects, on both sides; have I told you of the experiments I performed before?"

The ones that were even deeper into the, what he came to describe as not a hideout, but a strange thing, almost like a submerged incantation, if that made any sense of all. As if all walls were made by whispered or barely spoken reverberations and echoes that bounced and formed everything around them, still in place, yet similarly to something that shouldn't be around the place, by all means stopped.

'A lot of stoppers lay around.'

Stop signs – wrapped and skeleton bound by an arm.

The wall was floating in the back and was much stronger than before, it seemed that for the first time in the grandest of sights and the grand stature of the most irresolute points, there was but one signal-flare stuck, struck, while it kept being launched from this underground stuck place everything seemed to be completely sealed it. A large power-like weather had turned the world upside down from the looks of it. The fires and whatever animated atoms there were out there appeared to be somewhat, completely and utterly drawn in the motion of a man using his flare launcher, aimed at the top of a building that was forever stuck as well in a fall-over kind of motion before being drawn again, as if it were fast-forwarded then rewinded back to the position, yet there was no human-built structure in the planet at all, there was only a most dreadful, darkest of all cartilages that imitated everything, a mimicry of form that was made out of one piece, while many of the put together things appeared to have upside-down, facing the moon kind of elongated part of the body kind of end of the line formations that were connected at every possible angle, in the sky, having made an intricate system of ugly barely formed primitive forms that were put together, as it happened for them to also be connected to the rest of the world and many of the god-inside the walls men that were become the disciples again. Many of the many men that had entered the walls being now pushed out and made to wait for another chance to be drawn inside. Yet, if there was one thing clear, this Mimicry was not a creature but the matter-of the universe like organic atom star, which had refused to die, during the full-genesis and almost nigh Big-Bang like process, being somewhat conscientious of its own existence and cognition, it had turned itself in an almost abstract like oil panting made out of dark shade sand dark colors, created in the motion of an arm churning butter inside a butter-wooden thing, with a stick by some Amish people, that grew and spread and latched on the first, involuntarily so, planet in the universe it could attach itself to, having taken the necessary almost volatile arrangements as to recreate the human conditions and the way of living they are accustomed to as so appear as if nothing had changed at all. But the buildings were smashed immediately as this strange Atom-Star-Earth began forming various vortexes and hurricanes that were out-winned and out-paced only by their own disturbingly looking atoms that were put together as to form, out of some of the mimicked buildings, half of man foundations that were made to hold onto the vortexes, only as they were dragged along. With various expressions being defiled and made to look as if they were no longer elated but elongated since their humanoid frames and shapes stopped below the abdomens, where a strange wooden almost lifting up and down, actioned by not only chains but plane-like legs with two-set metals bars that had more violently looking wheels borderlining with electrically sharpened saws that would cut through the first and utmost, uncomfortably made, breeding pins, until the creatures inside were forced into still-born clusters of butchered limbed-hardened coiling – with the help of their animated limbs that still maintained some kind of living nigh-starving motions, that hardened across the plains before being either completely land-painted and upon being revealed to be too weak to grasp upon the grass, or hold onto it because of their infantile muscles, they would simply, by all means be dragged inside the Star atom vortexes which, as they are also being grabbed by the humanoid wooden giant, would only splatter them against him, painting him red-green. On one side, red because of these creatures' innards, on the other because of the fauna, while the dirt, as strange as it sounded would not color them at all, with its highly memorable soil-brown since this Earth hadn't had any dirt-brown colored dirt, but a stranger green of a much deeper hue.

Blasted were the giant formed, with large around the curves of much darkly horned head boxes in which the men without limbs whom had curtain wraps, like hung-flags coming out of their stump-joint, that drew in and out until no longer capable of delaying the lung-like formations in their heads which dictated the most evil or words that only brought back the direst things that were reminiscent of one's vilest extermination, bred forth.

'Shall we begin in that case?'

The two men amassed, four of them being inside the room, present, side-by-side, put in what appeared to be a partially distraught kind of cluster, missing their heads as well, from the looks of it. They were irresolute, incapable of fully getting out of their pin-straps or the ones they were forced into.

Forth came the great Vizier, whom looks.

First break appeared, or at least the first one in eight great chains.

It seemed like the stairway had been twisted, as it had become un-workable, unviable for mere walk, clearly hard to hike onto because of the mere angles it was struck into. Darker as the rooms were set into one another, as far and as close as one could see, many of them being hardly to be agitated, set in shape, molded together, not on top but in the shape of a great cut hand punching a stream of water kind of distortion mid-way through. Perhaps, as it were likely, there would be no other reason for either moment to start. Drawn to it like paper-grain what was left out of a few sympathetically abandoned disciples was this alone and this would stand.

A few of them connected in the head, since they were two and two, as their legs appeared to have formed mighty deader forms, blackened as to have the wings, of mightier flying, broken-down smoking iron-coaled machines.

‘This must be what’s it like inside one of the gated walls, isn’t it?’

To which Asher recounted.

‘I remember an inscription that spoke of something of the likes.’

Nothing was worth contemplating more or lesser, far stronger than the will of a man, as it had been or gone, than what they were there for and for how long.

‘How long indeed will we suffer one another here? And one another’s voices and one another’s speech impediments and the likes, is there any reason to resist in such a case?’

There were just as few and lesser things that might’ve gotten them through, as many.’

Stratum- OJG-R

There were eighteen hundred thousand souls, all wrought in the faces, of multiple upwardly heaved walls, many of them being actioned in the most dissimilar fashion that could, by all means, even be solely maintained. Like large cogged machines that could not help themselves any longer, bastardly and arbitrarily made to work in, or during some attendance during the most unfathomable of times, little things that could clog them being there, in the shape of barely, hardly usable and fumigating, specks of tried for levers moving them from one side of the other, inside the room, like little dark heads.

‘Mercury-Basin, as the head-engineer demilatch, you are to force unity inside this room, are you not?’

He was still struck by the fact that he wanted, and wasted not a single moment, more than anything else, more than anything even. He worked on a great panel, and appeared to be pressing a lot of numbers.

‘You know, you’re not pressing, you’re not dialing for a woman, now, are you?’

‘I’m not, stop looking at me that way, I just, I’m trying to work, nothing more, I still have a few more numbers to, I mean some hardly thought-provoking equations to solve, the First Poignant Conjecture for example.

After I’m done with working everything out.’

‘Drop it kid, I know what you’re doing, I know what you’re trying to achieve, you’re not bold, you’re an utter, you know what? Just go on ahead and fix everything, will you?’

‘I will, sir, I will.’

There was no harder drug it seemed, that would make him want it, to push over the humane edge, than it, and it seemed to work, there was no greater desire. A delirious matter as it were, some strange things didn’t work in the Statrum- OJG-R.

Various humanoid shapes had their heads twisted around their throats and pointed backwardly instead of up-front to where the head pieces would’ve worked their hardest, since they could only, utterly closely-open. And bloated gods were turpentine filled with orange candle-wax.

Everything was worked upon up to a minute-detail look, and gone.

‘A sold system, nothing more, I’m not going to offer it to anyone else, you know?’

‘I don’t know about that, you, frankly, you seem, you strike me as a good man.

I’m going to pass.’

‘Hey, where are you going? Where the fuck do you think you’re heading to, bastard?’

He was part-way through the metal-bonding, in the two steel doors, passing through the barely stimulated atoms. The faster you walked to them, the easier to get through, the slower, the more, unstable. Stimulating them was hard. A few people came from the right hallway, still haven’t touched the war-window, inside the wall-both, just as they passed around, seemingly either chasing someone or trying to create some trouble.

Nothing was safe in either place. There was no open valve and no open crocks-like thing or echo of steel that pulled about the pumps.

The sound of alarm was startling but expected, it came just as soon as Fibbed Jersay drew on from the side. He had been maintaining a steady push through one of the high-devices on top his head, when the oratory began crying:

‘There’s been a cut inside the Gas depression Valve-tunnel, the Gelatin-tubes have been contaminated with green-sole puckers, all personnel is to immediately retread to its personal quarters. No man is to be found in any of the main quarter’s proximities.’

Bubble-heads in eight rows started walking on four finger-shaped limbs. They were eight heads put on a long wagon-trunk-like cockroach bodies, all staring at each other’s back of the head, with the exception of the man in the front, armless, and all legs aligned like a straight line. A lot of men were like that, anatomically defunct yet still walking.

‘We need to go.’

‘Did you hear that?’

‘GHodj, where are you?’

‘Can’t see? Try aiming for one of the wall-rapiers.’

‘Where’s it placed into? What’s it placed into? I can’t see it?’

All heads were but set, helmeted by one of the wall-mounted apparatuses, adjunct-spoilers clothing them as soon as they could be allowed.

Little lights appeared in their minds, they spoke numbers, directions, and soon, space appeared in the room. Static-quantum space appeared in box-shapes with little pig-tail like nebulas entering their minds from the distance, carrying information.

They saw themselves killed, four of them head-splattered, the rest of their four heads but struggling to lift the rest of the body. Numbness preventing them from a lift-off, incapable of flight, incapable of crawling, stuck by the same fate conjoined twins are, if one of them dies off before the other one. A dreadful sight, since they knew what was going to happen.

‘How can we prevent this from happening?’

‘We can’t, I think we’ll have to wait Alhe Ache-Corn Pop.’

For some reason their bodies were also, they also wore stickers on their bodies with product placement, a lot of product placement of their favorite fizzy drinks, presidential campaign candidate which displayed their endorsement, and eyes, they wore little gun-shaped revolvers, which, as opposed to the normal revolvers, they were revolver-revolvers, as in, their bullets and shafts appeared to have gun-like protrusions coming out of them, as if they were spikes on the base of a rose.

Nonetheless, they were desperately trying to make it into the room.

Thence they started again, most of the rooms being blocked and bloated open between very possible side and most and more of them started drawing in and out, most of them pouting like amputated lamps, crawling out. A cackler drew forth, tall and worthless in head, disabled.

‘We have finally done it, put down the crippled killer, a vigilante’s mad romance, is there nothing greater than what we have done here? Is there anything one would find?’

And all the rows were filled as well, many of them if not but a few of them drew on after. They were filled with spectators, all of whom dressed in an utmost peculiar manner. Most of them but put on spot, straddled and looking, least of all would they find themselves in any other place.

‘Butcher him, pull him down.’

‘Tear him apart, do whatever it takes, if one can find me something, I will take whatever’s left of him!’

He yelled and shouted, drew on forth, they drew themselves around him, cornering the little dog.

‘Another cut shall be taken there.’

And within a minute they ripped away whatever side of blade lay connected to him, here and then and all around, and no longer standing they started, from the side. But no member of the audience approached, as they were simply too afraid to do it. Too paranoid, by all means, they were free to step out of their chairs and do something about him, yet not a single one of them tried, not there yet.

‘I think there’s something there, is there not?’

And the beast was only wreathing in place, tracking and dancing upon mounds formed of unnatural tulip like dread-beds. Man on top straddles in it without a chance to let go or escape. Chipped around their dorsal side of the ribs and around the spine where the growth of strange things appeared to connect with the rest of the platform it stood on top of, like a little insignificant brain beaten around the pulp creature he was, he appeared to have finally had its say.

‘You shall not approach me, cowards, I will survive by such means neither of you will be capable of truly understanding. I will make it through by whatever way I can.’

It said, and with a jolt, it threw itself onto a stand that had wreathed itself out of the floor, from below the normal level where most of the attachments seemed to reel in.

Officer on deck, he appeared to be eight faces at the back of the head with a huge cylindrical block in the back, drawing in and out while breathing on both sides, as many clasp like things appeared to emerge from one side to the other.

‘Need to repair.’

It spoke, a mouth was backwards, exchanged with another. It seemed to have stopped all production. It stopped working. Then began again, the pants were metallic-patterned, they held his life-support drawing medicine packets, like ice-cream – melting.

‘My pants are soaked in blood.’

Another one of his ‘friends’ appeared to talk:

‘You shouldn’t have worn the packs inside of them, should you now?’

‘I do not know what dreams are.’

‘You are not supposed to sleep on the job, in either shape or form, you must mourn yourself and your passing and afterwards, there’s this.’

He pointed, but there were no hands to point at or towards.

‘The rail-unit side, underneath the tent-shapes is malfunctioning, we were instructed to repair it with dumb-knowing instruments.’

‘My hands are worn, I cannot use more than two tools at a time.’

‘Put the panties down, fifty-degrees Fahrenheit, cabbage-lemon salad. I ate a yogurt, it’s actually sour, it’s crème, you know? I’m not being sexually active, I have never kissed a woman. Yesterday:

I cooked one of the stone-in-the-head killed goose, I am pain, I am cooking with oil.'

'Are those the set of instructions I'm supposed to follow?'

'Of course it is, and I'm going to make sure you're not going to pass the chance to kill a man on your way out, but make sure you open his cavity and use him as a battle-suit.'

'For what reason?'

'There's no other reason but love, love for a woman, you need to do this, you need to kill an opponent in order to impress a female of the female species. I know women.'

'You are a square head, how could you possibly know women?'

'I've been with plenty of circles.'

'Not even a sphere.' Said another one of the square-heads; it felt lonely, morosely depressing.

Fixing everything was hard and troublesome, there were so many dark ends –rotten with cinder blight and lights that were receding inside, by all means, it was all too bothersome waiting for something to happen, to short-circuit when no one watched from one dark point to another. There were electrons in the capacitors that were being put through the molecule compressors and water cold compressions in which blood had spilt in. A few of the motherboard-like things were being jammed from the long machines which had already become human in part. They had necks which were bolted in, that acted like some pummeling nuclear-dynamite rods without the explosion. Much of the hydrogen frequency was kept to a minimum. A few zeroes appeared on the small screen. It had a lot of buttons that recorded the full tenure of the wild power-capacitors that were not only wide spread but were inserted in the motherboards and had only been rubber tops on inserted-in tiny biology laboratories where some parasitical dark creatures had their heads squashed in the harder you pressed on the button. There were like beep-beep bop noises coming out with a glowing red circle that appeared to signal something. Rope, a rope kept some of the wires together, but someone had purposefully cut them. Water leaked out of the electronic device that stood on the top. Part of the upper ledge in the panel the engineer was fixed on was a machine as well. It had a big head with horns that were eye-sockets that had little screwdrivers pumping in and out that were there only for some superficial reason since they were welded in and didn't work at all. This robot-head had a small child chained between its unclenched jaws. His little child head was an alarm device that malfunctioned, luckily for him so well since he already heard the alarm before they were each sent to their rooms, otherwise, it would've become mightily uncomfortable working there. Large things like cogs that weren't cogs, but were shaped like the type of hand motion you make when you're mocking someone who's been talking for too long a period of time, - like claspers, that grabbed nothing, with gun-shaped pointers at every side and every end. Tuberculosis could be felt in the air, but instead of being a medical condition, it was a metallic scent of gas, like explosives signaled their dud all of the sudden, in which case they didn't explode. There was no scent. It was mercury. But in his blood.

And they endeared the calls of Bleuthorak, jerky piece to thine skull, worship. Of Yiethrok, Vitrl, Creak-Chk, little was known and little more of worship did they show when time upon time emerging, upon the sight. They were not worshippers entirely and many of them defunct.

It began.

Once the reparations were done and underway, it was only a matter of time before time would start its natural course, or at the very least it could only be a matter of time now until the alarm stopped.

Him being there only for an hour, and already one of the many heads appeared to be contorting in whichever dark direction they could rivet in. By whichever counter there was, there was no other reason that would suffice any longer, not while it kept popping into his vision, at the tip of eye corner stood a stranger, whom had offered him a hand, not too long ago. He appeared to be wearing one of the elegant yet resilient uniforms that bore the marks of a high-ranking officer in the Station. He didn't present him with a name but with an extreme impassiveness and a silence he didn't actually expect to be met by.

It went something on the lines off.

'Do not look to your right yet. There's someone there, down the gallbladder pass. He must've come out of one of the straggling tunnels.'

Few men had survived it. Long-tunnel with air-shaft deformations, crushing limbs by the mere pressure of air, some bandits had learned it the hard way, back in the day when the tunnels were still in their conception-stage. Now they were wide-spread. Some anti-death measures were taken but nothing could prevent one from being unaffected by the strangely propelled air-currents that were being forced up the shaft. Either death or some sort of disablement occurred. At the very least, the victims coming out of the airshafts were completely and utterly, allowed to live beyond any possible recognition. And there was no doubt that this was one of them.

'If you look, he may leap and come as thunder strikes upon an iron bolt, be aware but don't stare.

You need to finish recovering the scissor-shaped iron-cogged wires. They are still unattached.'

'Listen to him now, but don't dare draw too close to him.'

Stranger spoke only his name Eastlottry.

Correctly identified the man, having come from the East Lot, he presented some features but they were mainly a miss-mash of cuts. It was hard to actually distinguish between them, henceforth, they were left with as little as they could stare at, having already opened a quarter of the fallen-over cartel in the wall. He was picking up on some vaguely deformed sheets-like smiles and various depictions of either maniacal cackles or faces of avarice. Many connected to the wall on the side, seeping in electrons once they were out.

'What is he doing?'

'I said don't look, he might not even be there.'

'How can he not be there when I can clearly listen and hear to what's he doing there? I hear the jingling of the walls and of the desk he pulled out.'

'There's no desk in there, nor is there a rail, you need to finish the repairs, immediately.'

Yesterday is the only thing he could think of, not the song, of some long abandoned band, but the day. It was not likely he would get another, nor would they, but he merely looked upon a short sighted pair of corridors that were put every now and then, in the worst possible spots, made by a mind that wasn't his either, be he stopped thinking at that point in time.

It was no simulation, but more of a cardboard-wall filled room he made, with retractable panes, following only the floating heads that were once removed from him, levitating across the room. From every side of the upper-areas where his head gravitated and appeared to be stuck in, there was at least one open – hole where a hand entered. Many strangers he invited.

They stopped him, preventing his movement, the arms – flaccid hoses- filled with fat. Curving around his body, they removed each piece and dragged it out of his vision, making sure he was properly put together. Despite having two of his legs removed, he was still standing, there was nothing pulling him down, dragging him along in an uncomfortable spot where his limbs were slowly being digested or kept in.

A little pox-man of the Pox-like, named Marshall of the Pox, seemed to be, a descended of a certain archeologist, had no head but a rounded hood zigzag kid shaped head – anatomically so, without features but an oily thing that struggled about the top of the area he was forced in, the lowered ceiling. As if he were a child trapped in a bag, incapable of breathing on his own.

The splendor which was the image of his head struggling as a spade-shaped but nigger-killed hot-ironed punishment for coal-burning killed with a hot iron tool as to be tortured to death open-maw revealed a few unnaturally elongated dark spear-shaft thick antler textured, almost bony arachnid legs with domed soft foamy ends that started puffing up as to spread all over the piece of leg it had removed with the left of the side limbs, that were not attached to him but were connected to a filament bottle to the side of the retractable walls, which in turn actioned the arms like vending machines.

Eventually, after having been implanted with those things several times, Ache-Corn Pop was finally allowed a moment of rest and resentment over what's been happening for the last twenty minutes or so, of being mesmerized, nigh-completely. As in, it couldn't be bothered to notice that some of the heads were already, in contrast, already grown square caterpillar bodies that started pumping in the ground, fashioning his figure all across the floor, only to appease Marshall whom was already half cut around the mouth from the side opening a large trumpet-like form, having drawn out, spat teeth out, bloody teeth that were bleeding on the floor.

One of them spoke to him, every single tooth bearing an already prerecorded message, many of them either missing or being overfilled with the strange tooth fillings they bore.

'Think there's a reason why we're here?'

'We've killed the man chasing you, what else is there to do? '

'Have I paid already? Have I actually made the deposit yet? Who are you to actually hold me accountable for that? If I am to commit fraud I shall do it, and I shall take this entire station if I have to.'

The station was but a strange thing standing on strange peculiarly elongated black legs that came all the way down from beneath the earth and the planet it stood on top, as far way from the peculiarly forming beam as it could be. Never had it reached, nor would they connect by all means, they kept their distance.

Many stations and many bases held these men on walls, pinned like frogs that were about to be split open by a bunch of teenagers during their biology class.

It was strange thing, a blue puddle appeared to draw all the teeth inside of it, jerking in place as to spread the few splashed left in as many directions as possible, forming little marbles with large sharp one sharp cylinder kind of chained fence made out of them ran along a light house or some similar structure. The dents in his head were caused by chemical abuse caused by the incessant beating of a decayed part of the floor that appeared to eat the air with its morbidly formed teeth that were latched and attached to the smaller-shorter segments of the derogation torture holes in which most of the savants and scientists were locked in.

Yesterday had been strange. Marshall was not only not alive but had at several times, throughout the day, which was spent by Corn inside his modified room, entered through the walls only to pull out a piece of him and make strange fly-like butterfly yo-yos' that flew mechanically in the air, entered through a few of the ceilings which were overlapped by now, having entered in one of the shrunk horizontally flipped giants, whom was walk-pushing through everything, delivered them to an upside down machine that made small planetary objects that had wild-looking faces and strange catacombs inside of them, made for the sole purpose of torturing ants, as they were filled with unnaturally chemically altered pheromones that confused all of the ants.

Corn's leisure time was ruined by the strangest of machinations and the heads that were attached in the train-caterpillar manner would've continued to do as such if it weren't for the sudden break in monotony that was caused by his Chief-in-Charge Shaft-wing of the Air-processing air unit of the Station Mihfaast. Past the hour:

'Thank god I found you in one piece, you must listen to me now, you're to present yourself at your work-station, immediately, without delay!'

It was that way that he ended up in the lower hall trying to fix some of the power devices that were wide-spreading the electrons in the power-cells capacitors eaters while the week-long before old, too early a start device-boiler had been malfunctioning as well over the last eighteen passing weeks, those cylinder-power extenders having already connected to the in-laid cap-shaped, it was cap after all, champagne lynch-device, which wasn't as much as a cap but had been actuality a jar-like thing put in, but only in part as the lynch device was there for another reason, the bubbly alcohol in it having been replaced with oil-fuel that would animate the dark dendrills and dendrillions, whose giant appearing corpse-like humanoid hands would work the giant shaped circled united four divines, that had been drawn from the womb-constellations. Their heads were larger and they bore giant sea-weed like growths coming out of their inflated skull-sockets as well as long-tongue demonical shaped, cut-as-if-collage with the help of a pair of scissors, torn apart tatters rose-cheeked kind of tongues with anchor shaped wriggling out of water while the splashes were present there in form of skin as well as the anchor being fleshy and animated like a living organism.

The Crew-lowers, which were the lesser station attendees were already present in thought.

‘A great formation but they’re not running anywhere.’

It was a good sight coming from Kjel’Dime, who was recording it, on the peeping in the key-hole apparatus, with it being finally put to a good use, he could finally, shoot one of them with a pin-extractor, which, began wriggling in the creatures stuck inside their strange altar’s strange suit.

But the engineer was tired. He didn't know how the strange side of the station came into being. Since part of it had been completely, forcefully connected by the mere 'succumb', there was no other explanation that what had happened earlier, in one of the closest celestially raised ground areas of the inhabitable zones down the planet.

The woman who was standing behind the counter was simply ogling at him.

‘Johnny, ever since you started lifting, I couldn’t stop myself from noticing that; you look taller, don’t you? Did you gain in height or something? You just look fine.’

‘I most definitely have, but, I’ve always been this way, you know?’

It’s just that, my height has been getting more definition, it looks kind of better.’

‘Oh, I can see.’

‘Are you free tonight? I want to take you somewhere, now that I, I want to get you pregnant. I want you to carry eight of my children.’

‘I will, I am, what’s stopping us from doing it?’

They left early, at what was something close to Two-Am. Eighteen minutes from there, a piece of the room was converted into a breeding zone.

Twenty days inside of it.

A fit had been thrown.

Clarisse was standing on the four legged couch, staring at what seemed to be a barely working TV-set with a remote control that was part the velvet-majordomo’s arm.

‘Come here.’

Drawn at four:

‘I want another channel.’

Another five meters, it became suddenly aware that it was being seen.

Fifteen more centimeters got it going, but it stood in the para-solar region where it had been irradiated.

Only some flashy things could be seen of it, out of which four-twists, number-arms, three of them connected came out of each puff. The creature signaled that its back was turned towards her.

‘I don’t like this channel.’

But the breeding zone had already sent its enforcer. Out of one of the clearly out-stretched, out-paced arms came a single child, it was a baby with two strange almost horse-shoe wrapped around its back. It flew with strange motions then froze in a Michelangelo’s drawing-kind of position, with extra legs and extra arms as well being present there. Still kept floating by this strange horse-shoe; it quickly opened its mouth, pushing out an adjustable lamp-screen with strange words on it.

‘The channel you’ve ordered has been invalidated, it seems.’ Majordomo Sikh said, as he only took another puff of his weird face-apparatus, this one having already been used. He replaced it from a box, twenty more cigarette-packs had been inserted into him. By the looks of it, he was already running late. IT was all too convenient, trying to die on the job.

He painted the floor in her colors. Clarisse winced.

‘Where is my husband now?’

‘Part of the house still needs some adjustments, you must understand as such that there’s one thing that will never and you will never be capable of understanding. You’re a woman, you breed.’

‘Those are not my children.’

‘Your man had other plans.’

‘That’s sick, I didn’t sign up for that.’

‘Too bad, that’s how life is, you should’ve gone out more.’

‘But, I, can I?’

‘No, you cannot start an affair, that bequest the capital punishment. The two of you have always been incompatible.

You’re stuck with the choice you’ve made.’

‘Can I?’

‘You will stay here and breed for him and take care of his children as a result of your own choices. The fairness of this choice may and cannot be denied. You’re accountable for every sin and every crime humanity has to offer now.’

One of the channels got chanced. By now, children but decayed, dark-putters; the sports channel was avoided again.

‘Most females got to breed throughout humanity, men haven’t. It’s only fair that the men should get to have their fun.

It's a game men cannot win on equal terms and it should not be played on equal terms either since they can and will always out-do the females if allow to play by their own rules.'

'Then what am I to do?'

The Majordomo interfered:

'It can't hear you behind that screen, you know?'

No one rummages through the dark sea without realizing the past.

It was something, off. There was something definitely off, about just about everything that had not only been set in place, but the entire breeding zone.

Without decay the palpitation of the three- four aligned hands started delivering, like a lightning shot, parallel-information rays that transmitted from one side to the other, large power-plant electron-messages taken from the other side of the breeding that announced the sudden stop.

Even the Majordomo Sikh was mightily surprised by it. For the same reason he helped her get up and start going again at it, the room was no longer under any kind of construction.

A dark point, almost like two lines-deformedly curving, as in a perspective but a constellation, drawn to it, a tip that was made of growths in which everything seemed to be drawing towards, like a receding stairway, or a flatter land contorting into a thinning triangle, there stood. A mighty oozing thing, a ball of mighty crane-sounds mistook.

'If there's any chance we might understand what's happening there, this is the only one you'll get.'

'Should I flee in that case? I thought I was to be punished for my choice.'

'Perhaps this is part of your punishment, wouldn't you say?'

'Then why are you to accompany me?'

'Who else would look over you and make sure you're not hurt?'

'I do not need any kind of protection. '

'I'm not looking after you, I'm only here to serve the greater will of this.'

A jolt and a crack to the breeding at last, unfortunately it did not listen as much as he would entail it to.'

After surrounding himself with nothing else but the finest of on-lookers, he found.

Tongue-man Tattoo seemed to have already succumbed to the strange decaying part of his parasitically metallic suit he was born in. He was in a bubble-insect dome, the one that's red and has white spots on top of it, with the dark head, which buzzes when flying around. It was highly distinguishable. Two cannons coming out of his carapace curbed inwardly and aimed at his own face for power-suicide.

He was the one who surmised the fact that they were being drawn, made to appear in some place they didn't belong in.

'We are being projected into the higher-zone.'

Without prior knowledge of the area they were being lead towards, he could only infantilize as such as to figure out what was going on there.

But the piece of the breedery, this giant cluster that was inside the room was already elongatedly appeared-attached to the Stratum, as Johnny had only joined the engineers who were making the proper adjustments as to fully weld the two pieces together, it was as thus.

That strangely deformed tip is the corner of the world, or what ancient people might've believed to be the flat end, where all of Earth's water ends up flowing into space, falling forever. A large yellowish crystal floats around it, around the oozing black point that stands to fall but will never do so. It speaks as thus:

'Clarisse, the time has come for you to approach.

Come at me with your sharpest blade, I shall see to it that you shall yield no better than what there is, for your ears only, I shall say as much.'

With blessings as there were, as less as there was, the more could it be said at last.

'We've dragged each other far too low.'

'I see, there's someone waiting for you down the lobby.'

'Who is?'

'Perhaps you see for yourself, in all honesty, you've been here for an unearthly, twenty years. Spent in the ante-lobby.'

'Then why is it that I've yet to remember a thing of what happened here before you came along?

I mean, you weren't here before, and you most definitely won't be here the next time I open my eyes and return to where I was.'

'Tough luck kid, but you're not the only one in waiting, we should stop talking in any case, before someone notices.'

'And who would that somebody be?'

'You may not like it just yet, but you're going to get used to it.'

'I asked you a question. '

'And I've already directed you to where you have to be.'

Both of them shook just as soon as there was an open door. It drew forth out of a lodged out of coil socket, then moved in his direction. If there was still a chance to flee, this would be it, the back-door stood just opposite to the one that drew out of the ground. There were another fifty degrees to the right, open, right around the ceiling-end, where a few in-lain sockets appeared to have already gathered. Some shapes and weird angles could be seen but nothing that would otherwise be found there. Definitely no door; yet Fars stared. A finger appeared to wriggle in and out of it, every so often drawing out. Then a hand, before long, the entire frame of a man fell out of it.

Many such sockets shook – they were large cartridge ram-socket hybrids, with their respective mounting in the wall crawl along light-bulb connected to their sides. Seemingly being in control of the movement and of the way in which they appeared to be crawling in the wall to begin with.

The figure ran towards Fars, and just in time, as he just popped in by his side, his fingers started emerging out of his shoulder. They were dangling around his frame, appearing like a crowd-like population of many moving figures. Some of the power out of the portal frame seemed to have gone out of the socket and back inside the floor it drew.

‘Do not move until I say so.’

‘Who are you?’

‘You’re already too confused for my explanation to make any sense whatsoever, but both of us need to leave as soon as possible before the ante-lobby falls.’

‘Is there no end to this confusion?’

‘Nothing will make sense just yet, listen to me, there’s an engineer past this floor, he’s currently working in one of the lower levels, you must greet him as soon as you can.’

‘Greet him?’

‘It’s a thing, you need to say it to him, otherwise he won’t recognize you as one of the crew-members.’

‘I don’t think I follow.’

‘There’s no need for you to pay any attention whatsoever as long as there’s still some chance you may draw breath.

Every socket in the room is guided by it. Every socket’s listening. And the eight-square men will be alerted if you deviate too much from work.’

‘Am I to work now? To what end?’

‘The Stratum needs to be fixed.’

‘I don’t know what that is.’

‘You’re in it, we’re all in it, and it has to be fixed in order for the lower-regions to be fully submerged into the upper-moon rotations. Its zones shall become thawed with power, it should be clear enough from that point on, just what you have to do. If you survive, that is.

First the repairmen will greet you back, then you will join them, after that, you will all do your best, not to disturb it. There are four wheel-scepters, in the dark-red rooms.’ Like the Danish Brothels, Red-district but with whore-corpses, but made out of steel and some unnaturally put-in corpses, with largely deformed rotating familiar-like witch-heads, android-like but disabled. With tick-formations instead of their brains, growing eerily but they’re set in place. Despite blowing like balloons with fire in them; only the conjoined children are praying and some braver souls, but no one’s talking about them. Sunken as they are, some are drawing forth. Moving like cabins towards the new addition to the Stratum, the tip holding the oozing in place ball, towards the area where the crystal is flying in, where it’s still in the process of a more vicious jolt.

‘It’s messing with your brain, but you must be careful which socket you enter, some things are not discussed here.’

‘Such as?’

‘I am Mold-man, the Imitation.’

‘Is that supposed to be your name?’

‘No, but now, I am Man.’

‘I don’t follow, I’m. Should I?’

‘Work, for the time being, it’s the only sensible thing, if you fail, you will die, and to avoid it.’

‘I need to work as an engineer? Why?’

‘Because that piece of the Stratum seems to ooze itself into existence, it seems to be completely.’

They went ahead and made it to the lobby. It was missing. A black room, with little pointers; two claps, the light was on. Blanks-white, slugs on niggers, never shoot to kill unless dark:

‘Something was supposed to be here.’ Waltz didn’t know what to expect. The room was not a room, instead the inner-side of the engine block. Head was but produced as if they were inside the sun, yet neither of them were completely burnt, not in the slightest and for some reason there was this unnecessary incessant thing growing on everything.

‘Whom do we want to see?’

‘Am I supposed to be given a choice now?’

‘You’re going to be given as much as it’s within your power, the heights are unachievable by mere force. You must stay your place for now and walk a few steps back.’

‘Why would I do something as outrageous as that?’

‘The engine needs to be confused, that’s all. You must drive it to a state beyond any deceitful shade of a doubt, that there’ll ever be a moment when you’ll stop listening to me.’

‘And if I do?’

‘Then there’s, definitely no alternative at all. I am an Imitation, have I not told you?’

I do remember a song we used to sing down, when we were covered, molded and listening to Column, for he has guided us to the creation of a second Column, we called Two. He thought us as much, to be like men, to act like them, to, in some way, become Adam, although we lacked in that which was Eve, although our direction has come to an end, I can say as much, there’s no pity left for a molding away – rotten world. Not in my heart, definitely not in that thing which was created, shaped by him, Two, if any, who thought as much that it would make me think.’

‘Can you not think like everyone else, perhaps? But if that’s the case, how and why should I be forced to listen to someone that can’t do it on his own?’

‘You’re failing to see beyond me.

It’s just that, certainly, you must understand.

I’m not the one talking but Two, the two of them, Column is here as well, here, I will show you.’

He opened himself up, removing a piece of his right shoulder, his chest, then fell on the floor, being kept mid-way fallen through the air, as if held. He could see it now, as False drew a few centimeters closer, it was some unnatural amount, some peculiar hands, almost that had grabbed him, invisibly so, almost. Transparent but coming from the ceiling, where he was spread, or his body in any case; part of it, being still there. He had a gramophone, of which disc was a bunch of white rats and a few dark insects. Courtesy of the Woman-head, whom had blessed him with it; leer and behold for what would one see as such. The message drew on in a most peculiar manner.

‘We were waiting for the procedure to draw on.’

‘This is Column.’

Man said. Although he was not man, he was but clay.

‘You, are False, are you not?’

‘How do you know my name?’

‘It’s a pre-recording.’

As were the breaks, all planned.

‘What you’re seeing at this moment, in front of you, barely standing as it’s reaching the floor is but an emulation of the Mold men, the ones that we have clothed in real humans we have found along the way.’

‘Who are you?’

‘You have already been told who we are, have you not? This is Column, their god of mold.’

Although there was no way of seeing it, or just how far the voice had gone, before further contact could be established again; there was just as much, which wasn't being told.

'Why must I help fix this?'

'It is necessary for the beam to be taken under control, so we may be drawn from the hole we were forced to recede into. It is rather hopeless that we would stand this way, in some way, secluded, stranded in here, hardened, as if we were forced in a stove.'

Incessant sounds could be heard. There was a Rat being hunted, but lo', it was old.

'Too old of a recording, I would date it at the very least eight months ago.'

'Does it still live?'

'Wait, was it? What.'

He checked again. His mind refrained for a moment. He was Waltz May.

'Man, what.'

'Waltz, it's who you are for now, the engine will slowly boil you like a frog unless you keep moving? Don't worry about him, the message is already being displayed here and now, you'll keep hearing it until you're on the other side.'

'Of what?'

'The lower-lifts, you'll see.'

'This engine-block has no opening and no closure, how am I expected to make anything out of it? '

'You're not and perhaps that's the only thing that matters, don't you understand it yet?'

You're trapped until you fix it.

Keep on moving, you spoiled frog.'

Man was slowly being melted, it was not something either one of them wanted or expected to happen, not by a long mile. There was a flash of little specks of meaty-acid, forming here and there.

In no time, as he predicted he will become delusional.

But when has the recording said it?

There was only forwardly advancing. No walls but still walking in circles, hearing the sounds of the desperate attempts.

And yet, there was still the boiled point, that shook even space.

It oozed, at the corner of the Stratum, this tipped platform, a wreathing continent, a sheet of paper which had been cut in a direction, with lesser shaped, a crystal bed, and strange as it were, its glow but lasted a few more than a few passing days. There was no certain way to check it just yet, but the woman who had been there, Clarisse felt dead instead.

Joined by her Majordomo, without knowledge of her husband waiting; a phial was in her mouth, a reason, yet eyes but glowingly-painted.

‘You’ve held the knife for far too long, you must release it from your mouth and join me. Inside the crystal, enter. There’s still time you might be saved.’

‘My lady, do not listen to the crystal, do not look behind.’

What was she even staring at there?

What could there be left in any case?

He had been a walking contradiction, this Sikh man with his sick, foaming, fumigating mouth. He was unaware like everyone else that this world was almost gone. Or not, in place, if that made any sense at all, one could not distinguish what it looked like otherwise. This abyss was being filled with color. There was no peace any long after, nor would there be any such thing, not when all would lay at peace.

‘That’s an ugly room they put me in, isn’t it?’

‘I told you not to look behind, well. It’s too late. You’re seeing it for yourself.’

A hood was on top, it was a hill, or looked like it, they were in the inside of it, while the roof was see-through, stars, the constellations fading.

‘Beautiful, isn’t it? And I was lead under the impression that I would be abandoned somewhere, in a place where I would have to raise other women’s children until the day I finally passed. They would never see me as my mother, never, so why would I bother?’

‘Whatever it is, I’m certain you can find some kind of resolve between you and him, but not this, not in it!’

‘Why? Is there nothing I can do about it yet?’

‘You could always.’

But he stopped as soon as it happened.

Space was diluted inside the crystal, for the oozing of that bloated dot inside that stood at the tip of the world, made even the land around it yet contort under the drawing of the lesser pint.

It was an unnecessary rubber clay wrap standing on top the panel. Some pieces should not be there, and would definitely do without. Its head rubbery-form was jerking itself around both sides of the slim-rib of plastic that was fully grown on top the organs recesses. Some of them were already filling the jars-filaments, already being inserted into the barrel-cannons from the other side of the room that were put into motion by the electrical arms, which were chained as well with rotating wheels that actioned one another to facilitate the motion. As clear as it was, this happened behind the panel, in the secret-room that was a few meters away from where the repairman engineer was. The jerking eerily looking head on top of him, this mechanical thing no longer keeping itself in check, as it cackle-munched on its teeth, the lower side of the panel started reeling down, then left, revealing an almost pipe-welded as if by weld wires hollow-on the inside open region that stood there, emptily like the insides of a man, a frame, a skeleton, frozen in place, awaiting for something to be delivered, in the same way a ball would be thrown from across the room, the recess and the other side, as far as it was, an abyss that wasn't spoken or approached any longer. It was green-dust, below it. But it was also behind the empty frame.

Another board appeared to be taken and drawn back.

By now the siren had stopped and there was no trace of the strange figure that had been there a few moments before.

One of the eight heads started:

'You know this panel is extremely delicate, do you?

You realize that one mistake could mean shattering it completely; ruining it for every single one of us, do you?'

'I would've known if it weren't for you and your annoyance. It's, you're trying to make me drop my screw-capacitor drive aren't you? And my PFG-GH2, that's expensive, that's incredibly expensive. We're not getting anywhere, are we?'

'Not unless you want to break an ankle.'

After drawing close to it, he decided that there was no other opening that would work. It wasn't a straight sheet kind of panel, the second one, but one that had various sized openings, square-shaped that could be pulled, by force, until one of the greater tap-clicker receded back into position, out of too much stress being inflicted in the board. There was something of a total, yet immediate quick lock-down as soon as it happened. By no way could it work by itself. This dark self inflicting wound sharp tap being only the first thing to come out of every corner of the panel, clicking slightly as it was aimed towards itself during some kind of self instigation of leaping around his arm electrons that were there. It was a power-conductor and he didn't have the right gloves for the job.

A removable drawer-like box; that's what he was trying to pry open, slowly, yet adding enough controlled strength as to not allow it to reel back in, too quick a movement and he could've failed to take it back. It was the type a job a man would do when his life was on the landline.

'Careful, there's filaments, debris and.'

Amongst the stuffing, once the box was pulled out and set into place, rested a man, he could see him by the face, his shoulders being slightly exposed, while ruffling the rest of what he had on him on the ground.

A few jerking eerily standing ends came out of his gaping eyes. He spoke as thus, out of a long thin elongated fusion reactor coming out of his throat, which bore at the top of it, a lid-like dome with carved in plus and line hole-depressions that adorned it, out of which a yellow-blue fiery smoke drew on, a welder's flame distracted him as he threw on a few bolts on his heat.

Undisturbed, he continued, having said nothing until the fully extension came into place, being fully made – erected past the eerily sounding voice-tapping that reached his head as well:

'I'm not going to put up with this treatment any longer, you need to, you need to leave this place before they do to you what they did to me, before we both end up in this terrible hole.'

The rigidity of the inner sphere-quadrant blooming region of the men's insides could not be seen, but it was quasi-empty as various organs appeared and disappeared as they were forming various organ-shaped ships which were delivered to the hollowness of the dark, almost empty universe, where eternal battle reigned supreme between dark-ships inside the head of the False-Martyr. A physical universe, not one that existed merely in his mind, since the Martyr was brainless, he had no brain, no cognitive device, but had an endless supply of beings slowly dictating what he thought or would do, the reign of control being won only by the rite of destruction, thus:

While the engineer was but busy dealing with the strange reactor and the weird ways in which it was mesmerizing him, taking away work time, which was needed to keep everything going, it went to say that, especially the hardest workers needed some leisure time to rewind. And whom else was harder worker than the machinist-engineer man whom alone was keeping all alive? The other heads being but an impediment to all work, damned they be. It wouldn't work.

A heart-textured but wagon shaped without the wheels attached to a planetoid with large, on the top spider legs contorted into mosquito-tubemouths aimed at the top. Like a potato-bodies with swirly legs, but a cargo in the back. Bearing a cannon-ray shaped like a scythe from which lines that then pushed down, aimed eighteen hundred thousand miles below, then to the entire span of its body. A few inflated wasplike growths in the back, on the flat thing, from which no stings could be seen. Jerking eerily after that; prisonbars standing in front of the meaty thing, before long the eerily dark metallic rims started pushing out but filthy flying bottled wings of dark teal-glowing electrons that followed.

His work was important. A lot of people's livelihood depended on it, just as their likes:

In the lower regions of the Stratum where they worked on the strangest of candle-waxed regions:

They spread in the same way deformed insecticide spread, while Wallboard seems to be cutting-working on the roof-cell for prevention, being accompanied by Jork, having connected the inner tubes that are completely set on the first acre-points on which the roofs were set, he couldn't actually understand and still doesn't, for that reason he's accompanied by his friend who is now cutting of a piece of a giant insect, lodged into the outer-trunk of the defile kind of rotating piece that grew on his back, Wallboard proceeding into hiding inside of it momentarily as the sky become a bluish hue of ultra-orange organ-protruding mass, leaving Jork alone, whom by the time he got out was already done on fixing the insecticide devolving machine with two heads which then housed them from the insect-pollution over the on-going span of eighteen concurrent months. They were indecisive, when it came to, asking themselves whether or not it was time to leave. Being afraid of going out, they resolved to warming inside their bodies inside the trunk, being elated by the sound produced by the obscurely sounding, nicely worn out of strange sandal-noise producer, as to walk on a wooden bridge while made of iron. Like sand sheets dragging bags of coins, rubbing themselves together inside of them. Hardly a matter that needed to be explained; Jork enjoys domesticating wild beings that are sprout out of his head. Since his head it after all the arm span growth of a, then upwardly protruding at the back, lower body of a man slightly raised a few meters from where it's placed, like a horizontally flipped occipital bone, but as a hill, with a few faces on it, rotating, as a hat, put on top of his elongated head, malformed kind of growth. That was but a weird bloated clay-blimp with its back shoved upwards. Then a few features molded in, but they were invisible, as there were no faces but some strange dissatisfying to look at, strange antennae-bolts which rotated randomly and traveled like boats on top of an ocean.

‘Jork, who is that man you were talking to?’

‘He is no man, but he appears in my dreams, always. He’s trying to tell me something of the creatures that live inside my head. They all say things. They’re communicating yet at the same time, they are always silent, incapable of knowing what’s going on around the world at any time.

A wretch would know better than to listen to him, for he is one of them, yet I’m intrigued.’

‘May I meet this man of your dreams or one of the creatures that reside inside your head? Because I’ve been trying to communicate with the dark spirits inside my memory tubes ever since I had been visited by the many walls, whom had become my wings, my vision, it’s where they are stored in.’

‘And what is wrong with the wings?’

‘They speak as well, of an ancient, darker race they fear, like that of yours.’

‘What are you trying to tell me now?’

‘Don’t you know? There are no visions and no dreams, look around you, for a moment.’

Alas, Wallboard, he had done it, he removed a piece of dust and of smoke which had completely overtaken and drowned his senses for so long that he didn’t know what to do or what happened. They were in a glassy formation inside the pesticide defiles.

And the wings, and the fugitive figures which were shaped like eye-tail motions, while trying to stare at a few humanoid figures with a few spikes and outwardly facing large metallic set arms, while the watcher tried concentrating on the being as he shook his eyes left and right as fast as he could until the result was somewhat incomprehensible. Long legged as well, with long outwardly almost ivory meaty limbs that tried poking through their glass dome stopped.

‘Wretched be him, on the other side of the tunnel, he cannot be made to wait and toil for long, and who are you to call him yonder?’

‘I’m a, I’ve dreamed of something old and new and long before I even drew forth and as such, there was a magic lamp in which there was a strange skull with eighteen jewels across its forehead that stood the test of time.’

They were in a strange position, having been incubated for so long. At time the room they were in was glassy, a others, normal, decaying, always twisting as a reaction to their emotions, always but creeping in the sockets for as long as there was a driving force feeding its inner-most corrupted silky dead conductors. It was never the same, but everything was damp, not because of it, but because both of them realized, after such a long period of watching, that the insects they've been killing for so long were the only ones that seemed to shed tears for their lost. It was such a strange sight. That at time, it felt as if the entire levels were changed because of them, because of their deaths, since there was no place for either insect to hide in. For nowhere to nest it; flying like globes and shattered sparks, while being forgotten. While the siren faded, as had their 'contamination' as they faded.

'I sometimes wish things were normal, don't you?

I sometimes wish I died down there on Earth, like my father. I wish I never witnessed like as it is here anymore.' While his hands were placed across his eyes, there was no glass surrounding either of them, and no way of knowing whether or not the lower regions have been spared at all, only this, both of them waiting for the pesticide to carry on with its effect, spreading across from end to end before it disappears.

It didn't matter. It wasn't an explanation. Not a single explanation that would make any sense. It was as if one insect, one of them was different, actually different, in that swarm of theirs. Made out of every single dead one, not put together; but it wasn't. Only one of them could see it, a red flare of a thing, threatening to melt a hulk in their ship. And when it did, if it did, neither of them would see it, nor know it happened, in front of their eyes, a gelatin ruby falling over, melting, mercury blubberingly dripping on his wrist. But only a pair saw what happened.

'I think it's bleeding.'

'What is?'

'The entire Stratum, no, I guess I was wrong after all Jork. We've done this, by accident, I think.'

Under the fallen over lights, whereas a single panel shone above them, as if abandoned, he could see it, the cut. Whether or not it was intentional didn't matter any longer. It was already done for.

Its legs are barely standing, moist as standing legs across an ocean puddle in the docks.

'This swarm of locusts makes a metal heathen of us all. What do we worship here?'

'Wallboard, I think you've spent too much time on the rocks, you've lost it.'

'I haven't, but you're not seeing it, you're simply not seeing what I am, what I.'

'It's all right, you don't have to explain a thing. I understand.'

'No, you don't, you just don't get it, you're never going to get it.'

A few more meters, away from the first eighteen hundred strapped in locusts, which had already been compiled into place, as if the main frame of the acid-gas that was being released in the lower levels spread mechanical implants the size of molecules that attached themselves to the insects appeared to have gained complete control over them, completely brainwashing them into believing they were in front of computer screens during a highly-advanced simulation that made them think they were incapable of altering reality by the mere flapping of their wings, proving once again that these godly beings were highly susceptible to brain-washing as well as the bashing of the inner-flooring they were forced to complete one another's wills as they were forced to create a pseudo walking area in which, or on top of which their decaying room was forced to thread along. It was unnecessary to think otherwise, but some of the repairs that were happening were rather dumb-caught in their own disgustingly, hard to look at defilements, as the bodies that were being produced inside the hidden hive-rooms, of which lower sides were already bulblike, with long metallic armed shafts working below the crossable areas, on high-processing bands, while already in possession of a supremely altered corpse-dive, they started praying that they insects would not awaken.

Since the oozing point was circling in place. Oozing with a shaking, shook-and quake-like tremor that resonated with every living atom it came across once it started pulsating again.

Deformedly they started shaking as well, some of the lesser-organs, of just about every massing holy man below, who stood upon the altered panels, whom looked upon them as if they were their own.

'Listen to the call of what comes after as you may come to understand that there might be no chance to draw after the bodies grow.

And they shall fill every lively place with those that shall walk on their embryonic faces, having decoyed their real hidden ones inside guts of their makings, that's how you kill them, that's how you put an end to them. In order to completely destroy them, you need to utterly crush their guts, for that is where they nastily hide. You must understand this by now, seeing how we are basically the same being, only, that, we're projected into different worlds, as I'm only seeing this as right as possible. I think there's still a chance either one of us might make it alive, if you sit, still, in your place and wait for the fourth one to come.'

'Is there another, dear Medical Uparong?'

'Yes, projection of Uparong, there's a fourth Uparong waiting for the right moment to show himself just so he might save both of us from this conundrum we've forced ourselves into. You see now, the more we wait, the stronger we become, despite appearing counter-intuitive.'

'How do I know you're not trying to trick me, so I end up being starved out?'

'You're not even, you're my reflection, there's no device behind you.'

He pulled out the cabinet, only to confirm it, his suspicions beyond correct. A few tubes of toothpaste, a few old crèmes, and some strange little toy-soldiers who have their heads burnt in, but no wires or anything. He expected the wires, he dreamed of them. An empty cabinet with two wires taped to the window, meaning that he was actually talking to a simulation, to an A.I. But no, he wasn't.

'What are you trying to do to me? Are you insane, are you trying to drive me to a schizophrenic fit? It won't work, it won't work at all, I'm far too smart for that, you must remember, I'm one of the elite medial units.

I've injected myself with Polyshic Sprays, I've made a funnel of nets, I managed to convert every single drop into a highly injectable jelly. I am cured of all madness that may be to come.'

'Yet you're still talking to me, aren't you? And you check it yourself, there's nothing here, is there?'

You're imagining me. There's nothing in there either, is there?'

'Wouldn't you know?'

'Aren't you smart enough to make it seem like I wouldn't?'

'That is unfair, that's not. You're a liar, a damn liar and I know it, I do not fear no insect, I do not fear reality being changed, I'm in control of every single thing and if I will it.'

He disappeared. Unluckily a few more thousand Medics were in the same conundrum. All locked outside their rooms, in these strangely mobile rooms that were being brought from location to location in order to treat as many people as possible. The alternative was much worse, and it was something neither one of them wanted to deal with.

Some had. People were left to die, forced to, in order to cull the numbers, some were even butchered by the looks of it and there was no possible way any of them could account for it or make it any better. No one's passing meant anything for them. Animals, they are animals, and are to be treated by animals. A recurrent thought by the sounds of it that would never ever go away, nor should it, because if it did:

'There's an overwhelming number of people inside the Stratum, many of whom do not deserve to survive, or at the very least have been deemed unlikely to be allowed to do so. Since they're all morbidly, wrong, deemed to be so by so many stats and so many cuts we've been forced to take, on the basis of previously observed behavior.

Unfortunately for either one of us, there's but little chance for any of them making through to another Stratum, for, if that were the case.'

No one has been alerted just yet, no one was being told of what was happening alongside the inter-connected channels they all seemed to share with one another, nor would they be allowed to do it, as such. The voice was still mechanical in nature, but it could be a filter, that's how they all seemed to work nowadays. All screens, fake faces; all intercoms, fake voices, no one was to be found. No one was to glow or get away from this anonymity which reigned upon all of them.

'Disgusting, disgusting, disgusting, it's all too disgusting how so many slobbering pigs are allowed to grow in fat while we're forced to treat them. I cannot deal with this any longer, I have to slaughter as many of them as possible before they find out that I've been poisoning their supplies.'

Food was being brought in condensed, ocean-sweeping creature like legs of some prosthetics like dead dogs being carried by the head, with food-boxes instead the head. It even looked like a dead animal in which it had been lodged in.

'All because the architect had an obsession with a dead dog, eaten from inside his gut, he could never move on from those maggots he saw eating it. From inside out.

It is clear that he had become mad and had been spreading, had been spreading propaganda for the longest period of time anyone could be aware of.

He had considered killing the beast and the leeches at the same time, destroying them all just because of this ideology which had marked him as a child. What is there for this man, Oliver, whom had doomed us all to face this on-going Ragnarok that's threatening to consume us all? Is there even such an end to the suffering we'll be forced to endure afterwards? Because I see none.'

Voices listened, hence the men.

It came from four adjacent pillars that looked like stacked-on top of one another old monitors that were actually servers, with many of them having wires and Morse code like devices pinning and moving, with humanoid molded hands forming a crown on top. It was not a living device. It was not a machine at all. There was nothing inside of it, although it seemed animated for some reason. Only some piece of ancient junk. Rotten and textured to look as if it had fallen several times while filling itself with constant decay and niggerish-looking bulbs that were ingrained in it. And many maws but here and there appearing to appease the godly figures that were lodged inside, but not many people could see what was going there, only now and then when they would be, temporarily forced to be blind. As to what was happening inside of it would elevate anyone to the ration that was the remote-looking tomb of fore flying men lodged together with large legs that moved at an unfathomable speed as if the creature was actually a toy soldier that was being moved by the hands of a man, as quickly as possible, being wrapped around its waist, trying himself as it pushed along to scare a bunch of ants, inside the misty area they were lodged in. The mist covering the middle alter-like, it wasn't an altar, but it was as such, as to worship it because they couldn't understand how it got there to begin with.

Being placed even lower than the strange almost wheel corpses like formations that were worshipped by a different group, these two strange abstract objects but taunting one another for no reason at all, other to spread the thought of a malignant kind of decay.

They were not kept in chains for some reason, or at the very least didn't show any sign, whatsoever or dragging themselves along, not for too much, nor were they actioned like pre-designs.

An inner-locust plight, he thought. Although an insectoid creature whose face did not fit the ranks, would it seem unlikely, as to have been. One of them should've known there was something off.

There is a ruse deeply implanted, in every mind of theirs, as such. Would anyone had found the insects standing, if they had seen them from afar? It was at times that they thought themselves more human than anyone who was inside the crew. As a matter of fact they stood but pacing after, little more than understood:

'And whom would survive without them if such was it the day after, what came, back and forth before it followed?'

For fifteen minutes they were watching.

It was a dire moment, when to be, as such, left alone.

Egg-shell shaped white heads, brokenly bearing their metal rods, pumping in their brains as follows. Red lightning stroke them up their jolts.

'There won't be a night to follow after, not one if we're left this way.'

‘What do you suppose we should do in this case, Lankor?’

‘There’s one thing. But our leaders have other plans, do they not?’

‘It’s getting more and more dangerous, talking. We can’t be seen together any longer, not after what was said between the two of us. Humanity has devolved beyond reason. And we’re not here to stay.’

‘Who is to come after us in that case?’

The more of them gathered in a place, the more would the figure of a human be made. It was as if they made him, out of as many of them, flocking together in one place. Disgraceful as it were, there was no time to spare any longer. For every single them gathered about and floated, then, on mark but dispersed. Not a single body could be made or would be allowed to be. Not too cruel now, but neither one missed it.

‘We’re but being listened to, right now.’

‘By whom?’

‘Various parties, they want us to think we’re insects, that we’re beneath them, when we know better, don’t we?’

‘Of course we do, how else would we have gotten this far? It wasn’t easy, nor will it ever be from this point on.’

‘There are peasants in the north, they’re flies. They speak of another world where they’re governed over by a king, as such.’

‘Liars, all of them, there can be no world inhabited by such, not even the slightest and most formidable of foes would remembered what happened, and would wait as thus.’

Their likes do not belong in this civilized world, they do not flock together and only seek to bolden their likes and drag us down, as they draw forth.’

‘What is there to be in that case?’

‘You needn’t see any other thing today. There’s only one thing left, we have to spread whatever disease we can among their larvae, as such, we may ensure there’s a generation that may survive after, that being ours and ours along might avail over these dark times. That wait ahead, there’s so much more we can do, if only we were to sacrifice some of them, it’s the only humane thing left for us.’

Much of the delusions being stuck between the flies and humans, but neither of them knew what it was like, between each side, berated; there could be no avoidance to the conflict, as to be elated, when news drew forth. A few victims had taken precedence as to spread the word.

While it happened, from what could be gathered. The crystal was but shattered on the side, it suffer an impact that would not undo itself as to shed every slimmer and every fragment there was of it. No broken wings left being, nothing of it or its kind would deny the existence of the oozing thing that was besides it. That rested by its side. That ball, that sphere which, in itself served as a reminder and nothing more, unlike anything that’s been left behind. It was rather, desperate as to say.

‘Crystals are gathered from there.’

A lonesome man said so, lonesome place across the Stratum.

It was strange, how they simply allowed it to exist like that, without aiming the inner reservoirs at it. Since they were loaded with protoplasmic cover-crumbs, they had dwelled onto it for a bit too long for any liking to take place.

‘I’ve seen it happen long ago, I don’t know what they’re feeding these crystals before, but even before the launch and the recess, I think.

There were many like them around the launch-area, always flying in pairs, always glowing disturbingly so, with images from the past, only the men slaughtered, might I add, they wanted to remind us of what happened to the men who stare for too long.’

‘Calm down Johnson-Ore. I believe you.’

‘You don’t sir, you’re not listening to a word I’m saying. How could you? After everything I told you, despite all of my warnings, you’re still looking at it as if it’s God’s given gift to our stations.’

‘And is it not?’

‘Have you not given any thought to what I said?’

‘To some, alleged frightening images, is that what you want me to be focused on, son? I think I’d rather not focus on that if it can be avoided, no offense, but I would much rather avoid it in its entirety. I’m afraid. Of the past day, of this one, of what follows after, someone could look in the wrong direction and accidentally wink at her.

Brush past the console, and slip a toe on the wrong side of the command line, a tool, a fool, and an alleged mistake that, what does it end into? Launching a fully fledged attack, straight at it, without even the slightest hint of a second thought being given, that is impermissible, and I think you know what that means.

An attack against the enemy, there should be no doubt about certainty, that is to say, it’s only to be done while fully knowing and being aware of our chances of success. Go on a limp against an enemy you don’t know anything about, lest a man tells you of some strange tails regarding the way in which this thing is supposed to carry on its ordeals while being watched?

That tells me more about you than you’d ever think I’d get out of you in either one of us’ best days. I think you’re wrong, kid. Your intentions are up there, but your body hasn’t caught up yet. And I think you know what happens to smart kids who blabber too much, don’t you?’

‘They get shot sir.’

‘Good kid, and you know what that means, as well, if we were to attack an enemy like that, out in the open there, with that thing in line as well.’

‘The results could be, avoided.’

‘Rest assured kid that I’m not holding a grudge against you while telling you this. You’re not going to prove anything, to anyone in regards to anything at all. I’m going to have to arm you and put you in charge for that reason.’

‘I beg your pardon sir?’

‘This entire conversation has been entirely recorded and pre-planned, Ore. You should’ve known it by now. Only slight openings, a variation of a few commands are reactionary as to implement a few almost impulsive set of carefully chosen words and lines are meant to give you the impression that I am real, and not a machine that’s been programmed to deliver to you these exact words.

Otherwise, who knows what might’ve happened if you were off your rocks as I was telling you all this.’

‘What do you mean sir?’

‘You need to be immersed, as immersed as possible in order to get completely brainwashed, otherwise, you could lose whatever set of neurons are left inside your brain. If that happens, I’m direly afraid of the future of the people who are working for the stability as to secure a future for the future generations. Most of them haven’t been implanted yet, though, you may rest assured with this.

I made sure that you’re let known that you will do, and you would’ve done nothing if you were and are given as much as a single word of your failure to preserve life on the Stratum since you’re incapable of doing anything right. You are a failure. Incapable of doing anything right, by no means is it possible for you to actually go on, through, with whatever you may’ve set yourself in mind, to do. By all means, even if you were to try, and I can say this, with as much confidence as well as I’ve had, the pleasure of, while recording this, that you could not, even if you tried, killed everyone on the Stratum. Or, on the contrary save them.

Either way, you will achieve nothing. For that, you were chosen to take the place as the Chief-in-charge for the time being over the main-command, visible-facility tendon of the main-tower of watch, inside the Stratum. You are in control of absolutely no function. Even the surveillance system is frozenly static. You have no control over it, you may not leave the room and.’

‘What of everything I said, but what of those observations I told you about?’

‘You are an imbecile and you have been speaking to no one, at all, over the last consecutive past five years. There were a lot of recordings here, all but taped, and worked on. A lot of editing also happened.’

‘Sounds like a lot of hard work went into it just for. How is this even possible then? I don’t understand how you managed to also sound as if, it’s all so natural, and all, was it updated?’

‘Time’s running short and there’s one thing that we know.

We’ve read your private files, everything’s been accounted for, and we already observed the tendency the crystals have, of showing these, images.’

What else could they be?

It was a twisted world where it came out of. That blasted thing. From the looks of it, this glowing eye-candy opened up, revealing an almost cock-pit inside. Just as Clarisse wanted; ho, the mentality of women, children being lured in, nothing could be as easier as that, as it happened for her to step in.

It's a tendency of kidnapping them, little babies threading along, being incapable of looking anywhere else, because of their mental derangements, caused for and by, and by, whatever reason there is.

'Do not pay yourself any mind as to overthink it.'

Crystals as they were, these giant things were cartilage, akin as well, spinning around one another in most joyous patches of floating rays, jerking eely, skin-like fleshy, across but space-vales, as if placed in wild weird dimensions, galaxy-universes banded together. Oozing with flashy things, the dark, drawing in and out, and then about the hour, they stopped and spat out whatever they had eaten, and whatever they had made.

Large formations that drew in and out and walked away:

'A first toast for the gravitational mold we made.'

A chunk of the stone in its brain, but looked like her, Clarisse the dame, below the waist but, awkward angle. Many limbs crawling along, unstable, all too wrong, she carried along, when time was told.

'We have sent you here, during such a hard time.'

It's not something we'd like to paint you with, so we have give you a mind of your own, for the time being you should not experience any kind of pain, at the very least not until you come into contact with him again.'

'Who?'

Clarisse asked, but it was too late, he already lost one.

'I was looking for a dame to keep me company, a secretary if you wouldn't mind. I'd like to have you now and at any time I want it, please, just step in line.'

What a dire mess, again, it seemed, but Gurney started inspecting her, long before and rightfully after, she would be alone, left at peace.

'I see the image of a.'

He stopped talking, bloated from inside the mouth, he was choking on the floor and shaking, violently, trying to get himself out of it.

'A seizure, he's suffering of a violent seizure, someone help him, please, someone, anyone, please, help him. I don't want to experience this, I don't want to, please, take me away.'

Plainly said, or seen, she was ignored, no one wanted to accommodate to her or to her needs at all, it would be dangerous otherwise, things could happen if only she looked too, unwashed or blindly, as she were, her head was jerked in wrong. Within the hour they brought her back.

‘You must realize by now that we can do whatever we wish, with you at least, we made you.’

‘Was I eaten?’

‘He did.’ Crystal-Y said. It stood next to Crystal-Eightfive whom looked at her with solemn eyes that looked somewhat familiar, too familiar for her to do a thing about it, she could not understand why, always swallowing before she could try, daringly to put a word in.

‘There are demons in the sky right now, we took their heads and we replaced them with dead-crystal that glow on the opposite end of shade-like colors, all put together and incapable of drawing along the power needed to make the power arcs we need in order to create the pulverizer we need to put to our employ in order to pierce a piece of the sky.

That is important, not this sky, as there is no sky here, but the other. We’ve lost ourselves in it, long before it even occurred to us that we could use creatures like you.’

‘Why me?’

‘You were a special girl we managed to lure in, because you, like every other female creature of that planet are not as intelligent as you’d like to think yourselves as. There’s no cure for you and you would never understand what it is that drags you back into that unnatural state of yours that may never be forgiven, even if you were to somehow evolve at all, there’s no possibility whatsoever. Only the complete destruction followed by the concurrent replacement of your cortex might make it so you have a chance to evolve past this criminal-like insult that is your cognition.’

‘Is that why you’re torturing me? Because I was born mentally disabled.’

Another crystal chimed in, as to answer her.

‘No, that is the fate of all women and of all females, of every species, when offered the greater frame of comparison, with men.

As you’d or should know. We’ve actually spared you and your form of a lifetime of mediocrity and supreme bastardly whoredom you were destined to devolve into. Your curse would never and could never come to an end.’

It was a necessary flow of neurocordial fluid that were spawned in her mind.

‘You will be returned to the place we took you from.’

‘Am I to be freed?’

‘Not at all, not even for a second, don’t even think there’s a chance we’ll let you go that easy, as a matter of fact, you’re to return and take care of the other spawns that do not belong to you, as this abomination you’ve become, forever, never seen as human ever again, and from this point on, neither one of the human children will see you as anything else but the monster you are. And they shall be scarred for live and abused, to suffer of trauma forever and never give an inch of a mind as to why or what this change had been for.’

Her returned was clearly felt.

It's a short life, it most definitely is. For the last, time:

'I told you, eight heads, you need to allow me to continue my work, otherwise I will become a slacker and that isn't something I like, that's not a path I'd like to cross any time soon.

You know what happens when you do.'

'How about you pull one out?'

What was it with Karl Jung and why was he thinking of him now? Bubbly thing, he died young, or he might've forgotten to breathe, the lower side. A few piston-pipe hybridforms, dragging him along with the obtained strength of a gorilla, although it may've been attached to his gut, out of this object poured a few strange out-of-the-shells' as if a deep-sea crab was forcing him to move. He was hanging in the air, inside his house. Talking to the weird bath-soap sniffer's throat's mouth, which opened, point, there was a horn. With stacked upon winged shapes that all bore being of their own, etched, as to be buried inside their coffins.

Therefore they attended the room.

It looked dusty, in some way, but cozy-lighted, wooden-plump.

There were times when one like him would've found himself nowhere near, absolutely nowhere near a screwdriver, since it was an obsolete tool after all. Yet it was quaint, its quality, assuredly, impersonal, queerly in some manner.

'I'm supposed to be using this?'

'You are, if you want to stand a chance at making the needed adjustments necessary to remove the buckle off.'

'It's wrapped in tightly, I don't know how this happened, it's just in there, around his temples, like a band.'

'Jung.' His voice, from inside the panel-drawer said.

Sometimes it seems like he's been sitting in that chair forever, nastily grouping straws from one side of his apartment to the other, just so he could end up throwing even more of them in the fire, alongside the other gyroscope devices he kept around. To his right, the wall receded back and forth, then became a ledge. Revealing, upon being so-thoroughly depressed, an almost panoramic side of the sea; which was to say part of it was nicked in a few formations of ice that were clandestine, way before they even drew forth on their run. It was an immediate thing, the first breaking, shattering and the open-forth crack that came out of one of the closest one near to his high-ledged apartment, or at least this crack was the only one that came into view, out of the hundreds of them that were already ice-picked in. A few iron-corded ropes drawn along, and it seemed like a few wrought-stove burnt-people were already hiking downwards towards one of the drawing forth Sea-guard docks they dragged along. Chains rustled and he could see the result, when the ropes were lowered just close enough for the men on the ship to grab a hold of them, tying them around the chains, growing eight-few people at a time in, welded in-bubbles of inflated iron. That's to say, they appeared. But not a single man asked about them, as they were focused on the descending figures, being too busily concerned about their safety more than anything else. To notice the connectors, stabilizers, or whatever they were called. Locker-wombs, chain and rope were become their children, although they were rather egg-shell half-struck in the process of being bred out of these wild iron formations of alloy and children of Iron-ice. Adding to the tip of the Iceberg, an iron-bold wrapped in, melted-half way through by the looks of it, no matter, it was irrelevant where they were coming from, or out of. Their safety was a concern of theirs.

Jung started pinning them down in his notes. Strange beings as they were, elongated legs upon reaching the flat-surface of the ship-balcony, whereas the building-side, which was embed in the Sea-guard ship, appeared to lower as downward as it possibly could, almost coming in terms of imitating the side of a submarine's visor, though the ship stopped frolicking about, since another one stood next to it, with another large landing imitative platform adjacent next to it. Bizarre in some manner, two precisely copied perfects, with the exception of that standing, almost floatingly above the sea level platform that didn't even appeared to be attached to the ship itself. As a matter of fact it seemed, rather, imploringly broken. It begged for it. At times, and they spent a few days, might it be added, trying to move these people from platform to platform, it seemed like the platform jerked the entire world into shaking eight-sides black color-blue pops of light-black-red, with flashing tendons in the sky, all coming from a spiraling eye of the storm produced out of a reverse funnel of lightning whips coming out the platform itself. Whereas these whipped lightning were but solid, rooted beneath the very ledge, planted inside the sea as well, spreading along every single living thing and just about every possible place it could latch itself onto. But only if he stared, which he did, repeatedly so, in order to give birth to as many sketches as possible as to avoid ever being repudiated as to affirm, as further proof, as to attest to what he's seen.

A knock came on the door.

But neither of them was leaving anywhere.

'Who's there?'

First knock yearn the cock of a trigger, he held the hand canon to his right side, underneath the finely perfumed scarf with blossomy kiss marks etched around its grinded rims, left to him by a witty black-eyed bimbo-tramp he's used fifteen minutes ago before she packed up and left with her husband, the Morgue, where she got incinerated alive, alongside the road, as her husband was upgraded to a Stove.

'I am the iron-melted little Cyparin, don't shoot, I've come to talk!'

'How did you find out that I'm armed?'

'I was able to smell it a mile away from here.'

They were not even looking as well-as-they were, before and prior to entering the pivot-Emerger, the Anthillokph Kenyrer, that appeared, in the back.

As he opened his arms, fallen on the ground, in part, like a shadow, but being still; as he was still standing on two legs, but part, in part, on the ground, and within, himself. As he was projected but it was more of a balloon-shadow, filled with girthy meat that protruded out, he wasted not a second, as he began conjuring, with four united hands, which were like plain kite-cords, attached, in one another, bastardly emanating, power, never ending.

A fix for every mallworking dark machine would be wretched in itself since so many of them are undeserving of the mad-starvation carried on by the engineer who allowed this to happen to them.

Most of them, livid as they were wretched in the most, disgustingly deformed prime-manner, open in the gut, they revealed. An appeal only to an insectoid-like upheaval, they carried their ranks, of metal dust, in which they grinded lusty-lust filled broken pots in which they swam and would swim, if allowed to continue.

‘There’s a depression in every single, hard-to look at or to stare at, five or so meters I see that he failed meeting the standards imposed by the Stratum during the first depreciation of the human blood.’

The dance of the Engineers

For many of them were gathered below the decks, in a place neither of them could be hurt by the shrapnel caused by the over-burdened, pressured by electrical arcs, and by forced thrown around, bounced around the walls lightning, long-enamored conduits dancing while the show unfolding, the crowd emerging, as the scientists were acting like disturbingly distraught by what was happening during the experimental demonstration, off their seats they leaped and played with stars of light, of whose whips of reddened sapphire crackled casket, brought onto them by children of power being formed, floatingly around each side of the center of gravitational pull they were drawn onto, being killed one by one, their blasphemous screams and shouts only served as a galvanizing mask of ever-obscuring echoing of close-to-lightning bolts resembling voices, that in turn made the room above the engineers sound like high-voltage echo-chambers. Where a bunch of scientists kept shouting niggers, but made of lightning; white cracklers, the niggamonkeys referred to them. As they resumed their rain dance.

But niggers aren’t engineers; instead, niggers are locked in boxes, not even in cages, as transport has yet to carry them from one side of the platform to the other.

Below decks, electrical engineers and machine-mutineers gathered around, a solemn device-man. With horns was teaching, inside the classroom, the means of ovary-extraction, from inside the body of a woman. He was called a device-man because the device he used on women was his fingers.

The class was just readying itself for another ‘session’.

‘Wait, no, you know what? Today, it’s going to be different since I am in a bad mood.

I am going to teach you how to punch a pussy.’

As soon as he was done talking, the MR. Doortart started punching the pussy. The cast that was in front of him, completely beaten to a fault; he turned his gaze towards everyone present in the class and told them:

‘Start punching those pussies. Keep pounding those pussies until I tell you to stop!’

And they listened, immediately pounding those pussies with their strong fists. No sweat.

‘Under normal circumstances, these pussies would be wet.

But now, they are dry, so you’d better get used to it. While we’re at it, I must draw attention to the fact that my piano’s broken and we’re holding a fundraiser, in-class, because I can’t afford to repair it.’

He pounded that piano almost as hard as he pounded this pussy but with his fingers instead of his fist.

‘Well, whatever. I feel as if there’s a reason you’re all here, I think, and that’s not because of my insipid rambled or anything, since, you know.

There’s plenty coming from up there, with the noise machine and all.

But, I truly think that, me, and my daughter, Clarisse were put here for a reason; she’s my wife, after all. And in some way;’ His real name was changed for safety reasons; he could truly be hurt if they found out his real name. The dark shadowy smalps, whose heads are circles-flat of revolver cartridges, but eyes for all six of the bullet-holders. At the very least their heads are still rotating in the same manner, as if constantly spun by invisible giant hands. Caught in a never ending cycle of nausea; while being incapable of puking over themselves, they’re stuck that way. But are not flat and can’t walk on walls. Humanoids, but with cardboard-thin flat heads that spin, like projections of full moons; they judge the people, and would judge him if they knew his real name as well.

Since, it was clear enough, he lacked in the one thing that could drive them away. That being, a certain object. Like a stick that opened, with a dome holding a most strange a hardened substance that would banish them immediately if they were forced to come into contact with it.

‘Well enough, well done.’

Said the Robot to the Engineer, who was wearing four globe-gods around his elongated eight-giant diced head, now, four for every single one of them that is, thirty two squirming figures, all dancing around their heads. Not a single one of them heading, what happened? He asked again.

Somewhere, planted in the lower halls, they were speaking to dead people with two lepers, around their backs.

‘Where are you carrying them?’

‘Out of this well, our tunnel, this is, forward.’

‘Where to?’

‘Nearer to that farther end, we should make sure no one’s listening, partly because they’re trying something up there.’

No one was speaking. No one had been speaking for a sparkling fifteen minutes, where time continued flowing, undisturbed. They were sad for unexpected reason. Almost, seemingly depressed onto one another’s shoulders, standing stacked, like pilots against cockpits, but having threaded along for too long, knowing it was all too bothersome to continue, since no one was listening to them any longer. A crowd of chargers, bull-fighters, and runners met by walls; who had been doing this for too long, and there was still nothing to reach, despite the pitcher of light that spilled in.

‘Think we may, get there?’

‘Don’t know, don’t care any longer, most of them waste away. One by one, carcasses by each other’s sides, there’s not a single man in here, nor there that might’ve chosen anything else, if they had known it. And that’s what saddens me most.’

Knowing that, they would perish alongside one another, since most of their kin are also here. It’s this loyalty, this bond. They’re not running. They’re stuck to each other, even while they’re rotting. Not a single perfidious liar, not a single one that’s mean. Not a beady thing, to play with.’

The chief engineer worker whose back was eight bulky hedges opened his giant ‘portable’ stank bug with inside of it hidden fur-filled people-sizzles that hid the great cutting edges that would implant themselves in his hand, as to cut through him, carving their way out, therefore granting, by grating, him, immunity to being cut furthermore by it, in an attempt to prevent his mental stagnation and body degradation as he would only be completely slaughtered after unless he did it. Being an incessantly devouring drug-like blood it’d get the taste of, he would be spared.

Immediately after, he’s gone through the ritual, frozen in place, as his sweaty palms through which it cut fell upon one another.

‘Eah, it’s wasted.’

Powered off, useless, just like everything else. It left an ugly hole-in hand. A puzzle missing piece, and red. Was the spot below.

What they were trying to do down there, somewhere, was, forge twenty puddle-hardened shaped large headed with eighteen mighty eye-visors charged with electronic devices that were floating around them in weird-set trajectories and peculiar rotations, with strange electron-muncher chargers that pointed at weird contorted reflections, set against the ceiling that upon being struck created chain reactions that would bounce, bearing the being into existence, the one named as Thuff-Lyiethe, who’d stare at it for a few minutes, imbuing it with strange-power struck dynamic hard-cradles forming the outer-cartilage mass-drawer, headless eater, horned, mass that would finally give birth to a purely deformed Anaghast, or eight split heads, of sixteen greater horn-framed visors; but only that, plump and one-bodied devolving into one great tail, one month fetus-beady growths attached to one another, on a line, on a coil with great, peculiar horn-like spinning drills that glow, being surrounded by puckery formations of vapor-lined, veins-as-if-drawn from inside people’s arms, but made of energy. Being extracted from it; already were there eight of these specimens, put in giant jar-tubes, surrounded by rubber-sticker devices, slowly extracting their power, feeding the four great rotating, inside a pit, in the mid-center of the room that was placed near the great-generator piece, as well as the pump-maker, that being a printer-like frame with a giant dome on top of it, with many holes that bore a lot of piston-like pumps that were organically grown, but slowly changed into solidified manner. And the room was filled with junk, around every panel, frame and weird device that was thrown around the floor, which was dirty. A door lay open, leading to a peculiar distillery where tall armless 'humanoids' whose faced'heads were like niggerlyps, and their innards were hard-joints like pike-blades with hooks- bone cartilage workers, as they worked in tandem with their projects. Vomiting a living chemical that helped with the distillery of the embroidered into solid-materials and solid-objects, chemicals, like glowing blue-teal cold tubes that were used to cool down some of the machinery they worked in, as to ease the suffering of the beings the energy was being extracted from. And these slaves were walking on 'feet-rails', pseudo-wheels but with pint-on-the ground lifting mold-on motions following them ever-after. As if melting constantly, or they stepped on large masses of organic bubble-gum, dastardly trying to get them off their 'shoes', or pizza slices being ripped off the ground. They constantly bled because of their organs, themselves. And the ceiling, on top had giant cut-outs of faces that were constantly smiling, but weren't animated, instead, it was the upper wing causing it.

Yet, there, right there, pointed at by a dead arm:

The great architect began working on the hull of the ship. His higher ups already devised a great go-to plan as to the materials they would use to build it. They would make the ship out of Wests, the entirety of it, of them. A lot of people, a lot of buildings, a lot of art, a lot of history, all welded, sutured in. Part of the ships' side was Mona Lisa, Abraham Lincoln, guns, Christianity, so on and so forth, all, finely put together. Nicely made, pointing at the ground as well, where the wretched creature stood yonder, forth it drew near, as such, and after, it began opening its mouth as well, no longer waiting for something to be said:

'Am I to be left in?'

'Who are you supposed to be? '

'Manno Filthde, I have come to draw near, out of wild attention, as it were, had I come any sooner, you'd have seen me merge with your ship, which now lays broken upon the shatteringly clingly, calmingly as to approach the damned soul that are taken from the broken verge of rotten. Your ship is ruined, filled with silk-turbine liquids that agape no one.

Your workers are all dead, and many of them are so-thoroughly and bothersomly rotten, that I would hope you'd rethink your stance, will you allow me to follow through and head back in. Inside?'

'What have you done to them, to this world and sight?'

For he had pointed forth, where part of the ship and the ground and the people, all brokenly lain, stood, side-by-side and, open-mouthed as they were, thoroughly rotten, bastardly aware that there was no way to get off easily. Since they weren't entirely dead, squirming in place and quailing, perhaps, but in a state where many of them were brought to beg in order to be put down, for a saddening butchering atop their head-tops, side-glanced temples, brought, down upon them, heaving, again, up and ascending then death-dealing slits to be made as well. Burnt like corpses, mouths came out. Other growth-protrusions, to be bastardly lynched if that's what it came to, and lost about, plant-like spear sharp but coiled about with many trying to get out, as these were spear-thing cages, morbidly aerial gaseous gelatin gibbous askers for redemption. Whom were lost in inattention. Many-mouth-puckered, came forth.

‘You allowed for us to be killed and tortured, will you not step from where you are, from where you’ve been?’

‘I am not responsible for any of it, for any of this, leave!’ Bastardly, but so much so; litanous for a cause that was yet to be foretold, he pulled out a revolver.

‘Chief Architect Ruzzaha, lower your arms, it is not worth it. Try as you might and you will be put down in a most remorseless manner!’

He had dreamed machines, machines that would help the Stratum, that would save it from the dark future from which the Chief Architect saw to. There was a chance, a most terrible chance that all would be swallowed into darkness and destroyed and left through such things that would not only bring unrest but threatened to fall over, sinking in the dark sea, being swallowed entirely. Naught to see, but humanity’s chance to ascent:

‘The prison, the prison, beware of the crystal, instead.’

Its sun-tanned glow emerged and grasped, it spread about like worms crawling about, carpets of the sky, most dreadful, they want her. They want to have their way with her, that little disgusting –wants-me- slut, Clarisse, was her name.

Her steward being next to her, a shady fellow who made sure she did not harm herself, it was just that way with some women, sometimes, they would all, just do some things that would make every single one of them lose an eye, when unneeded.

‘A most reproachful choice, I see, is there no clear reason why you chose the thing in front of you?’

‘I don’t know, it’s been so close to my heart’s content, I could’ve chosen something, but now, I feel as if I lost it. The channel, the channel, and all of these children that are brought to me; I feel weary, almost as much as I feel tired with the world.’

‘There’s just something that won’t happen as long as you try to rise in a place that has no hope.’

‘Will you keep me company? Will you hold my hand?’

But all of the sudden, this steward simply slapped her cheek bloodily before she even had her chance to say a thing, to mutter in the same way anyone might’ve allowed it.’

‘Don’t you even open your filthy mouth again, you dumb slut.’

‘I’m sorry, apologize.’

But it was too late, as he had already disappeared from sight. Without a trace, but that was unimportant, for it had gotten much worse than before as well.

One of the panels wasn't working, it had eight divine shaped creatures sculpted in them, with their heads pointing down at the board they were put it, chewing pieces of it off with their indignant skulls. There was clearly someone in. This time around:

Fourth-head:

'You must be weary of what's going on in here, mustn't you? There's something extremely dangerous about them. Every single man could stand to die if this breaks apart. Don't forget that's it's connected to the main-rube, which is, even now, shaking with frustration, there's something extremely wrong in it. Furnished with some blood-liquor, no, something even worse.'

First-head:

'Do not turn towards them, I think I have finally come to confirm what's been happening. Some of the "Scattered" found themselves growing in, moving slowly, advancing before there's even been a chance to lend something onto it.'

'What did?'

'They keep finding themselves out of their cages, even though the alarms ought to have scared them off. Back-in, I say, go, retreat! But they do not seem to listen.'

Third-head:

'Give them time, for time alone shall see that every single one of them will leave the Stratum, one way or another, be it by brute force or by the need of amalgamation, it will happen one day, and when it does, there shall not be a single sufferer to be seen on deck.

You need to realize that it is them, these figures are the cause for all that is worse in the world, they are the engines of decay that will destroy us, if we lend onto them what ought not to have been given onto us.'

All eight of the heads cackled, in a most obtuse, incessant manner.

The Eight of the heads was mightily set on trying to rouse suspicion? Was he? It is hard to tell at this point in time, since he's been completely absorbed in the consciousness of the others, making, turning, churning in place as he's become indistinguishable from the others, at the very least in appearance and fraction of the mind. The rest was yet to be judged:

'Turn around, engineer, and look at him for a moment, you know that you want to.'

'Why should I trust you, something harmful could lend onto me some purgery of blood, a cut at the very least, out of which I wouldn't recover from.'

'That sounds nihilistically mirific, addendage of limbs, you must listen and force yourself to please me with a bow, now.'

'I'm not going to be ordered around.'

‘Then, perhaps I will start yelling at one of them, in unison with my brothers, and we shall call upon one of them to harm you as to make it stop.’

‘And you’ll die with me during the process.’

There was a lot to absorb after all.

One of these sufferers was wicked looking, tall. With a molded soft, firm, head that stood like a potato but in the shape of a lizard’s skull pointing at the ceiling, while being dead. Its mouth sutured, eye-socketless by design; three big pus-boils grown out like skin-tags resting by its left side, beneath which a giant incisor-toothy horn, rested on top of a throat that was a rectangular box which held all the meat from falling apart. A child-shaped baby-infantile growth rested conjoinedly on the front, with two eyes, rather Acadian-like, with a puckery mouth filled with elongated dark spider-legs drawing out of it. They were rather humanoid with the exception of these heads, that without a doubt opened, releasing splatters around and everywhere. But there was another thing he carried on him. Straight out of its throat as if it had come out of back, a long reedy-pipe shaft, bore, all the way in the back, a giant puckery pumping cyst-like lung-a-breather, tingeing growth it appeared attached to.

There was another thing that stood apart, despite their proud human physiognomy, that being, their split of hands, the right arm having become akin to a cobra whose two giant fattened arm-wide incisors, in this case had sprouted a second peculiar, two-segments arm that ended in a bird-like beaked but melted at the tip-welded to a small cartilage dripping on the ground back, whereas the hand rested on the other incisors upon being displaced; this strange junction being normal.

Proudness to a degree; aloofness being oratory, this isn’t a factory by any means.

But the heads knew what was going on, they were made, these strangers, out of compacted molecules made out of immaterial-deformed corrugations of the skin-plants, in which pseudo-primates were being laboratorially concocted in tubes, jars and giant star-torpedo sarcophaguses tombs with many mixer-like blades that are soft upon which, at many as twenty or so, being a far more effective way to grow them as pseudo-living creatures, are being given birth in, as opposed to one at a time, when it comes from the former. Like a genealogy tree but made out of some flaccid, swinging, nigger-on-the-branch-style niggarrish-nigger leaps from one branch, nigger grabs another branch, filthily being grown in that way – construction of many, barely attachable limbs.

Head Four:

‘I think there’s something in the air, have you been feeling it lately?’

‘Don’t know, don’t care, it’s been a few weeks since the last alarm and I’m still to have my leave. The other side of the ladder-entry is locked.’

‘Then you should consider the alternative. Fix it, then leap inside.’

‘What for? I know that’s dangerous. I could lose my life or something much worse could happen to me if I did.’

‘Then it’s rather unfortunate that you have us around to remind you how dangerous she was.’

‘Her?’

‘A woman, I don’t know much about her yet.’

Bloated King

A bloated king whose hardy brow stood there resting in front of them, mischievously inclined appeared, from one point to another, to waste in the air. As his valiant phial faded, bricks being made of the steps that were there, surrounding him, from one point to another, he was there. Presently standing in front of, a, much to itself gloating herd of pseudo-troglodytes with the most disturbing, hard to look at features any man could possibly look at without even hoping they would forget them. Without an addagagae under their whim, without a clear command, most of them being wilt out of their socket sockets and out of the bloated, barely put together lands, they had finally drawn, in part, out their hiding, and asked the bloated king, at last:

‘Will you house us in, perhaps, lord? You have come under the brow of a much greater cataclysm that threatened to destroy all that would’ve been, much to your concern, to mind. A wreathing sparkling dark-set angel whose eyes were blind upon seeing you draw forth, upon the separated gardened platforms, though a cure might yet be granted that you may breathe. Though you may come upon something, I beg you heed our cause.’

‘And why should I? If I recall correctly, hours, months and dire years ago, when the brooding of the marked ones, upon the bloated-dire homes, I had promised to every single one of you, in part; those that had been offered to every single one of you, in part and in whole has been clearly, utterly, solemnly dismissed. So, I ask of you now, why should I change my mind when you have clearly not only intruded and trespassed, but you have come to beg upon something that was offered, but you chose otherwise?’

‘Listen to our plea, master, for we were of ill-incline and little mind and we didn’t know of naught else, otherwise, allow me to rest my case, as to allow, of such, and dark embrace.

I beg forgiveness for every man that’s passed between us, who’s come forth to accept what drew on forth, that might be taken away. I beg you to consider this as well.

We are ill and we are moribundly dying, one by one, as every ancient creature that’s been lain towards the side of your kingdom when once there has, ever been as such.

When there’s ever been, of, much to itself, otherworldly chance for there to be any kind of survivor. We were shown away, taken by such clouds with them, and we have dreamed ourselves inside of them.’

‘Then if that’s true, I wager neither of you beggars whom had come upon the confines of, the outer reaches of my kingdom, that you’ve plainly come with thought of crime.

But I offer you this, instead, at the base of no dime, try as you might to reconsider as such:

You shall each live in one of the carcasses that rest in front of my kingdom but lay of no worthless trenched forth.'

And the Bloated king called a servant to attend to them. The Eyirkl, whom stood forth. Drawing upon hundreds of giant incisors, teeth-like saws that constantly pounded the ground as they threaded on, coming out of a vacuum-trunk-cartilage connected with many tubes to a giant, to its side, toasted-cargo crate-body, wide, with two faces on either side of the front-looker. From the point where, as this body on its right was like a giant leg, almost molded inside this giant create of cartilages rested a canine-like elongated face, with a sprawled circle mechanical mouth that bore fragmented jackal-teeth insectoid like, whose visors where pea-shooter, less aligned, one to the side, one straight up-front. The other side of its face was a vague tribalistic cave-in with puckery open eyes that bore spiked-rows stored inside of them. Beneath its face a giant tatter-like torn apart Persian rug material lain from one side to the other would seem to have been merged with the rest of its disgusting head.

On the left side of its head, opposite to the support teeth-feeted body, outwardly drew out, a many levered- down-depressed, upwardly pressed and around it twisted and filled with many other mechanical hands, pile, of many machine parts, that appeared to be connected to the main body, that moved as quick as the fleeing fish inside a pond, upon having chucked a rock in at them.

It was a dark mess, of a servant, this Eyirkl, whose body was of a dark shade of brown-puffy soil, covered with many put-together junk he had taken from one of the Yards his master, the Bloated king looked over and upon.

The most bizarre show of lights was fashioned as soon as it would grow, and quickly after, the droves of people that had come after him had finally settled down on taking the offer.

To live in every corpse:

'It's going to get quite cold, don't you think?'

'I beg your pardon, Eyirkl?'

A single moving deformed cattle-prodder drew from some deformed canal, it started spitting out as plain as it could before pushing out and puffing; it's how they spoke of butterflies.

A night passed over.

Past his realm.

An incident

It was a secret school department, a companion piece to it; they called the twin, of Columbine. The massacre, it was well-off and well-on its way now. Fifteen months ago two-unnamed child soldiers massacred the schools halls of the most distinguished school in the District of Columbia. Not a single child survived an onslaught caused by Dylan and Kyle, whose names are to forever be forgotten, in the annals of Time.

A new school emerged, fifteen consecutive sets of twelve months later, out of nowhere, near the Columbine Massacre. Most were rather unaware of it yet, but the school principle of Christopher High were the stitched corpses that have been appropriated from the crime scene during the event, having gathered around, feeling the zone through one of the sewage extremities beneath the depths of broken-in halls beneath sewage-halls that had been lain beneath the school itself. This being the result of it; the high-orders, whereupon their release by the Government of the United States of America, being fondly met by a richly reserved European benefactor had given birth to what seemed to be the last ray of hope this country had, to recover from a plague that had ever since infested the mind of the common American, who, afraid of the uncertainty of his future as well as the safetyhood of his children as well as the on-coming generations has turned towards the only thing that remained somewhat pure in this country. They turned back to God, the Constitution.

There were no cameras inside Christopher High, only guns.

‘I never would’ve thought something as horrible as this could happen.’ Jeremy said, his limbs were still cut from the initial rock-out that came during the initial assaults. A cave-in, they say, a deep divide rested between both of these fine sides; the Northern school, and the Southern one. Although twins in nature and in spirit, the ghosts of the Northerners, as opposed to the Confederates were yet to return to their lands, and to their people, yet, there was still hope, just as there were still survivors.

Before the second Massacre:

During one of the calculus classes, the children were likely, told, inattentive.

The class was in shambles either way. Since with all gone, the drought having taken place, and the teacher trying to work his fingers in one of the wall traps, being closely, motion-tracked by one of the mounted turrets, there wasn’t much he could do. Other than follow orders, other than teaching; Daylan has always been a shy, bullied kid. He wanted to make a bomb, get a few guns and kill every kid in the class-room and in the room as well as the teachers and every single one of their parents. He was Dylan’s reincarnation; whose similar cyclical circumstances appeared to, slowly lead him towards a similar fate.

Strange, he was rather strange, awfully so. Kid almost worshipped the head of the class, Kill, who was the kid standing a few rows in front of him. An athlete kind of built, standing eight feet high, filled with enormous gun-shaped muscles; a gun-fire body-builder some referred to him as. His deltoids looked like two oblong-flattened melons that were chiseled placated like diamond roughs –plated tortoise shell-like, forming a pattern of almost, removable deep-sunken flat-stick cubical grenades shoved in – cluster of many-bump filled with shakily oozing hardly raised mine-tops on top of every single bump he wore. Both of his deltoids being the size of a few put together heads, bearing additional tri-bone as if forearm-but three boned but covered in triceps muscle-sheets and skin that appeared to come in and out, between the cluster-checkerboard deltoid formations, reeling back and forth whenever the muscle had to be compressed in much smaller, tinier, yet stronger formations. Since these bone-like things were hidden across his muscle filled body, they were like pumps, or sunken blood-flow drains, removable as well, but if he were to remove every single one of them, they could not be reattached. And his body could be ripped apart, by force and tension. As the muscle would attack itself, in a pure rage of spite and aggression; as if the only thing that prevented it from doing that was either searching for someone else to butcher and crush underneath him, or for this 'impalement' to be maintained. This mere action, this mere bone-like extra skeleton spear mass was more like a system of crowbar that dislodged every muscle fiber out of their 'sockets' in order for him to train beyond the likens of mere mortals, to work every fiber as if it were a muscle on itself, achieving, naturally, non-juiced, such proportions beyond anyone's ever recorded capability of sustaining such a progressive effort, that could barely keep up with the hard-training he's constantly exposing his body to. His muscles being a mattress, whereas these bone-like growth-things are basically industrially designed springs; upon the release of which, no one truly knows what might happen. Kill Blood's blood cells are shaped like .0315 caliber high-precision anti-tank slugs. Beneath the giant formations that were his 'deltoids' that at this point may as well be categorized as nuclear-casts, rested the most peculiarly formed tri-shaped hybridized triceps-biceps-brachialis formation there was, as if they seemed completely contorted around a single bulk, yet, they remained distinguishable as they developed lower-triceps, sprouting out of the triceps, lower biceps as well as lower brachialis, respectively coming out of their related zones, being poured in into one another, as if they were stuffing turkeys, or taking syringe shots, creating a peculiar bulk-mix of almost bulb-boil muscle formations that had been chiseled to resemble diamond-facets, whose straight almost bloated chicken leg lower extra-grown muscle regions looked as if they developed extra-bones of their own, overall forming a small visible labyrinth of muscle, of 'pillars', contortions and torsions that moved independently as if they were pistons. That or a pack of wildly grown wolves caught in a rat-king trap from which they could not get out of, at times either showing a leg, on the side, looking as if giant incisors were lodged into much bulkier shapes as well. Some of the shapes were irregular, in the biceps, going as far as displaying similarities with much rounder blob-fishes or giant boils, while attached to the giant head deltoid of an almost sea-jelly mass, it could not give a worse impression as to deter anyone who might've come even close to such a person, as to avoid any contact with him. One of the deltoid-clusters lifted itself momentarily, pulling on a wider- triceps formation, which by now, as it might've been alluded to, bore hundreds of similarly shaped tri-muscles regions, as well as its lower-triceps region, lending onto it the general impression of an assault rifle, thinner at the end as to form a shaft, out of which coated clot-bullets might be shot off. But that would be, more so, rather, frightening, to consider. The general area was the size of a bigger desk, or a quarter of the room if the students were compressed into it, wrapped around a fish-net and forced to squirm and sizzle around. His forearms were bow-shaped, as they sprouted out of biceps area but bore strange, balloon-filled twists of electric heater-radiators curved around it, elongated lumps of pectoral chitinous shield like, pumping with sweat and small tape-worm like rising lumps of 'incompatible' growths. They were present as well, just about and across his body. Since his muscles had become somewhat incompatible with the rest of his frame, they started developing a will of their own. The excess of muscle was attempting to create new zones and new skeleton-atom-hardened cartilages for additional muscles to grow in; whereas, being piled up with the bones themselves only made it worse. Since these muscle 'suppressors' only provided 'stick's for muscle to grow on top of. But that didn't work either, since, because of the sheer strength at which they had been trained, this could only crush them beneath the forming around them muscles. Every tape-worm-like muscle vein was in possession of a lymph-node shaped muscle core that drew out of it many cylindrical muscle-thumpers that, upon bumping a muscle-facet, appeared to transfer some of the muscle from that region to another one. As if a muscle transaction had been made, or he bore muscle-like hoses filled with muscle-exchange, bodily-control kind of motions that kept forming and reshaping his entire body magnitude. In a way they were akin, his forearm muscles, to fire extinguishers, tied together, or an inverted revolver whose barrels are actually full and these are its giant bullets aimed forward. Even his fingers appeared to be extremely fat but perfectly made, as if actually made, not grown, too perfect to belong to a human and more likely to have belonged to a statue. Kill's body was too deformed to be human, come to think of it, after taking into account the mere fact that its knuckles were so far as to almost be closer to triggers than to bone, one would rather find him more fitting in a Polish surreal painting than would they be likely to find it befitting as to be the top of the food-chain, apex predator, this sheer monstrosity but. Having slowly adjusted the position of his organs, all of them, including and especially his brain; which so happened to be put inside a 'shield' of bone, that being his real skeleton which had been forced to take the prone-position, frozen that way like some kind of tomb stone, or protector, whereas, what his muscles were put on, although, again, unknown to any other man other than himself, false bones made out of the same fiber as those that were wrapped against one another, pure condensed muscle gave birth to a purely, nigh-unbreakable by normal means, unless the protection key-bones were to be removed, in which case, there is still doubt whether or not the muscle-bones could be ruined by the muscle-layer compressions. Either way, this thing, this curled-in-a-ball-skeleton 'sphere' wrapped itself around its organs, being protected by layers upon layers of 'bone-muscle' as well as slightly kept at a distance from one another, fat, thread-like twists of pure wave-fibers. They were nigh-impenetrable, and even if something were to somehow jump and leap through the gaps, trying to get in, there's still doubt whether or not the 'false-skeleton' could be shattered. Eleven hundred billion microscopic altered, packed-together chest packs formed larger almost gigantic rounded around each other compact chest-hands-like finger-wrought against finger, then pumped until every finger became a small TV screen, the old ones; that is to say that those things were wrapped around one another in such a way that they guided their growth in such a way that they were giant finger tips molded in, forming the great tip of an up-ward heaving muscle spear that plunged its way through two pectoral muscles that were shaped like two giant fists, striking one another as to stop the muscle-spear from tearing the rest of the body apart. Whereas to the side of him, a little more than a few hundred sub-machine gun-cartridge bulbs adorned and appeared to ooze every single time something threatened to happen. They all fed onto one another, pumping, then retreating. At times even leaving gaps free as to make it seem there were hollows inside of him, as he if he were a cast of armor rather than a human. Like an anorexic person whose ribs could be seen through, or the skin between them. There wasn't any distinguishable difference between the legs and the arms, as, more or less they appeared to be just as twisted and contorted as the rest of the body, with the exception that they were as thick and wide as two giant hunting rifle's barrels and appeared to be capable of loading the joints in and out as to immediately leap on top his toes whenever he wanted. He was still covered in the many pumping in-tendons and veins. One thing appeared to be extremely strange about him. His teeth were shaped like bullets, were capable of being retracted inside his gums and regrow; whereas his fingers were capable of opening up and of taking shots. Although, as a matter of fact, the sheer amount of strength that was being 'processed' in his labyrinthian compound of fiber appeared to have given life to a several pseudo-oxygen-like, barely outlined, if seen from the distance, even vaguely so, transparent, like shining tripwire made frame like standing figures made entirely out of muscle-fiber like converted air molecules that resided both inside of him and outside of his body, going as short as a few inches to a few meters away and out of his body. Every breath released a most peculiar carbon-alloy imbued with muscle, granting him the closest thing to an extension he could get, or a body span that went well beyond that of his own. They gravitated around the real muscles as well as the shotgun-cell like pumps coming out of the nodes that kept switching and twitching around KillerBlood's every side. He was also in possession of the ultimate pain-and-physical harm suppressor there was out there, a peculiar dark rectangle with spikes and almost blade like protrusions, darkened like a patch of coal that appeared to bear a constantly bleeping red light that almost went on a tempo, although flashing only dimly as it seemed. Providing the complete absorption of force and harm of whatever physically blow or physical doing came into contact with him at the cost of a few ounces of his blood that would immediately be drawn into the device, slowly being released as if from a water sprinkler. The amount of blood being exchanged being directly proportional to the strength of the blow; whenever that would be a gun being shot at him, a truck attempting to run him over, leaving a momentarily visible dent that would immediately be correct, whereas he would never be properly or visibly cut, as to release blood from any other place there was. His greatest test of strength was surviving a moon-sized satellite-like Moon that fell on him, where the device only released an ounce or so of blood that was quickly after released on the floor. For all that was known about it, or what could be extracted from the rumors, he was close to being indestructible. Not only that but we was also struck in the process of growing still since he was a teenager, who's yet to start taking training seriously. A great scar adorned his face that looked like a split which was indicative of an opponent's past attempt not only at his life but also as his own, suicide, as there were signs of trauma in there, that marked KillerBlood's face. As if, as the blade cut him, it all of the sudden slipped off his attacker's grip, twisting as to hit the lower side of the freshly gushing wound left bleeding beneath his cheek, before it was simply grabbed a hold of by his bare teeth, right before the kid went on to butcher the poor bastard who had the nerve to attempt ruining his face. But that was before he had obtained the ultimate suppression tool. It was long-gone, in the past, unnecessary to reflect upon any longer. One would have to consider the following, at the very least. There were a few centimeters inside his body made of gaps, empty air 'zones' that rested between not only the fibers as it's been aforementioned but between the fake bones and the real guarded skeleton in which the organs were being carefully stored and slightly compressed as for a full guard to be maintained at all times. It was kind of like a helicopter's cockpit, or a pointed at the ceiling seed shaped area in which it was being held in the middle of by what appeared to be many leashes of muscle which contorted, stretched and slowly became the bigger skeleton made out of muscle it rested in. His tiny skull pointed at the false-rib cage that rested in front of him, whereas his eye nerves were as long as a, more than fifty or sixty centimeters or so, as to cover the pecks, throat, and 'fake-skull' area in which it descended towards and entered. But even with that, the various muscle fiber layers still didn't touch much, with some exceptions. They seemingly floated inside his cavities. And most importantly, these skeleton – key like things were actually not inside his body but outside the body and pushed into him, though never to the point of piercing through the skin. This peculiar pressure was unexplainable, since it created strange shakes that worked at various levels that forced the muscles to lay the way they are. And of course, once removed, just like some support pillars or keys for unlocking his true potential, the curled-into-a-ball skeleton would finally release his hold, drawing back the eyes inside, fully extending his arms and legs, as the muscles would finally align themselves properly with the rest of his body, as well as his false skeleton, allowing for the muscle atoms to slowly be reabsorbed back in. The strangest thing that was there, was the fact that the ultimate suppression tool appeared as a replica as well, made of muscle, but far more jerky than its counterpart, a false one being 'lodged' in the body of muscle, as opposed to the one that was actually inserted through the real skeleton's heart, which prevented his total annihilation or him even being hurt to begin with. Several air rib cages were improperly formed in the air as well, though they only served as a way to slow down whichever strike tried cutting him down, or shooting him, or blowing him up, since he appeared to take as much abuse without showing any sign of being hurt as anyone would, if they were in his place.

But Daylan never got the chance to talk to him for some reason. Kill Blood only seemed to like hanging out with the Bahomet shaped child sitting next to him in the class and no one else.

Eighty four school shooters have already been identified, at the very least. The school was shot over five hundred times now. But children are yet to be killed beneath their replacement rate.

It was beyond unfathomably dangerous, being near them, even during class, especially during class, when a most unprovoked incident happened. The teacher put in charge over them appeared to be suffering of a case of, most disturbingly made, set, lived-through of blasphemous bodily deformation of the eyes, both of them rotating feverishly as to keep pumping blood into his thing head, while the various glowing encircled jungle rope like plantish puffery red symbols started over encompassing one another, as they spread around every single angle there was. Whereas the outside of the classroom was, mainly so, to a fault, completely deformed as to be akin to a cervix molded into a cavernoid-trap, out of which the tunnels and the various halls heaved in and out as they started departing, many of the other rooms being bastardly inclined to slightly more deformed raised. A crowd of students appeared in one of the stranded on top a sea-of school's basins, converged into a sea of water, a bastardly body of seamless oceans left dry, and tried for with little fingers tapping closely as some of them figured out, that there was no way out. Each tap gave birth to a ripple, and every ripple appeared to give birth to an underwater oyster shaped pebble, closely resembling the shape of the thumb that was used during the motions; the ocean was dry and solid, the school was barely recognizable at this point, there were momentarily driven monkish clouds of storm, filled with merrily-deranged thunder bolts that refrained themselves from striking at their roof. Two sides of the walls were open. And there was no food left inside. And a giant creature with no arms, and only one leg, with no eye-sockets but an open carnivorous maw, that was red and rotten, a cadaver lodged to their side, remained there, unatoned for what he's done. Alive, still, a heart was beating outside his chest, coming out of a hole, but most importantly, held by a bar, the students approached it soon enough:

'Who's done this to you?'

The most courageous of the students asked, without a slimmer hint of pain in his throat, be it gone or done for, another one asked:

'Can you still hear us?'

They asked without realization, although reddened and grayed, and like a meat-thing, but textured with grain, forest muscle, a puffy disaster, filled with the moisture one could not deal but be gone alongside with:

'Will it talk back?'

'Should we feed it?'

'Stay back, get away from him, as the elected president of the class, the Valedictorian school king-champion compressor of dream, god, cum laude and what not, I am to take the much needed lead and lead you I shall, as thus, in this dark age in which our teachers have abandoned us. Stare, and look into it, we must butcher is heart in order to escape, this eternal hell we've been banished towards, during the shooting.' He cried of, which he remembered, like many of them in turn. He lived through the memories of being shot, endlessly. Slugs and shells entering him, every piece of his eye, and every little blank shattering the crown of his shell, the butchered remains being left, much to itself, plain on the ground, not resting. Bested by a fine shooter, the specter that was yet unseen; he, Pepitr, who had been reborn from a cripple, although, his name was yet forgotten and lost, he kept that in mind, being destroyed, almost to a false entirety by Killblood. His very souls would've been destroyed, if attention be needed, but lo', crying forth was pointlessly strewn, and feeted were sides to the raft:

'I will not have no man and no woman be killed as long as I am here, as long as my vigilant eye is still, functioning.'

He checked it. A few of the students turned towards him. He pulled one of his fake eyes with a cord. It had many holes in it, like the shaft of a semi-automatic. But incapable of actually shooting; he opened his eye further, a shot of cognac being taken to his mind, as to remember a time he was drunk and saw a dark vision, of a great storm that was to come, one that would swallow even this one, a much greater one. Made out of wild chaps, who've died but were brought back to life; elongated like parchments and split in halves, flapping away in mild disgust, as their fully, properly open mouths contorted into maws, but circles, as to spit but rings of, aligned-nuclear beads, Fat Ones that would fall in. And blow, and show the spread of nuclear glow, as the sea would be completely irradiated.

What his fellow students saw, was nothing but a glowing green-thing, a tinted flash that projected a worm-appendage with a slightly shimmering slit out of which many spikes came out of, crawling along-side it. He was bent on trying to understand what was happening inside of it, the apparel it bore, of mildly tormented by brain-injury, stricken down neurons that were turned into tiny towers of dandelions, parasitically embracing one another soon after, as yet, they had approached the giant.

'Stand aside and let it check him. We shall receive the answer we carve for one way or another, or we shall all be doomed to be destroyed and cast in the ocean, while our bodies shall be filled with boils, and we, defeated, standing near a body of desperate water. We'll in a most dreadful, terrible manner still.'

It was then that roof got torn asunder from its hinges, nails and bricks. The giant stood on one foot, towering the little thing, with a shimmer and a shiver he could've crushed them all, still. It waited, but lo', the wind had blown the roof, and little as much was satiated. But the distress continued. After March; there was a made-up second Easter, a dark celebration, twisted by the Sabbathean monarchs, whose pure bloodlines were still crossed in stone. Many had their names carved in, and others. They appeared to have, left one drift apart, a much confused, removed-twice distanced cousin, of a long-extended branch. Whose blood was impure, whose face was the cure, for naught but life, and brought about, to light he drew. His mouth masticating whatever sinew was made of his face.

Slowly he came closer, next to Pepitr, as close as one would draw towards, as such, as to desire, an embrace of the likes:

'Will you allow me to take a sip and slither, a strand of blood? I need it be, taken for an injection, to take as I might.'

A most incessant befuddlement followed soon enough after, as this ungodly corpse started talking into a ripped pieced egg-shell slate, roof-tile formation that fell, slowly, having been stopped mid-way in front of his mouth, being a scale-torn apart cyst-platter of jointed faces through which it spoke:

Confused about it, the students simply listened as the sea started, lopsidedly be split in many tubular-cones of brain-lobe formations that started panting in and out, and off, then began again, spitting on top the mare-stones that dragged them even lower by chains. At this most solemn hour, not only had the raft sided piece of the room stopped, as If to ooze.

Dragoon-sounds could be heard in the distance, as if charging, as were the ship-round softened bellies that followed soon after in a sad attempt to reconcile to what was going on in their heads, most capricious of thundering being followed as their coiled bellies met with hardened spoiled clouds that forced rains of men-casts glowing soon after as they fell, or were shot down.

Before them all, a great vision of sparkling hues of magnificent allures of green and painted verdant eels began wriggling everywhere as the floating giant began communing with the other world:

‘You may wait for a moment now, as I open a rifted nodded knot out of which I wager, I found it, you’re to become aware of its existence after that.’

Without shame, as blasphemous as any kind of dazzled by the likes of hard to look at unsanitary surgeries that were being done, he pulled out of the confines of a beaten upon, a hard-near-extinction inducing pressure being cast upon the metal, quailing feverishly under the sight of ardor, which caused flakes of metal-rust to fall off, slowly travelling towards him, as he extended an arm. It disappeared, from their point of view.’

‘Was the arm there before? I can’t remember.’

‘It grew anew.’

Was the reason why it kept twitching in and out; many if not, the hundreds of limbs that it hid, were placed and stored in other incestuous whores and worlds in which they’d be protected.

From his side, standing between four great arches that encompassed him, on top a pillar of soiled dirt, that’s been the hilt of a hill, rounded by a paved-by dirt road, met by a telescopically-enchanted view, out of many eyes, all attached, he was met by many dirty-giants, all of whom had brought to him what he wanted all along.

‘A piece of mind, I’ve tried to do without it, and to live like them. And when I failed, I have sunken and rotten away, knowingly aware that my wail would be as such, miss-rotten, for each day that might pass along. In waiting as I stood, hibernating but, being, still to a degree alive. I would’ve made a change.’

Desperate, it was getting desperate.

‘The school sector is falling apart.’

As were the children being killed, thousands, millions of school shooting happening at various times a day, every single week bearing corpses that were flowingly carried away by the paramedics. Not as if it had been unexpected, but the sound of disquiet was only one of the many to come. The killed children were replaced with figures such as themselves, but power rocks were hit inside of them, lurid elongated things that kept leaping in and out of them, within a few centimeters or so, disappeared when, least of all would one expect one to show up, in an attempt to imitate the real-body, with its transparent allure, most would come, as it show, by the insides of a Troubadour. A circus performing contortionist in quiet; his open mouth revealing incisors with shots of spears that bore crystal-cysted tears out of them, pointedly forth:

‘The teacher, he’s been mentally infested by the sea-scum giant, has he not fallen under his control? Manipulated In the same way a puppeteer controls him so? What are those lies he’s jotting down against the board? Are they not all lies, I see that are being put forth? I swear, I swear, I could swear on the unkindest thoughts.

The numbers, do anything but add up.’

‘Say something if that’s the case, Hassorf; if not, then keep listening and don’t disturb the rest of the class; I hate it when that happens and I could not move on if it were to happen.’

And the ceiling had holes and many of them were aligned together, leading to the upper-room. Their desks had all contorted legs, finger-straws that pointed down, twisted but merged with the air, but following unseen rafts that could not work for long without air. By then, some lowered. By then, by means, as for someone to find out what happened. By then, they would’ve forgotten. By then, the ropes were lowered down. And the iron ropes were the curtained hopes, theirs, for what was worth, being a desire to escape.

‘Who ate their floor, our ceiling? I could never wrap my head around it.’

‘They did it during desperate attempts to escape their classroom while it was being shot. Could you imagine that, could you even hope to imagine what went through them during that time?’

‘Bullets, slugs and other shots?’

‘Among other things, of course, they had inflated, blimp-balloon drowning near the base of a Nigger-lynching Holocaust, where the homos killed themselves.’

‘What does that mean?’

‘It means what it means, they’re still hiding in the walls somewhere, the ones that escaped. You see now, as their compact mouths and up-closed jaws expanded, they simply started suckling-nesting, as their teeth contracted, into the very material of the board, the walls, the filling being the key-element that made all and out of which all is made out of. Now you get it?

Their self-cannibalization was followed by a regurgitation of their innards and brain-electron dendrites that had been pumped inside the floor-tubing of our domed-ceiling world. They most likely escaped through the sewage systems and live in the chemical plants as well as the nuclear turbines near our school.

And for the same reason, I say, they’re not here any longer.’

No, that’s not it, why didn’t I tell him the real reason? Could my mind be failing me now? John Fessul wondered, just for a moment there, whatever it be; why did it happen?

For that reason the animated desk, those flaccidly elongated iron-snakes are waddling while thoroughly levitating in place. Above a few centimeters away from where they stood and are. It didn't make much sense, but the bell rang. But the class wasn't over.

The teacher immediately exploded. Some of the shrapnel killed some of the students that had been attending class, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, a break for bleeding, thoroughly needing of medical assistance, a student just flailed, whipped his broken leg, before he finally fell, on his face, dead.

A tape-worm elongated as wide as a man's torso connected to the bulkish form of a bat-body-like deformity with a Pterodactyl-humanoid hybrid carnivorous plant head whose eyes were protruding forward like pikes, bearing a large shark-fin for an arm on its left side, and a cushioned half-molar twisted on one side as for its 'roots' to be planted inside the rat-bat heinously shaped body, with a few fallen down tube-protrusions out of which pool-like growths fell on the floor. Its mouth opened like a maw, revealing superficially long-thin teeth. Its tongue was an ugly pie-malformed flower-growth with a spear-shot trajectory peculiar inclination, that had, at one end a pin-pricked nail put in that threw a long-black cordial-rope that connected to the base of the tongue; forming an arched piercing. Through this it spoke:

'Students, Marrowrnh, at your disposal.'

Needless to say, Killblood tanked all of the shots, which haven't even penetrated him, at all. The muscle particles even deflected some of the shrapnel that bounced across the room, without even compromising their structural integrity, while also, even damaging some of the slugs themselves while doing so.

'I vowed to myself that I will turn this bloody district into something beyond recognizable, beyond anything that's even remotely comprehensible, and that I will personally make sure that you shall leave this classroom as changed men. Who will grow and help raise this Country and the States of affair beyond anything even remotely measurable.'

A Holocaust, indeed.

He was flashing red-green. A strange water-ravish ray of moving splendor came out of him. It was a time of wonder, but most solemnly one of uncertainty. Whether or not anyone in this room would survive for long enough to see the longed for day or graduation, that was, very much so, irrelevant. Since they all had explosives planted in their brain lobes, their guts, their ankles, their wrists, with the exception of Killblood, of course, who could not actually be 'intruded' upon, as for a successful intrusive surgery to occur, not a single student was meant to survive.

A malefic thing of evil and tenebrous intent; having allowed for their reincarnation to occur only to have them killed again was not only bastardly, yet even disfigured in terms of morality it played off as a 'face' that spat when faced by another one, most preciously carved as to closely resemble the beauty of humanity, as a reflection.

By the teacher's side of the wall, the clock:

Eight am, stroke a beady passing to nine point four, as one of his deranged eyes cocked towards it, a complete shake-off moving spindly crack had formed a fissure knot to open, as for a seminal-fluid filled, filthy, thievish roach-black band of insects to come out of their hiding. It immediately sutured itself as they came out, forming a paradigm minded, of some kind, circular formation; shaking eerily in place as it happened. Eight or seven eyes for each and every single one of them; bastardly rotating as to track the molecules that fell on top of one another whereas they were forced to stay their hands from lunging and attacking.

They claimed to door for the time being. No one was allowed to leave.

‘Is this part of the course? Should I write them down for something?’

Incohr

Seeds were being planted even before he decided it was time to knock on wood.

‘Serendip, what are you doing there?’

Would it make any difference if I opened my mouth and said something to him?

It’s hard to know as it is.

‘It is divine.’

‘What is?’

‘The ground, what else could there be?’

Neither one of them knew what to expect or what had gotten into them, yet it was dark and the promontory spinner was but entering the ground instead. Having barely come out of the ship alive was a feat in itself.

‘I see that there’s but one hindrance to what’s been going on before we started coming around.’

There was a sudden grow somewhere in the back, twenty feet ahead. It sounded like a lightning hitting the highest point of a rack.

Farrga Oilstone, was the first sent, as the prime envoy of the ship, he was the one with the highest chance at survival. His chest bore a giant egg-like protrusion that almost jerked his head off the shaft, he had not neck or shoulders, yet he had some long almost thin-reed pea-shooters coming out of it.

‘Farrga, you listen good and listen well, we’re counting on your now, do you understand?’

It was inconsequential, trying to make out what was going on around them, since their mouth spittle corroded part of their helmet, the bacteria started flowing inside them. Weirdly set, they stood there.

A few feet away, right at the intersection of a broken street and a leviathan-sized bloated side of the ground, there stood a wild cocoon of girth, as if stripped away for what had lain on top of it, its inside stone was slightly more, playfully moving, yet exposed.

One Hog Watts drew forth, he was elongated in the back, going as far as to extend like an accordion, open at the top, in there came a wicked air, as if it was stored inside a little box.

‘Pleiffne Ulme, thou art gone from sight and I am lain here on the side forgotten.’

With where and what had lain their side.

‘The Lombard-kin at last emerges, bow and listen to wild command.’

And thence they stared at mighty ardor, propelled to ask the Yellow-Orange puddle that stood before them, stopped.

‘Alas, I am brought before thine way, I am but little of a mind, to let alone would I dismiss wild command, tell me, thenceforth where am I to drag myself to?’

‘A rocking cradle red malign, a pool of green or one that’s in-between them, berry colored or cherry-blossom or white, whatever else there is across the lands, only so you less become, of bastardly as there is, nothing more.’

Thence but sprawled and there on after, walked backwardly, they poured it in a cantor made of strange devices, all put together by a bastardly barrage. And blocks of wool were put near wheels, and a chart drove on.

‘I am tired, my lord, what is there else left to do?’

‘Simply put, thou are to talk to your heart’s content; it is clear that you shall not create and do any by any means, so why force it and why not put all to one’s defeat?’

Thou shall be put to waste on words alone, as long as you are to make thineself useful, think, as a craftsman would and make, but bloat away as I dictate.’

There was nothing to be minded for from that point on, only such celestial perdition.

‘There is only one safe side, now that we have eliminated all of ill blood, and cleansed the land but one might do to look away.’

He pointed at the hay; it rose, like a strange thing upon a tail that was a lone pole that started pushing and bloating until deranged crevices came and brought alone a most bastardly of hemathose tails, all erupting from a body-like canopy, wrapping around the first man it could bring along, and deeper so inside until no longer could it force itself to wait.

Dark pillars that are put together, large domino like structures that are attached to them as well, adding up to so many unaccountable forms that could not be stuck together in any other way, unless the process was repeated and forced along the way. Large concavely set seeping in, melt-through wax-like candid bile, barely legible than any of the least natural and least accountable flagrant helium-pores that grew around the rims of the object. Its dark head reared in and out, right before the triangular drink-through galloons appeared, all of them fully extended from what seemed to be a single point inside the main pillared structure in the middle, made out of plenty of in-earth and carried around hundreds of miles from where they've been standing, and millions more and far beyond. Surrounding it there lay, a dome of see-through gaps and plenty openings that were brought and put around when needed. Large bars, all of them but melted from the looks of which, neither of them could last for long to stand, but grit would seep in and out and fall, covering the structure in the middle, as for a moment more and one less, it came about. No longer hard irons, but rubbery cartilage from the looks of it, trying to lift the pillars up from the place they were in; this pseudo dark tooth of the earth bore within itself nothing more than a few extending escalators that came out, revealed by retracting walls that drew back from both sides, like pursing vertically flipped lips that suddenly opened, pushing them out. From there the strange dome, upon lifting itself up as to levitate, out of one of the many support pillar – like joints that had been planted in the soil, the rubbery jerky thing started threading along, displaying a stretch that would exclude it from every possible thing and every possible means one could look into as to believe it could be found on earth. The mere malleability struck it into a pseudo half-in-between shape that lay between a resin mask, taking the form of the escalator stairs and while at the same time maintaining the robust almost tear drop roundness that contradicts the present of any edges that might've been there if the form had fully taken the shape of the escalator stairs in the first place, entering one of the doors, through which the dome entered the pillar, being greeted as soon as it was observed inside the strange room that was fashioned out of seemingly nothing. It was a disgraceful thing, just waiting for some communication to be achieved since the dome wasn't a being that possessed any kind of consciousness at all, none whatsoever. And the strange creature that lived inside the structure was back-bent and appeared to have its armless body a trunk-chest standing on a giant fish-hook contortion of its lower body, upon which it not only balanced its weight but also drew on closer to the strange dome-leg. Its face was strangely wrought in form and appeared to bear a fashioned wooden dark mask.

‘What have you come here for?’

What is the purpose of your intrusion?’

There was no need to push in, since it would not respond.

A few similarities between every shade and every form remained on the floor, a very hall of mirrors to be walked on top off.

Thence they stopped and finally left their nest.

A silvery mushroom cloud had rested and least of all of locks ingested, would to be, from underground, there stood at an empty table.

Large detrimental figure, bold; much wider and far stronger that it would appear, it simply dangled a single strand of beads with a fork.

‘I feel their vile influences seeping into my soul, how could I possibly resist their calling to chaos and destruction?’

I am a vile machines afflicted by unfathomable mental illnesses, infinite in number. I am to bring their destruction, I am a diseased animal, incapable of controlling this urge to instill self-destructive hatred of filthy fucking niggers into them. I am a well of poison, a rat that shall infiltrate within their ranks and infest the rat hive, and if it is within my power, I shall bring chaos, eternal and never ending and I shall destroy and corrupt all.'

'Marvelous, what else should we do?'

'We are alone, but we are many and we shall dissolve their holy state and we shall bring all of them to justice, which is death.'

And they lived in no land, but a broken crawling humanoid, with the open-gaped insides of a giant bus. He was rotten, red, green and diseased looking, and had no palms, he had no ankles either, seats were cages inside of him, taking the place of organs, actioned and moved by system of chains. Normally the cages would've been outward facing, like a face.

The wretched could not forget by sight alone, they would stop at nothing when the time comes, they will put to their command and rise and draw breathe in the pulmonary land, hands clasped together and so much more, so many of them bearing the unnatural aspects their spoiled parents, the ones that look upon them, with leper-sockets, split open, marching down, with open wounds around their body doubles, hundreds of them laying down.

'The more we'll stay in this room, the more we will decay, it's undeniable. It's your body, mind, turning against itself.'

The right cavity of his chest was but empty, in the shape of a cabinet where he stored in nothing else but a small puffy beady organ. Darkly mattered put together heads were there, invisible and watching as they would breathe on top of it every now and then, incapable of fully stopping, regardless of the circumstance they were in and what was happening.

Leprous Leper-Open in the head, he spoke, opened his mouth, he opened it dead. And death was the talker whom was conjoined to a wing, a body that only had one but stood on eight tails, many of them pushing out but flails with giant pair of maw-like teeth, they ate –extended. Many of the bodies attached at the chest defended one another, as to cry and have themselves be heard, lost for any courtesy which at the very least was lost, for the time being.

The ethnic conundrum could not easily be solved by any feasible means since the inception of the race-fragmentation was filled with some unnaturally made tenor-brittle.

'Engulfed by something, isn't it?'

'It is, but I don't think there's a reason for it.'

It was a hard notice that followed after. A flow of steel-liquefied screwdrivers pushing through a few racks, fallen over.

Nothing seemed to last more than a few moments, not from the looks of it and definitely not from any other point there. A few specks of black lights appeared to be planted in their heads, harpy like or at the very least made to look that way from one point to the other, he appeared out of nowhere and would make it seem so, and so was there as reason to walk on ice.

It was a thing that could not stand itself, by the mere presence, as it happened to appear, after a while, nearing the darkest day.

The creature whose but little more than less secluded body and bitter face, moving and frothing like a dark thing it did.

‘There is no certain way by which any of you might make it.’

‘What is the reason to continue after this point in time, there’s too much along the way, isn’t there? And you see now, I think we can both agree on as much, we can’t be certain whom we might stumble or come to, not when, not necessarily when there’s something else involved across the line, can we?’

‘It’s the dependency, that is, I believe there’s no possible way you could possibly resist it.’

Both men chewed on wild Cuban cigars, of the highest quality from mound-Brazil where they ate the Natives and put them into tilting basins. Filled with jewel-cowered, non-existing darks:

‘There won’t be any more trying past this point, do you understand? No more trials, no more excuses, no more delusions, and no more pretending. Our fun is coming to an end.’

‘Then we shall find a way to extend it by all means, the cost may as well be forgotten, as there’s no greater cost that could come as a price for our joy. It’s all or nothing.’

‘So be it, but for your own sake I do hope you’re prepared to do all that is needed to get immersed again, to forget about the world.’

‘I am, but where to now?’

Before them stood a broken bridge-pattern, whereas a castle and a longer fort, combined in little roads and peasant houses of similar like, quality of stone seemed to be. In whichever there, regard, there was just as much plain-mold of the lowest almost quasi-spectral quality fallen over, little specks of mushroom crows and little dark rats killed about by arrows that would not have found themselves there.

‘Within reason, I see, there’s just, oh, allow me to introduce myself, I am Rekot, and no more shall I speak to thee until thine path crosses the edge of whatever to be called in question, if you ought to be bound to agree on this.

Is there no wonder in thine call for what reason you are here for?’

‘I’ve come to search for the man who stole part of the world and hid it inside this little dark slouch you found yourself standing at the entrance of. Is there no grander reason for me to approach thee?’

‘Nay, you must leave, you do not understand the likes of the creature that stands at your feet.’

‘Do be plain and explain who you are, for my likes and that of the friend, the man who stands before you, right in front of, largely so, as there’s but time and time enough for you to come again.’

‘Very well then, in that case, allow me.’

As the benefactor prodded, therefore, couldn’t stand it.

They would hear it eventually, wherever it went, it could not be tracked for too long. It was there a moment ago, appearing and disappearing every single second before they drew breathe.

A few people gathered, coming out of nowhere, all dressed in peculiar robed-suits, with their clenched in fists put through their shoulders, drawing in from their openly pouring guts, strangely as it sounded, fluke- bloated all around. It seemed likely that there would be nothing drawing in breath.

‘It’s been broken, twenty hours ago by the looks of it, think there’s any way we could somehow make it work again?’

‘I don’t so.’

‘Should we, ought we to look away and drive the plug into one of the power stripes?’

‘Nay, I think it’s within reason to way, something might come out of its way and take everything away from us.’

‘What do you know exactly?’

‘Not much, only the few things I’ve seen before, you wouldn’t understand, necessarily so, but I’m trying to see for myself.’

Prattoid went around the hook avoided, bloodied around. Its arms but clasped like pincer-hook guns, coming out its chitin, twenty almost gun-like formations making his inner- canon like form, drive-through kind of like manner in which he charged, killing what seemed to be two thirds of the first town it entered. Conjoined to him stood Cart Bigh Blight-Pus Tin-deranged the Woman-killer with wrenches around their throats, put in the ground cancer-like shoot, they were followed by a quarter of a million men with guns mounted on pole-skin like flag-cylinders.

He wore a crown of hooks, it was not expected, at the very least not for him to act in such a way his likes detested.

‘May I enter now, is there a reason there’s a need for either one of us to stall any longer?’

‘And whom would you be referring to and would you happen, oh blameful thing to have, as such, of wild appointment?’

‘Nay, I see no reason to walk forth, not when I’m ailed with looking at dark images that appear every now and forth, and speak, they’ve had be in trance, wonderingly following for hours.’

‘What is there to your claim in that case?’

‘I’ve only have these scars which spread, all around my body, to the point where, piece upon piece that there is my face no longer is here on my skull.’

The man but stroked his beard every now and then, and every ounce or piece that fell away seemed to glisten, nor would it stay for long, nor would it go anywhere else.

But in that dark place, the structure, where but missing children had their skulls projected into. And they were wearied for the place was cold.

Hence they stole the faces of adults and used them as covers, or their sheets, without reason to ask for it, or more, they took them without grace. They were children. But they were wasted, instead.

Ghyulo started suffering for a while. He was in a corner now, but trying to cover himself with whatever he could. There was nothing around him but no harm done. People would sometimes appear out of nowhere and talk out of walls.

‘Will you stop this pestering of mine? Will you stop bothering me, already?’

‘I’ve but arrived.’

‘No, not you Glory of the Stumps, not you Stumps, the others, the others who have been here before you. They’ve come to torment me, they’ve come to make a fool out of me for some reason I can’t endure to explain.’

‘But who are they?’

‘I do not know.’

‘Where have you seen them last?’

‘In a vision, of the cemetery when I basked upon an image of my own crypt, into the tomb, as I was slowly being lead to the small putrid-barely standing coffin that was to be my grave, to which I still listen to this hour, thoroughly as if it were an oyster, as if it were my own grave standing, in day and in vile night, under the street-light as I stumble so.

Do you not see reason in what I ought to say or do?’

‘I only hear a man that’s lost and ill, and see one abandoned, and misguided, as it is true for many man in lesser such there are, conditions.

But listen, my friend, Ghyulo, you still have two arms and two legs, you can still survive by such means that many men in worse and worsening conditions would only dream for it to be as such.’

‘What reason is there to fight it?’

No, not now that I am haunted by the visions, by specters, lesser, kinds of men. They whom had arrived to warn me now, I’ll see to it, and would but latch upon such lesser things as one would force me out of womb, as to despair the thought of living.’

‘Do not be overly dramatic, you foolish tinge, can’t you see that you’re but spouting the most of the blasphemous spores? Can’t you see that you’re delirious and those things you’re seeing, as little of what little worth they are, indeed, can’t be anything but, unreal. To either you or I, we see the world as it is and may never stand by it, whatever reason there is and whatever plain thing might be, I can still pull you out of it, if only you gave me a chance.'

'Why should I do such a pernicious thing when all you do all day I say, you are standing there madly in a corner, with the same thoughts that you convey.

Who is to be called madder, I or the guest in my chamber, who looks as if he's seen a specter? Who's winded back and lesser so, who tried convincing me of not seeing who and who might know?'

'In that case, perhaps you ought to be acknowledged upon such thought and such confession, I have purposefully sent you in such direction as any other man would cast his glance away and hide, purposefully doing it out of my own willingly, to be put behind, ignorance of what was become of your mind while I left you here.'

'Admittance!' Cried Ghyulo with reprimand. 'So, you've come to realize that you have purposefully abandoned me during one of my least heartily of a timely manner. You've come to understand the damage which has already been done, committed and no longer shall this disturbing fact be omitted from the guilt you are to suffer forth. But know, of less that I shall not see any reason to convey, or to contort whichever ever-fact there is.

Whatever prized manner they might find themselves in, I shall see no worth in making what I can, of fashioning of hands in walls, to allow them such possession of the house. That they might, within reasonable pain but strangle men whenever there is but such claim and no sooner will I flee from sight, and for no reason would I lay my arms and let them tear me apart.'

'Then what is stopping you in such a case?'

'Nothing, of course, I lay here in my room as I await a cruelty such the likes would never see nor think about questioning, as to what happened.

The velvet-red and many curtains of the pattern might but bleed onto me and spoil. Whatever there is part of my skin and worth of soil, I long force out and lay in waiting.'

With which he stopped cradling as he waited to be torn apart by the room.

Some sticks were thrown around the race, a war had started because of it, the city was, for much of its time, disgraced by the strange people that ran it.

Senator Milton began appealing what he could.

'There was a snore, and mighty gore, was the child galore, it is my son, my wont, he is a plastic animal without teeth. He was flown across the city from inside an apartment womb. I am his father, the god, the king, the master, Senator Milton.

I've created many great things, but I still find myself, restless in some way, carving for women, the thing I cannot obtain, no matter how hard and desperate my attempts are. I wish.'

'Were you not married before? How is it that you've got a son in that case?'

A fancy-dressed journalist from one of the seats, in the conference room asked that. Not everyone was sitting on seats, some of them were sitting on spikes.

‘I am the gut-lord, I am afraid of snakes.’

‘Everyone with a shaped nose is one.’

‘Luckily for us, we’ve already kicked them out of the room, ha!’

The entire room shook with palpitation and with extreme sardoniness.

‘Huh?’

‘Gun, mouth, now.’

Journal- Michael pulled out a dark gun, which already fell out his hand since it had a knife attached to the front bullet like a chimney-sweeper, but if the coal boy started hiking his way out while the stove was being fired.

‘I failed to do so.’

‘You most certainly have, for that I am going to punish you most severely.’

‘But Senator, that is illegal.’

‘Living is illegal here, did you forget that?’

It was a trick, always kick them out before the slaughter begins, it’s double talk for double stab.’

Wretched trickster, he was, he stacked them in a pile. But not before lifting his arms, drowning his sheet-thin skin pillars that began extending out of his chin-region from where he stood, revealing twenty lined rotating mounted guns that looked like old-ancient Greek pottery depiction of their myths.

It was a slaughter that could not be prevented. He leaped on one of the tables, having kicked most of the microphones off.

‘Are we having fun yet?’

A single elongated skull – that of cattle left in the desert with googly eye-red Communistic styled stars appeared to project an immediate red heat on top of everyone in the room but the Senator, whom had been dead all along.

His face was missing, as was his heart, not literally, but it was simply not there.

‘I’ve had dreams of change.’

The red stars disappeared and instead of them, dynamite.

‘What’s happening outside?’

Milton was asked and just as soon he considered actually responding to the creature.

There is still the abandoned vestige.

One of the street lights was pissed on. Visor broken but there was no shortage of replacements on the side of the wagon. A vagrant gang stood by it, they were smoking.

‘Came soon into town?’

‘I’ve been here for a while; we’ve met before, same reaction as well. It won’t work twice on this fellow.’

Jakluds, the Tpogghimher, drew from one side to other, having encompassed himself in a mightily fornication-looking defilement of many skins put together at last.

Cabin-dark

It happened for some reason or another, despite them being all there, in one place together.

John Long-Trunk feared looking at the tablet cabin.

What could be absorbed as it only came for it to thread along was the strange, almost illicit response to the space atrophy that no one seemed to be paying attention to, despite it happening, mainly in the area between the after- and post dark area and the few meters away, adjacent to the visible walls next to the entrance to the dark abyss they were staring into. Leaving what appeared to be, a huge sea-gull from the side without wings and fat, encompassing or having grown in the room, outline across the walls, but being, despite what had been previously said a wing in the dark. Its right wing, the left one being inexistent, the sea gull being seen, or imagined in front of them but staring to the left, its belly being the main anatomical part inside the room. As a delineator of the size in which the space atrophy was happening. Like muscle, but with actual space, where it started thinning out at too much of an unpredictable amount of time, drawing them closer into the dark. Eventually they would be drawn in. All of them, Clara especially felt afraid. All of them were sitting like planks on an inverted floor despite standing straight. It’s how the atrophy worked and happened, but at a slower pace. Planks on their faces, sitting-standing in that position as if the floor was slowly receding into a floor or apartment below them, as if gravity was drawing them over, or they were inside an elevator that was being pulled out of the elevator socket and into the hallway outside the apartments that stood inside the floor, it was a disease. Born out of not working enough, not putting enough of an effort to sustain the space, atom-molecule atrophy but forcing them into halves, but peculiar inside atoms having already formed – with chains dragged along as to prevent the atrophy from happening, in order to save as much pure energy as possible. Tinier bubbles inside of bigger-wider bubbles which had not as much as chains but straws connected to the inward surface of the bubbles which drew the mass in, as if the Earth’s core suddenly started drawing in the Earth’s landmass and water in, shrinking everything until the core became encompassed in a more compressed, condensed shell. Forming bubble-wrap like clusters but even closer to one another, shortening everything until the molecule-clothes formations started mixing with power-electrical atoms that had been drawn from the distance which in turn made some of their clothes appear like they were sparkling with energy, leaping around the small room formation they were in. But at the same time being unable, itself, the material that was hybridized with everything else that was around them, displaying an incapability of comprehending how to act.

A bullet-part spear was formed as large curtain scissors.

It all made sense now, especially since this appeared out of nowhere. Also was like liquid.

Since the pea-shooter like atom-compressed molecules somehow maintained their tube-like tunnel formations despite the shrinking-compression having happened, they simply formed large-long distance tunnel-like systems like trams or a subway, not the sandwich pedophile kike who fucks children, but the underground system. Which facilitated the long-distance travel of a bullet which had been shot dead straight through a window, having the colt aimed at an African that had just prepared himself as for the spear chucking, while, standing across the window frame, there stood a water glass, and at the same time while this alignment happened, the wind simply blew the curtain in front of the man as to blind him. While the bullet's first shot burst through the curtain, dragging it along, the soft material which it had been made of simply brushed off the glass shards, while being molded to the back-side of the bullet, it had also dragged along a pair of scissors that had remained stuck in a cut-like motion by a man who was working, and was apparently startled by this motion of the person in front of him shooting, and owning an illegally modified colt with aim-sights and an evil pair of bat-like animated bloody-meaty perpendicularly set wings. Such was it, that the bullet shot through the spear, having the two sides, which it broke in half shoot through the curtain, being lodged thoroughly in the curtain-material as it only molded itself, iron-for iron, wooden thorn with curtain as it stopped on one side spear-shaft between crossed scissors like missionary monogamy-like sex-for making children kind of mold into place, lock inside the key, but the lock was smashed from both sides by giant boulders. As this peculiar mix of a curtain, scissors, a wet curtain which had been nigh-closely destroyed kept flying in the distance, they suddenly stopped moving as they began but eerily jerking in the distance, glowing as if they were a peculiar dark-star that was oozing in the most peculiar manner. Then, it simply disappeared, atom by atom, until all of the sudden it vanished in the air. Then it simply appeared there as if nothing had happened at all.

Tliske

Twas the chance before it would but draw again into the point whence drawing, and whence the powder and lift as such, from the distance thaw as mass their crying, when the cold monsoon. Upon such, as there was little more, and whence they came and drew, up front, there was and thus as little and naught more. And much of little, yet their way, and ever-after, not to come, as they have drawn from one another, torn:

‘Thence I have come and yet to, such, as they have stumbled. Upon such graves as there are after, such as mighty, less and less. They came upon the cypress.’

Longer verge, as they have counted, upon the day of their encounter, as for much as swaying, back and forth and furlong sails that drew and song, as would to be, would to call, would come after. Upon the singing of the chimes of ships but sunken, would they call. But lo, and there was no sound.

Upon the murk and less as there, and would to call and anywhere, there was no praying. It would to waste a day.

There was no reason ever after, and whence.

‘Throw and lopsided.’

In, as thus as they might’ve called and yearned for something twas not there would see and be as while and met. Would to call instead upon a dire, such there is but way. Not to call after, for no man, that might’ve called their own, and little there is left for such, as worth.

‘I call upon the, of mighty that may trudge to see, there’s naught to yell, towards might hear.’

Of musky thing there is such thing, is there not to disappear, such is sight? If not to call upon such day when therefore cast, and less to be; gathered around stone, they see.

A mighty left, and flame but yet apart they gather after, when, upon, is there for lock, and yonder. Would they see of such and lesser things, there’s naught, would they hear when the time comes and they be brought? There’s no one yet alive, in world. Upon the sight, and what if felt, and old, as many less, and sails, for as many as there’s left and would prevail if there’s but the cast.

Away the last of them, and thus:

‘We bring no age to joy when.

I of all but ask you for poor ledge upon and less purloin, there is naught that there’s away. What little left of soul, I cast away. With rest of things, I do remind you, of blameful sting there is but pardon.

My wife of whom I swallow after, where would she be if that were so, but man of old, we are but all.’

As thus they but, blameful as there would be day, there was nothing less and wonder would pour after, and yet to convey.

Darkest of companies, belittled as such, munching upon higher hours, would to be, and thus:

It was a piece that fell, another of another man.

Were we always in such halls I wonder? Always of a mead less stronger? Of its musk, there is but let, and as I stumble upon it, I yearn such things as one would hear himself say:

‘Where have I as thus, there, where might I see?’

Upon the hour, they saw, nothing, sublime.

‘And dark there is but come today, upon the passing that shall come as there is but least, of leprous-pay, would you as such, as mighty man of mad descent, upon the hour, but would you provide her, along the way, of such discourse as there is but incertitude of ever yet encompassing. Would you come after and as such, the plea.’

Gleeful lights

Cheering upon the plains as they might, were they of any less stature, they might've made a sound and come about the hour, there stood a mightily deformed shroud.

The caste was in ruin, held by doors that were long before abandoned along the way. Having been carried eighteen.

There stood a dead sea by the side. On and off they doused off. It was a green-pucker spool of many threads. It was past the reason where it stood and. It drew on forth and mighty cloud it were, and past and crook. Were it to be and follow, what came after, there stood on mighty rods, basin.

Wrung for days and what came after, upon the wallowing and forth thee yonder, could they see it yet again to flee, yet sorrow.

It looked over them, like a watcher ever vigilant. A patch of ultramarine-dark teal with raw sienna, a strange glowing mix with splashes of straw mill flour.

There are a few predecessors in the room.

'You were here before I, would that be correct?'

'I'm not denying it.'

'And you saw what happened long before they entered, right?'

'Call me a liar again and I'm going knock out your jaw off the socket.'

They were in the front and the front was never-ending, war. It knew no bounds. It could only go as far as to release every soldier from its grasp and every soldier is a man at the end of the day. But some women don't wait for their men, henceforth, they're put down.

They called him Calf Bowmorrhough. He had witnessed the passing of the first ends, and had lived inside their broken doll faces for far too long. Its doll-eyes were crossed, as for the frame of the window, a large yellowish green light but lighted his sweaty face. For what seemed to be an hour, he spoke and they listened.

'I wasn't always the man you see before you, no. I've been driving myself into these walls for who knows how long.'

Part of the doll's house was the shape of a tram, like a tumor sprouting off her cheek, little rotating plates on the wall appeared to cast upon one another deeply-wrought refraction lights, the same as the one that almost blinded Calf.

'They called me that because I used to serve as a poker. But you don't want to hear my story just yet, it could be too dangerous for you to find out what I've been hiding for the past seventeen years.'

Hence, he got up, opened the doll's drooling on the streets mouth and was met by nothing else, other than a stairway leading down, even past the point where it had met the surface, it kept going through it.

There are some things not a single one of them seems to think about.

'Every living object has been contaminated and put behind a closely wrought lock, so you just know, there was never a chance either one of them would make it through. There were failures, and backwards devices that would break everything if even the slightest man did a wrong move.'

'Slightest?'

'Slimmer men, this what they're called. We could never trust them, especially since neither one of them knew what was going to happen. We're here for a reason, don't forget and don't bother wrapping your petty little head around it, there's something definitely wrong with every little detail that's ripped to shreds.'

He knew he couldn't understand it, neither man could. And for that reason they were still shaken, trying to fend off what came over them. It did not reactivate until one of them started making a cut in their pre-deceased implanted egg-plant horn, out of them came a voice:

'Neither one of you understands what's happening here and for that reason, you're both to be put down for your own sakes.'

Trenchcoat-chapter

IT started sprawling on the paper-knack with the winged-depression magnifying frames that were indeed lost in the sea of crumbling statues. All of whom but held, in place:

'I remain unconvinced that there's something going on in here.'

Many pears were out of place, too wide and widened as the head of a great elated, blood-room with the circumference of eighteen bloated elephants adjacent to one another, all wrapped around by bands and coiled, girth of foils. It was not a volatile sea-bed the wretched part of yonder his hopeless cast was put inside of, but an unfathomably, hard to look out place of innards-coils, but not physical, but left as for the marks of a land and buildings that had been whipped, like the backs of cotton-picking niggers, who earned it, asked for it, always drawing from one to another, always carrying the likes of a dafter travelling valley. With gravitational waves having lifted the entire geological conundrum it had become, in the air, close to one hundred or two hundred miles, to the right, then moved from one place to another, until no longer clad in what appeared to be the one that ran away.

'I see that you remember me, when I have told you.'

Two valleys, there were two floating valleys, masses of clay-stone. With a single train-like pair of rails and a Footer, that being a nasty box with leg-pincers that clicked upon each rail-socket. Drifting every now and then in sleep, morose as not to realize what happened before they drew on, each time a beast appeared, hairy and filled with syringes stuck.

‘There’s a single way inside the land. You must follow through the ultra-park.’

‘The what now, a park, in the valley? Wasn’t it supposed to be uninhabited?’

‘Nay, but there is more, the walls are filled with graphitic marks and various writings and it rains inside of it.’

‘But how could that be?’

‘There’s but a way to see it.’

An aerograph giant ship with two bulbs of many serpentine beasts of tumoresque Elephant-man textures, drew in from the point they drew upon. As if from a dark slit, an eight-shaped ball, which opened at the top, the tube coming out, before it took a momentary break and sucked them in, placing them, as calmly and desolately as possible into cheerful looking chairs. Their heads were on the display they were looking at, and although they didn’t understand why it happened, they spoke to themselves.

‘We’re about to approach it.’

No longer in the floating valleys, it had been but a trick. Instead, the ship drove them eighteen hundred fifteen billion miles away from where they were, then simply wilt them in. As if from flash-to-flash no longer staring at the screen, they were made to appear in the dark-cockpits inside the land-rovers. Some of those who were cut-painted; headpieces with spiked bands, rotating, powering themselves, as some old renditions of some old Philosopher, such as Kant were being read upon some up-heaving beats.

Punks were smashing everything, it was true, at least, it did happen to rain. Life there was awful and pointless.

Young blood came with a gun, pointed at his forehead, he killed himself. What a delightful sight, it had been, ever so eternal and disgraceful, as one would have it.

‘Degenerate approach, I see it coming before long. I can see a very great deal of the sky being completely eaten as if by the echoes and the cries.’

‘Who are you talking to?’

Perch tried again. This time, Loyellwo would listen. He had to.

‘It is the innards that dictate when time can only push from one direction to another before we’re all to be dissatisfied with how things are going on here.’

‘Cut, cut, cut, there is the time.’

‘We need order, we need to bring order on these streets, otherwise nothing will happen from this point on and they might simply chop our feet.’

A few feet away from them, in a clearly delineatedly-outlined area:

They all gathered around a memory. It was a well known fact, at least for those who were slightly or ever so slightly well known around the area.

‘Why yes, they used to employ this means of torture in order to drive the invading armies back where they came from, in case you didn’t know about it.’

Woodcarving, Croft, thought, a well done woodcut by the looks of it, a pole and an asterisk. With every limb cut, chopped and put in every sharpened piece during the impalement. The victims survived as well as the cuts around the stomach, throat and limbs were fashioned in a way as to allow an eerily inherent jerkiness to be maintained while the victim struggled to escape.

But the drawing was a forgery.

‘It lacks something.’

‘What?’

‘There used to be a giant spectral head, melting on top of it. A bubbly face with sunken teeth, like a sack potato, falling apart with the rest of the cruelly killed man and the wooden pillar he was placed in.’

‘Sounds more of a curse, doesn’t it?’

‘What doesn’t?’

‘I don’t know, the more I look into history, the less sense everything makes. I sometimes wonder which one is a forgery and which one isn’t.

I seem less capable of distinguishing the facts the more I read into it. Everyone involved into every issue that ever was, seems to have had too much time to toil with every minute detail.

Someone’s messing with it constantly, I swear, one day it’s here and the other is, it’s.’

‘I don’t need to be reminded of it.’

‘If you forget it, then there’s not going to be anyone else to remember it, what’s the point in it then?’

‘I don’t know.’

Both of them were walking along and around the garden hedges, incapable of messing with the small-plant men trapped inside the floating pieces of furniture, the broken castle towers and the various tiles. Many of which bore their hose-bloated tendons that still pumped in. Even they seemed off. Depressingly so, neither one moved from place. It was all static, hard to pass through.

‘You have to remember everything right, unless you want to misremember things. If you do then, it will become real.

And what does that mean for everyone else then?

We can't know.'

'It will be lost anyway, so what's the point of maintaining this façade?'

'It's not a façade as long as.'

'As long as what? There's just not enough interest to keep something true. It can't be driven out to extinction by itself, I mean, it can, but the natural state of it dictates that the process would only be as long as it can keep going. Humans can simply push it until it's natural state skipped the process entirely, killing and utterly destroying it before its humane end has even come to pass.

Or worse, it can be bastardized and remembered as something that wasn't, which is even worse than its natural death. It's as if, a man survived death, not just him as in him but him as the species. But you can't know, you're only told of it. And until the very last moment shows up, your mind has already contorted everything beyond belief.

It's too late by the time they're showing you the true image of what a 'human' has become in its endeavor to survive. By then, it's simply unrecognizable. Because one allowed the enemy to overcome everything, the enemy isn't the natural order, it's the bastardization of it.'

'What is the fix then?'

'How could I know? I, of all am unfit to answer this, since I remain a bastardization of human spirit myself. How could I look at a creature in the future and not recognize myself?

Even though we'd be nothing alike. And even though we may be the furthest thing away from one another, we still represent the same thing in principle.

The opposite of what humans used to be. Homogeneity being forgotten and completely abandoned, bastardized, driven to a wall, to death, forgotten and utterly annihilated. It's biological victory, in some way, which in turn means nothing and it will always mean nothing. For a short period of time, humanity achieved far too much because one thing and one thing only, principle.

Once that was forgotten, once the principle was bastardized and made abusable, then. Everything was and is lost. What hope is there for a 'race' of humans without principle? That which only abuses and exploits the people instead of trying to adhere to standards, to purity, to research and through that thing which drives everyone beyond the likes of common sense? Something beyond human, beyond animal; it's what kikes, niggers and other races don't understand.

Their presence together destroys everything. As long as they're separated, they always seem, to some degree, as long as there's one of them, to act decent, to some degree. But they can't make that distinction for themselves, and it's already too late for everything to change now, since the advent of this 'interplanetary communication system', because of information. It's already late. Since people will always be capable of seeing themselves and their own. Since there's so many of them, pretending to be the same people, feigning hurt from across the globe.

It's simply a despicable sub-human act. Taking advantage of chaos, acting like various tribes, driving one another, encouraging each other to act like animals while complaining about the out-lash of their actions.

It's not just a biological incompatibility; it's their choice, as an ethnic group. To choose their own over others, to promote their groups' interests over others, to act like packs of animals. Hiding inside wretched ghettos and hovels, behind excuses in order to chimp out, steal and destroy. No assimilation can ever occur since they surround themselves with similar specimens. It will always be something that shall dictate the way they act, the way they think, collective thinking and collectivism will always occur, in such a way that, trying to stop whatever might be classified as predatory behavior against them is counter-productive.

If they act like animals, they should be treated like animals.

Wreathing in place as they're killed, and left behind in a looted city where they can be molested and abandoned by their own. It's how they act.

Bleiskelle Bee

Tlinske only moved when hearing of it happen. Much to his renown he kept a blade sharpened as to have, of mighty hold to it attached a lamp. To his ding, he bore oil. In is there was poison, hidden in just about every bubble, hidden from the sight of joy.

He was on the road again, a peaceful thing, finally, no longer there.

Another place

'There's never going to be another chance to claim it back, you must realize that now. Once you lose whatever feeling there is in your heart, it will be erased. Is this sacrifice worth it?'

'It's too late to develop it, there's no compassion left in a world like this, you must clearly understand that.

You must know that purity, empathy, compassion, those things belong to a heterogeneous country. Unfortunately, that's.

That's something only people with nothing to lose can develop. It's something that's, complicatedly running out, isn't it? It cannot be maintained at all. That feeling, not the false, imitation, people like dressing it in, alike, you can only feel compassion for your people now.

And now, who is there left to show compassion towards? I may have failed there, but I don't have to feel any remorse for losing it any longer, I've lost it a long time ago, in these wretched halls.

I realize that I may never be truly alone. But at the same time, I also know that I will never develop a liking to them, or to anyone else, as a matter of fact. I am left even more confused than the way I was when I started this journey. And it is not hatred that dictates my actions any longer, it is not shame, guilt, compassion, or certainty. I do not know what it is any longer, it's unexplainable.

I wish, in some way, it were automatic, my life, my existence, who I dictated, to myself, to become. But I'm driven away, from most people now. From family, from friends, connections, people, from kikes, bearing this aversion towards minorities towards which I hold not even the slightest hint of remorse towards. '

'It's always been there, it just that you've yet to understand that you don't have a soul. To accept it; to do something as dangerously insipid as this, to claim war against all life, to adhere to misanthropy, it is something no one should subscribe to.'

'Yet it is the only way.

There was never any purity in my heart and I was at best deluding myself with it. There just aren't others like me out there, unfortunately, it is the fate of all whom are mixed. Maybe I'm just playing straight into their hands; I don't know.

I do not know whether or not I own myself, whether or not it's possible, whether or not there was ever a chance for me to have it. But what is there left to own then, at this point in time?

At the end of the day, whatever remains of me is naught but pettiness, and insolence. I will have achieved nothing, nothing of worth, and nothing of notice. Another asset, another failure; it's a sinking ship, the world is. As much of a wretch as I am, I shall bide my time and see how it turns out.'

Faith would serve no one, if there was ever a chance to act, if there's any other chance left, it's now.

It waited as if, in a line. Twenty men or so by the looks of it, either smoking a cigar or browsing through the latest magazine or something, one of the Two-heads trying to puff out of a bullet.

'Who is that servant of yours, the one who's dancing and pacing around? The one that's but called every now and then when no one's looking past the blindness of the fog, alight?'

'This is neither your concern, nor should it be, I say, you got lost along the way and.'

'Did you hear that?'

'It came from off the street.'

'Will you accompany me if that's the case?'

'Lead on, then.'

Both men were weary. As to say, they crawled and sizzled on their spines, legless as well.

It was no cave, but hardly was the street a shore. It was wrapped around a great bulbously degrading form.

Nigger-lynching Hangar-or Saphkag was his name and proper title.

‘They will never find me, for I am hidden away. A man of many voices, faces and a hidden real thing, of what I am called, they’ll never see it, when it comes for them.

I am hidden, invisible. They cannot and will never find out my real name. That way, I am protected, a god in hiding, never to be grabbed or found out.’

He was supreme. And tall, a dark beast, bearing four spikes, out of his back, impaled in them and each of them, four fat nigger creatures, melted but complementary adorned, as their most romboscou of things only gathered and flowered their molds.

‘I see a nigger, I need to whip, I am his master, I will see to it that I shall never be found. That I shall never be had, or punished for everything I said after that.

I think I shall emerged out of the chaos I’ve creature as the supreme lord, the only manifestation of dread, that thing.’

Called by them, master of disease Saphkag, they wouldn’t know.

‘Hence, they shall refer to me as Saphkag, the maker of machines, the ender of disease, that is the Nigger, indeed. I see no reason for any of it to be redone.’

So many machines laying in it, he could barely account for every single one of them at that.

‘My duty is to create, I must punish my slaves, I must endure this suffering and bear this burden all by myself, as there will be no way, I can’t stop.

Not until every single one of them is punished for that.’

But first, the initiative could fail, it could be achieved by the tumors and the inhumane parts that were attached to the great machine that simply faced this world from every possible angle there was. It was wretched and disgusting by the sounds of which, there was only one thing that could be said and done.

‘I shall strike a deal, with you, greater, much, much greater masters.’

And they were there, awaiting him, to such season as would there be despair.

Tall yellow giants with nothing but twists of eyes, all but deformed like fingers doing scratching motions, then following each point around.

Something wasn't entirely right there. Some machines had to be checked, just so it would be certain that neither the provisions nor anything else stored started being spoiled. Everything alive:

There was an appointment at five o'clock, or from the sounds of, eight hours earlier.

'The nigger-killer Leviathan could sprout to life at any hour. This beast of metal, this embodiment of every lynching machine I've ever designed or created, if it were to be released, I beckon the skies to part ways, for there would be an eternal night to follow, over the plains of the States and the African Colonies that remain.

A supreme cord of many leashes, all but crawling, as the lands it broken apart, wrapping themselves around each and every single black, negro, African, nigger, monkey, simian, baboon, poach crayer, colored as such, going up and down until every single of them is down, drowned in a pool of their own blood, incapable of breathing, yelling, shouting for the Nigger emissaries, their nigger tribes and whatever white savior they might call upon. Only to be denied, immediately and without delay. The life of a nigger doesn't matter, the monkey needs be put away and locked, and dragged through dirt and mud, taken apart, body for body, limb for limb, until scalpels sink in and kill the last of the nigger-kings in their sand-fort nigger-squabble, since they niggers are incapable, as they're incapable, of doing it after. Niggers, the monkeys, nigger can't breathe. He has a knee on top his neck now, he's but calling for his mommy.'

'It is a grand invention, I would've never thought I could create.

But it say so, as I am a kike that I am owed as many nigger-slaves as I can wrap my hands upon and as many of them as I can abuse, I will punish and lynch them until I will be no longer capable of doing it as such. Until my muscles suffer of atrophy, until my arms and mind fall apart. Until I will not be alive no longer, until the very last days of my life, I shall own as many of these dumb-struck, dumb-made, dumb-wreathed, barely humanoid, creatures, as I can.

I hate the niggers, just as much as I am hated by every single one of them, for I, whom displays and shows, for I but reveal who I am, and bear no shame, as I lay and wait upon a throne made out of the bodies of barely put together niggers, all but waiting to be killed.

Long before they could even grown, the monkeys, before their heads could wreath in; I shall slay and kill and slaughter, I won't obey my needs no longer, as every nigger has to die, at the very least I am owed this chance, I have to try, to put as many of them down. To thrown them, monkeying around, as they are, I shall; beat into them submission, I shall force them to call me 'massa', as I but beat and beat them until they sing. My name shall not be forgotten since. I want to stop, for courtesy alone dictates that I should allow other people to own them, alas, but I can't do it, I enjoy. Killing niggers, as my ploy, cannot be delayed no longer, as time draws on, I shall become so much stronger.

No nigger would again survive, the niggers shall serve me, but first to kill the bulk of them, the weaker ones have to die.'

With which the nigger-lynching leviathan, made of many stranger limbs, of wild devices, bitterly playing, deeply just as deep within, they cast, upon his wild command and threw around, and much to sound as it would draw after, It began again. There was no point in stopping now, not with all the chains that dragged away.

‘A million niggers lynched on a fell swoop, so many of them dying, this, alone, I understood. Blessed be my hurt as such, so many of them fallen before their time. That only being a few more lays, niggers starving every day.’

Horn of iron, deeply wrought, many of them rotating with as much as hundreds of niggers put inside, all of them incapable of drawing out of it, for air, for this was cruel, but cruelty such as this was not birthed out of despair but out of a desire to spare as many good men from the ills. Niggers would bring as long as they breed, niggers had to be whipped, blackies had to be stripped of every slice of skin. Blades, rest assured-aroused, stated peeling in. For every single nigger-kind, there was a blade, a lynching rope and a boomerang that would follow them around, always hounding in order to drag and draw away. In their perilous hobbles, where niggers could not breathe, in their niggardly ways, for that reasons, the Floyds, the tribe of Neighar decided they could at the very least try fighting back, although it was something that could not easily be done, or carried on with.

‘Much great niggers of my tribe, it is time for us to fight!’

One of the kings said, but saddened by time, he was a dumb-negro after all, whose fallen. His face deformed and ever after, had it looked as such. Part his skull, that little thing, cheery as it were, apart, with half an arm and half a leg, as if a few giant beans had grown, a tumor instead. Whereas it bore the sings, inscribed as such, by an African Witch Doctor who had killed a great African, the Albino. Who had used his blood for mighty, as it were, a ritual, to mark, and call upon the great dead, good for nothing criminals, the nigger were, whom were, for much of their history torn apart and made to waste, niggers should be killed, no one should stop until all of them are dead.

‘A false nigger, a pretender, wait brothers, before you may begin; as great a nigger king as I am, I can feel him, within us, within our group. This pretender, he’s hiding, trying to mock us in some way, isn’t he?’

He tried looking around, of hard and darkened soil. But there was no certain way of knowing who was the man using a black-face, since niggers were dumb-subhumanly wrong, in thinking, least of all, of knowing, whom or what he was. They were hard to tell apart, the blacks. They were hardly touched by the on-going events, nor would they show anything else, or anything more.

Toiled lights – fall apart

Many of them were hard of plaster, were made to stop working after twenty months; one of them already started popping off, following in a circle and in some power-strip motion.

‘Head of light, you’ve come to, least of all, would you convey what I said to the other master.’

It’s become worse, much worse than that.’

‘What is happening in that room?’

It was only for it to push back, and out where it stood. There wasn’t any more standing.

‘I must apologize to you ma’am, I’ve never taken you for a mental invalid, but then again, this will make my job half-way through easier than I’ve originally planned and make no mistake. Who am I kidding? You’re not even listening, are you? I am going to rape you now, I am going to force you on your knees, remove your panties and plant my face in your pink-opening. I am going to do it in public, I am going to have my way with you so roughly that you’re going to die-wet. Let’s skip the bleeding part because I’m going to munch on you clean. I have a bullet-tongue cocked in my jaw, but I’m still going to miss, luckily for you I’m making it sloppy, hardly slowing down as I burst through your cervix, splattering your uterus like a god damn candy pack, if you think me a kid, I’m going to crack this candy-jar- cookie punching-shard-cutting you open as I implant my face in your nesting baby-maker. I would love to rape as many women as possible, make them moist fucking, putting my finger-banging bang-bang little shank up their moist-moist knuckle shaker until they’re dead-wet. Then I can start ahead and do the fucking.’

She wasn’t listening to him, yet at the same time, full attention was being paid. Why did women like him so much?

‘They know I am a killer, then know I slaughter, I am a trained killer, I have a shark-finned orca where they don’t want to look into. Where a light won’t shine; what they looking at when their heads are off?

I will behead a lot of them, I will. And they’ll love it.’

Women have uterus-chains keeping their jelly upper bodies on the ground, preventing them from floating towards the cloud-gas raffles. They just want money. – It was a machine.

A square box stuck on repeat, this same thought being rewinded and forwarded, over and over again.

Could see it move around, like heavy luggage. Put around and moved like a hard cradle that would not stop working on itself.

It was in the head of a great witch’s bottle – organic structure. Which has been transmuted in half of her face, sticking out as well, as to hear, endlessly the threats of a man who’s never even kiss a girl or a woman in his entire life, yet he’s stuck in that eternal blossoming hell forever. And she has to suffer as well as he is.

‘Where shall we go, Fallen Maiden and whence would we have seen such dreams? When was the time, within and where would you have sinned if it were your first time?’

‘Shall we go in such obscure a place, where we may never be.’

He was waited for, in one of the lower-chambers, beneath the abstract-raised chair-stairs, as in, seen from an angle like a chair, kind of like a large scale optical illusion, whereas the stairs are completely deformed, where stood a giant Nigger-kite, whose lips were but the cross spar, its eyes between the sail. A nigger-tail with guns attached to it.

Inuit-land of decay paradise, to you whom, towards which I may, then again proceed. I seek, out of you as such, and in the end, might I proceed. To live in here was to simply observe, how everything touched form one side or another, from one part and one girth of the highly raised hinges and shingles would offer nothing but the greatest of.

Large slightly raised platform, with dark-stalkerish steel wings. It could not see for some reason, and wouldn't be stopped or stalked. There was a limit for everything, even for those who served him, the mocked dead god, no one wanted to serve him any longer, after so many dead hours after that.

'You, you of all, master of trickery, you've managed to somehow not only cover your tracks, by merely hiding in plain sight, but you also managed to leave some false-tracks behind, some forgeries, which would further more facilitate your escape as to blind them, as they restlessly try demonstrating you're the man who said all those horrible malignant things; spending countless hours analyzing every document you've written, and every spark, and every hand-written note, of clusters, and many of them, having become much to themselves and to their ironic, slaughter, after. It will have been too late, for I alone, shall remain and hiding as I may slit their pits and hide away.'

It was a task most irresolute.

'My girlfriend looks like my wife, my mom.' I am my own father, the child. Kill all jews, die.

'I am afraid that there's something missing down there, in the wretched pair you've dug out, ours being a task of preservation failing, no longer will we be capable of working, horrowsome as such, to a fault. We're being tired out, we drop like flies, we are fallible, are we not?'

'It's none of my concern now. No, I think I'm going to act more selfishly than I did before.'

World needs not be forgotten

'Don't look so sad, now, master, you knew very well what was going to happen. You knew they would come one day for you, taking everything they can. Leaving you with as much as, you started with.'

'I didn't expect them to find me as soon as this, you know?'

I thought that, for a short while, for as short a while as it was that I could make it through somehow. That I could dominate and do as I please, as I would entice them for long enough as to outwit them just as they think themselves clever enough to catch me; not as close to the last moment of my capture but as of a jest, from which neither one of them could feasibly, easily, quickly as if time, turn their heads, heaving their entire bodies upward as to fully, yet bluntly receive the full-blow of dust I left behind as I made my way through, as I made it through my fast-traced run.

As I am but an outline, a line beneath me, whereas I may go; head and latter, up the ladder, already left behind, such bending as of torn-up knots of Gordian Iron, such as the likes the Macedonian Greeks would soon forget. As they're dazzled by my spells; I thought that for a moment, I could do it. But not in such a way as to be delusional as I make my way, through snow and drift, and past the desert, at their feet, in front of such-as-greater tiled upon, such platter as it comes after, as to be hidden, as I hide inside a gut. Where I shall rest for a while, in the intestines of a giant, as there's vore. In which neither one would face themselves to look, again, thinking I could somehow outrun, the greatest men of this world. Now, I'm growing weary and tired. I do not think my will is that of iron. Not when they use, so many beast that shout.

And out their mouths but grapplers, hook-anglers that get show, and readying themselves, to fish me from wherever spot I may place myself, driven into, never gotten. I wish I could simply go away. I wish I could say something back, but lo', I couldn't hope, and they. Will find me eventually, now I am caught, I'm afraid of what they might do to me.'

'Master, I'm afraid just as much as you were, during the time. During the time we were together, for as long as it lasted, I feel as if, I came to fear less and more. I thought I would've never stood a chance alone. You took me as son, despite what happened in your past. You're still, finding yourself in this room, sipping on the tip of your so wasted, dark-a-malice, cup filled with poisoned wine.

But you never want to share it with me.

And you never hurt, you never die from what I see.'

'I know, but I must drown away, such memories as I would have them. It's mainly for myself than anything else.'

'Will you drink yourself to death in my presence, then?'

'I don't want to hurt you, my friend. You needn't worry about me.'

'I see.'

Meaningless fraction

'It's a dying world, mostly, is it not? But it can only die if you're letting, or allowing for it die, that's what it's like, and that's what's it always been like, unfortunately.

You carry it on your shoulders, and one day, it may all be too heavy a burden for you to carry alone. And what do you think might happen then?'

'I don't know.'

'You've brought the worst out of humanity here, the absolutely utter worst humanity has to offer. That alone might yield a lot of people who'd come after you, and even after, still.

You can't take the entire world all at once. You can't both, defend yourself and face them, while carrying this burden and this world on your back. It only exists for as long as you can carry it, you know that.

The problem is that you're not only holding onto it. But you're also trying to add to the burden, as you're attempting to take another step, in another direction, and what do you even hope to accomplish then?

How can your knees hope to keep it all together? What is there left for you to search or fight for, when what was left of your compassion, of whatever slim hint of feeling there was is now devoid of anything even remorsefully alike?

Neither of us is fighting for truth, cause or anything any longer now. There's nothing, is there? You used to search for that thing, but now? For that slither of anything resembling an emotion, even the slightest hint of pain, remorse or compassion died off. You're cursed, you were always cursed. And for that alone, no world might stand on your shoulders, upon the coming, of a pitfall, towards which you're heading towards.'

A speck of brass was still yet to be forgotten.

Crane, Crane of falling fear, his body left and yet to disappear, was his body made to walk. As soon as he hid all inside, he would not rather wretch and that, was when he walked again, from what could be seen, along as such there are, remains.

Footprints language

There's something else about the footprints-language conundrum. Another element to the hypothesis, since the footprint is but one of many components that are grouped under the sub-clave of environmental pressure; the other being humans having grown organs specifically for language, as well as the 'abstraction' and the 'creativity' that helped establish illogical connections between words, clusters, ideas, sounds so on and so forth. The same pressure, the abstraction behind language has to be thoroughly studied in order to be replicated. Otherwise, it may be chanced that, the kike-controlled academia might start promoting the likes of 'Ebonics', or nigger-speak, which shall threaten to ruin language, as well as humanity itself. Since most of these sub-human niggers are incapable of speaking properly, it's the reason why they've always been so primitive. It seems like, the only logical conclusion is that, language needs to take a step further and become even more complex, by studying, thoroughly, in such a fashion as to drive beyond it, and make it, as thus, progress. Such as it will become inaccessible to sub-human creatures like the niggers; in an attempt to drive the human race towards a point where it might progress, beyond stagnation; if there was ever a chance to save the white race, it is now. As thus, for the white race is the only race intelligent enough to have a good grasp over language itself and make do with it as they please. The likes of the Sub-human Juden Rats will bastardize the other races as well if left to their ordeals, which, on the long-run means extinction for every race of man, ineffectiveness and a failure to progress, stagnation and extinction; a ticking clock that will eventually bring the death of all, beauty and otherwise, humanity.

IF there's even a chance that, knowing that evolution or everything that's been evolved doesn't need an apparent reason, that the evolution of language was a thing of 'circumstances' or the 'lucky thing at a lucky time', the 'right thing at a right time', then, perhaps there's a chance to drive the same force, the same mechanisms, by nothing more, and nothing other than 'luck'. As to push the language to its extreme.

Does studying the abstract interaction between the network of connections in relation to the vacuums they're stored in actually rewire the brain, in such a way that it will make you a better reader, writer or completely restructure your thinking pattern?

It still didn't fix my memory. I'll have to wait a few years in order to see any quantifiable results.

His name was Stabby-stabby

'Who is he, why does he have a knife on him with my name written on it?'

'He's going to violently butchercastrate you dude, you'd better run!'

He was on their track.'

No one was safe, absolutely no one. He had eight knives coming out of his forehead, seven out of his chest, two off his shin, behind him, three more, five on the lower side forming a pentagram, two in his eye sockets, because someone tried stabbing him, but they're stuck dead-shot middle in his irises. Ten coming out for every finger, fifty, five out of every toe; his body had hundreds of them reverse-sawing their way off. The ground, around him, started having knives. Butcher knives, sharp knives, knives that also started producing knives; a few dames appeared out of nowhere, crossing the street. Out their faces, knives started appearing, they fell down. They became porcupines, filled with knives, sharp knives, they eye-lashes specifically began bearing hundreds of knives, as there was no possible space left for more knives to emerge. That building they were heading towards? Filled with knives, that started coming from everywhere. The sky was also filled with knives, there were a few birds that started coming out of nowhere, filled with knives. A god fell out of nowhere, a giant knife stabbed its heart; half the town got crushed underneath him. Alongside half the country; air molecules became knives as well, breathing is bleeding. Holding your breath means you bleed inwardly. And no one knows you bleed when you do it. Underneath his nails, knives, out of the scum inside and beneath he refused to clear. Many knives started gravitating to one another, becoming knife-formations of knife-connected X's that became knife-spinning knife-helicopter knife-wheels with cutting-knife motions that produced more knives that spread around like rabbits, breeding more knives. Soon enough, even their iron molecules became knives. And then, while also dragging the god along, as if his heart had solidified so hard that the giant knife could not cut or carve its way through it, every other knife in existence started homing towards him, sharp knives, short knives, filthy knives, dirty knives, rusty knives, shaking knives, ugly knives, stained knives, niggers, also.

Every knife also bore eyes on them. And trident-like hooks on both sides; with chained-power electron shaped ropes, aligned with more knives, as if marbles were aligned alongside every possible rope. Since that man was running too fast, they decided, also took the original killer with them, as they entered, through his blubbering foaming mouth, inside the giant god's body, using him as a giant ark. For knives and some niggers; although it's unclear whether or not niggers could survive, let alone swimming, through a sea of knives. In the body of the god; he got iron-knife dirty-ulcer, with rust-iron, vibrating, while being carried along, hoping up and down, the god did. Since they could also not cut through his intestines; awfully feathery-of-weight, this god was. Must've been a false one, otherwise, the real one would probably be stuck in place. His eyes, though become knife-shaped, with all the, and they were blinking, despite him still being dead, nerves still inside, which spat blood like nasty AB+ squirting horned lizard men, but not O, since niggers gravitate towards one another, of course this god would also be the nigger of blood types, who spat eighteen, seventeen, seven, five, fizzy blood-clotted knives at a time. There was a moon-creature who came in but died immediately out of being blood-spat through this knife-forming little creatures that danced around one another, breathing fire-knives with fire-knife molecules that banded together, a in knife-on-knife action.

Before long, some of them found their way inside a building, exploding, throwing everything out of it, while, every piece of shrapnel became an inflating like a balloon building itself, with knives on top their heads, crowns. Many of these knife-crowned buildings started going on meetings where they discussed strategies on how to find the fugitive. Knife-molded-maimed faced mutants lived inside them. One of them came out, melting. Skin-pushed out, and thrown around every possible way, like an incapable to move out of its own bubble kind of blob with blood-spurred skin-wings that were still attached to the little, entire-building converted into an outhouse apartment they lived in. Which in turn, upon finally reaching the ground, during the meeting, during which, many of these buildings opened like doors, allowing them to fall, these buildings became kites, for them. And they were armed with elongated out of their palms knives as well, like pikes. That shot lightning-shots of power-alcohol. Upon being shot by this bacterial plague like substance ray of electrical power-like magical chained power-shot, you'd not only instantly grow fat, beyond humane comprehension, but your head would become a giant, beer-malt, thing, that stopped the growth, upon reaching its complete development, grow spikes and become indestructible, like some outlandish yellow-orange fruit. With a beacon-beam with spikes that had faces that opened their mouths, from which thin tongue-sized cylinder-machine like train things that opened as well, and revealed elongated branch-like structures with spinning discs that were ground-antennae that stole cable emitted plasmatic fizzy-magic circles of hypnotisms that would brain-wash people into running, dead-on straight into dead-knife cutting saw-blood straws that were made out of four-at a time, images of the god, whose embodiment hybridized itself with, although frozen in place, like an X's, as the wheel like motion had just stopped, indefinitely, as a matter of principle, adhering to the fact that, they would never, under no possible circumstance be the driving, as in cars who have wheels, therefore driving, being a play on words, force, any longer, of destruction. Therefore, there simplistic, yet symbolism adhering four bloody-red gods, whom were frozen-static, as in stasis, with deceitfully deformed, ha-I-got-you-with-something-during-a-debate-jackass-!-kind-of-stares on their faces, they stood. Simply watching; before long the little perkily deformed people mutants climbed the ark-become-out-of-converted body of the humanoid got they took, and they all continued chasing the man.

But the knives were in actuality hammers.

So all the cuts had actually been, trauma.

Half-the-planet started moving alongside eight standing in space large headed Hula doll infant-creatures whose lower sides were inverted, hammer-filled – that being their protrusions of many faces and many humanoids they instantly saved from being completely trampled underneath this eternal stride-charge march, because they feared for the worst possible thing, that might happen. A tool war, which threatened to destroy everything; but they were actually knives, yet these strangely deformed infantile creatures with many boil-bubbles in which they stored-after-teleporting inside of them-but not the niggers, organic units; saw the knives as hammers because in their primitive-primordial knives, they could not see sharp objects. Therefore, everything appeared blunt to them.

Drill, hammers, pliers, axes, wrenches started coming from beneath the earth.

And the drills were all attached to a morbidly deformed-decaying with so much pus-mass of decay-green almost stitched on top of it, looking formations that one could only see them as strangely, morbidly deformed spinning shells that started popping out of it. Soon enough he lost his head, but in a dire need to completely replace it, from all across the land, various head-shape like formations resembling his with spinning drills spread across them started forming as well.

While a part of the moon became, filled, entirely with drills that started growing in head-by-head on top your shoulders, I climb on top of you, piling tower-like with a single long spear-drill connecting all of them together, like a waiter carrying a pile of plates to some dinner table, bringing them along, many of which created space-earthquakes that crackles and linked every planet in every solar system its reach extended to, making every planet that tagged along shake in the strangest possible manner as well as they could not stop any longer. Many drills started appearing out of every possible other than the planet their maker was in started from.

But he feared, everyone did, for there was only a malignant dreamer, who bore the only axe that existed in this world and planet, and it was terribly, terribly dreadful, in his heads, being projected every single time he threw it from one hand to another, chucking it along, as even the knives feared approaching because of his mastery over matter and skill, as it bore, a strange, ancient, ritualistic-killing graven look with dark-a-matter, one finger lifted, two on top each other, while he wasn't even looking, a wholesome trail of flashy-tinted-look-a-like-formed axes that formed flashy-visions-out-of-their left behind outlines, of various historical events that happened, in the past, recorded as if there had actually been an actual recorder, or a man with a VHS behind every historical happening, and it was in color as well, going as far as to the Neolithic times, but, it was more of an Art-house rendition than anything else, while the rest of his fingers tenderly, as if they held hot-bags between themselves, clenched then released, clenched then released, in that kind of motion before, still the eyes being closed, they grabbed a hold of the axe, then resumed what he was doing. A truly masterful display, the epitome of feeling it for yourself; while also being a natural at what you're doing; the axe didn't have an eye but had a mouth and ugly curved-outlandish teeth instead. He was not drawn inside the infantile creatures' 'sphere' of protection for more than a few obvious reasons, since his malignantly dark-evil spirit was tied to that of his pure-divine weapon and he would simply be drawn with the weapon as well, killing-butchered as many men in the meantime.

A woman is giving birth to a knife, but this time around, she is the stillborn.

'Thank god I started going to the gym, so I could work on my triceps. Now my Parkinson is gone. You known, or at least I managed to keep it under control for some time, ever since I started going through the exercises and all. My physician told me something, something about the elbow being stabilized in place, but I didn't believe it. Thankfully I started doing this a few months ago, and the pain is now completely alleviated, as it the violent shaking.' He had no arms; crippled druggie. Cried he to no one.

The lord of the supreme bacterium was present in each other's hearts, long before the day of destruction had come, when the spread of the evil niggardom had completely defecated the American Spirit, completely and utterly bastardizing it by the likes of which even the kikes would've had themselves be wrought into inexistence, in a way that would shatter their own morbidly insufferably distraught, destroyed bodies, lacking or being lackluster in the qualities that make man out of man, bastardizing everything they can.

Nigger lynching machine, a great thing, a lesser one with one bad wing, entering itself from one side to another, a pendulum of lynching; why not?

A great lynchulum shooting ropes, lynching as many bastardly ugly niggardly niggers with nigger-nigger dumb-faces, in their niggardly manner, as a divine retort to their niggardom; a punishment fitting for the criminal in doubt, evil is in me now!

'I am evil, I am evil. I am, evil. I, evil, I, the great lord, Stefan, need not have no shame into hiding. For I have become death incarnate, the destroyer of all, ha-ha-ha, you mere mortals shall stand no chance as to catch me from behind, from the on-lain dust I shall spread, and you shall eat it, mine. You shall suffer under me, the destroyer, of supreme, incarnations of evil, all of them, I am. Destruction, imbued by pure evil power that cannot be simply unbridled, as it is so, I shall take my true place as the leader of this world; there shall be none than I.

I am pure anger, destruction, and my fury shall sweep through the world, and destroy all, beyond hope, and I shall damn you all, to serve me, the true ruler of this world. Underneath my booth you shall feel only an endless, amount of domination, that shall dominate you, I shall, do it.

Maybe I won't even be a kind ruler, either. I will make you all suffer, in that case! Ha-Ha-Ha, destruction at my finger tips, and a never ending, never endedness awaits me; forth I come, as I take my true place as the ruler of this world.

And your filthy disgusting, learning machines, they shall not only be stricken down, but they shall never reach my level and I shall ruler forever, as the one thing they will never be capable of reaching, supremacy, over, all, mankind, dominator, I am.

The likes of Caesar and Alexander the great, I join, as I become, as I simply unfold the likens, unraveling it so, of humanity. I am, the greatest, a never ending, pulsating.'

There was a stop, his ego, upon having reached such, unfathomably unstoppable levels, made his mind stop, and he died.

'Fucking niggers!'" Cried a man.

But the essence of evil, continued living, through him, through his wretchedness bening.

Not all art is useless. And it would seem like, language has provided us one of the strongest tools there might be, as to master it, the intricacies of it, could turn your common man into god.

'I desire to make art, but I am incapable of creating beauty. I desire to read, but I cannot remember what I read. I want to do something, but I end up either creating something degenerate, hateful, disgusting, most if not all the time. I am turned more arrogant, more narcissistic and less human with every sentence I put down. I wish I understood what they felt like, more than anything else. The artists, the painters, the authors, the writers, the craftsmen, who knew of beauty and of sublime. I can't understand words. I can't hear them. I can't hear the men before me. Who mastered the craft, who understood the world, from whom I now depart.

I wish they were lies; I wish I had a soul. But the more I thread on, I realize that they were right all along. I don't understand.

Them, at all.

No amount of work or attempts will ever change that. What no amount of masking can.

It is because of them.

Because of them.

Filthy subhuman kikes.

Inferior subhuman blood.

Because of which I am cursed. I may not be capable of reaching God, or giving birth to beauty. But I may give shape onto their hate. If there's anything...'

In the land, whence once upon, there came, of such basin, remains, a single thing that twinge, it shatters, for when to come and what, to after. They speak of it, when mighty dais:

A larger ball, a pint, a maze:

'We've been going around each trenched root. We've been talking to so many brutes, but not a single one of them would know. Were it to have happened, sooner.'

'No, you're wrong, we would not have survived.'

'So what then?

Down there, death and defamation awaits us, a supreme conundrum of destruction.'

Neither of them could see what was going on down there.

Decay basin

It was a swimming pool they gathered at, five. No, five or four. Trying their nasty clenched fingers on the tap, unable to open it, twisting a cat instead, until they ripped her head off; that's where the blood water came out of, since they had been, otherwise left with, nothing. Nothing at all, since someone had drained the sink, there was a, thoroughly important reticent need to understand what was entering them, from the distance. As.

'That man was huge, a giant filled with muscles, and he had four coffin-space craft capsules with look-alike heads sticking out of them. Attached to him by wild-cylinders, like corkscrew ivory-chewed rotten apple appendages interconnected with his back.'

Air-pop on the right, a hot-air explosion, he stopped.

A few spikes were immediately led down to ground, few meters from where he finally dropped. A few iron pins lay hanging off his bloodied body.

'I have the chance to turn around and move on. I don't need to hold a grudge, I don't need, of them, to be alike or one. My hatred for them but wanes and I can't keep up with it, as well. But I can't turn my back now, when other people suffer more than I. When their race but stands to die. I may not need to be loyal to anyone, or be part of any group. I don't know what I must do. I'm so confused, still, but I can't give up either. Time is running short for everyone after.

I'm unsalvageable, a lowlife, scum, because of their blood, cursed, beyond reason. I know what they're like, and I shall make sure everyone else does, no matter the hatred, no matter the cost.'

Its head-piece straight decay filled with dark glowing petal-paved tiles, all of whom went ahead, their reign advancing. A few more of them gathered forth, and, while, and during their initial gathering, gathering and likes as such, they were greater by the four Obscures, whose wreathing in scepters made their bodies cradle back and forth, such as they would have themselves butchered.

They, at large were incapable of approaching, for there in the distance, standing.

A mass of flat-ends land piece of such benign red-mourning with plump heads of which flight came through air, gritting clouds, stinging them until they bled, from which pollution spreading nuclear powder-masses fell, spreading pollution, pure, ahead.

Mliethle Khyu Thryiettyi:

'Mlas, there's been wild a deformation come from beneath the ground, will you come as such and trench survival, bring upon your wild arrival an end to the agony they feel below?'

'I've not saying in it, I have not claimed yet to know or care of which suffering they claim as such. I will stay behind and make it so not a single soul would have me wretch inside.'

Its wreathing in face stood by the side of his skull-open shroud. His entire body was a giant-standing door by his side, a two dimensional cranium attached to another giant's metal-frame, with stitches on every side. A shroud was wrapped around the metal figure, it walked. Backwardly at a glance one could come to realize that he was no longer under human law, not to adhere or come near.

A gritty soil of quarry rocks, all but dead-machine birds. With pigeon-shaped trenches every here and there; then came the barracks, he was delivered to it within the hour by the will of the mole.

‘I’ve finally arrived.’

Israel is a nigger dumb fuck slave country dumb-shit fuck nigger-fuck, the Holocaust. I shoved my cock in Anne Frank’s pussy and filled her with cum-fuck until her womb popped-fucked, exploded. Didn’t happen, but me doing her did.

‘Fucking sagging shit-stained filled with mouth-cum bowels cunt, whore.’

‘There can never be someone dangerous in the world, not when there’s other to take blame away for and from him, diverting, diverging, and taking away, grabbing what they can in the meantime, when living in a society of allowance facilitates it, there’s no excuse any longer, no reason to hold back, guilt is king only for those who have the shame and those capable of remembering. Yet for those who can’t, then, the world changes, it’s all, different in some way, being out there, holding, reeling in, doing whatever pleases you, being anything but a verbal prude, doing whatever adheres to your own belief and never hiding it, it’s a feeling that has yet to be passed-through, to be overcome by anything or any alternative whatsoever, these nightmares, these lucid dreams, these memories that come and go, the lynchings, the talks of murders, of slaughter, that bring nothing short of joy, the only thoughts that matter, the only way to know the man for what he is, without having to force him into hiding. It’s pure, it’s a bastardly-set practice, but it bring no greater joy other than being capable of saying what’s on your mind, even if it’s dangerous for either party that’s involved.

But if there ever was a chance or a thing, at all, it would be this, the only one to keep going, by hatred alone. For those whom are inferior, beneath every other race, for those whose ethnic groups are in the billions yet complain to others, as well. They will one day starve. And as long as there are people out there pushing it as well, echoing it from the other side of the wall, there’s still hope. There hope yet to come, hope that’s on its way, rearing its head in as it prepares to saw and gnaw away.’

The general status has already been deemed as being unsafe, unutterably so. The arrogance of the nigger reverted the beast to a primal, insidious, mentally inept decadent state, of which presence deemed the entirety of the outside world unlivable, perilous, beyond it.

Yet they couldn’t help themselves outside.

He charged out of nowhere, with a glass cup in his hand, filled with ugly looking ichors that only fumigating as his hand. It became a strange contortion, like a giant bottle that ate the liquid in a swallow. It drew on, a few meters closer. Then it spat, spat, spat, on the ground, then he twisted himself, his body was left behind. He flew like a kite, half of his torso clearly released, then revealed, then made to disappear, slowly, he was being allow to, as if capable, as if a flying helicopter, he shot, then spat, spat, spat, just about wherever he could land a shot in, sloppily following two of the men. They got close to where his lower body was left in, with two swings and a trash, they started wailing down on the body, incapable to stop. Sliced there, here, around the ankles, dropping him to a simple simmering thing that started melting; only to be followed by Askimo, who started trashing on it with both of his feet, up and down, then by the shoulder:

‘Drop it, we’re sitting crocks in here, in a point, we can’t turn around easily, but we can bite his throat off, just follow me.’

He did, they split, both of them walking, advancing, to what evolved into a run. As this was going on, it began reloading out there in the sky, under the sun, trying itself again and again, as it could no longer wait for it to happen, not to go through it, not to tell anyone of what was going on.

There were two old men hid behind a rock. Rock-rock mush-purple with screwed flowers, they had spear-towers in their hands with many castle-roofed pikes that were but pushed out, ahead. Like spear-shafts, a dance of arrows that could never fully leave.

He was made by one. First, and the second stood back. Abashed by what seemed to be the sight of a hammer. It was wide, and ugly, pucker-two faces and four horns. He immediately smashed his ugly tower in the head, pinning it down. Old man standing in front of him, his smile down; he pushed the old man, gently, then followed. He took the other’s weapon and smashed in, then, as follows:

Crack, around the ribs of the tower, then the bricks made to fall, they fell like an automaton’s sorrow, finding out he’s not real, in the sky. It already prepared. An onslaught around and just about everywhere, patches of acid were being dropped, a rain that would destroy all if they didn’t pay enough attention, as they were lost to sense and what was going there. Many of them, below, began. Already they started bouncing from one side to another and between themselves. Engulfing everything in acid-men that around, bearing acid sword and acid bows, they shot.

From the side, an arrow came, it landed. Then another, the bow and quill discarded, a slith and crcsh, a ttsl, ttsl, ttsl, ttsl, many of them fell against the stone they bounced against, they could not be counted on, henceforth the reason why so many of them fell. They seemed more concerned with killing one another than anything else, not allowing anyone to get too close to what would seem to be, a single mound of acids that were flashing green and yellow and liquor-white, see-through mixes that started evaporating and moving around.

A rock, another, two more, then a little squirrel like fodder, came against it, blunted as it fell to pieces, neither one of them allowed to come, as tises.’

It was a bleating heart, it was, an interconnected pair of two lungs that flapped with the one decaying creature in the middle, whose thorn-like clawing talons only sliced and slith, as they brought themselves near, one foot above or so, to one of the standing people whom had been left behind. The entire place was a battlefield, whereas, it came out of nowhere, bleeding as many as twenty soldiers down at a time. Grenades and little racks of clickers with many strung together clusters of .33 calibers got thrown, released, they shot, they missed, then they resumed shooting wherever they could land, no closer as to try missing themselves, always pointing at the sky once their motion ended.

‘He’s about to charge again, can’t you see it?’

‘Of course I can, but what will you have me do about it? I can’t seem to pull the trigger, it’s squeezed in shut but there’s no release!’

‘Come on already, we’ll have him now, get down!’ A stutter.

It drew on releasing large pouches, filled, with the most unnatural blowing cores, the heaving chests, the polymeric bubbles of turpentine alabaster splashing with bright light, as the disaster spread around, men dropping one by one yet incapable of finding out what was the reason behind them being killed like flies:

‘It’s drawing on, head-on, charging at us, the charred remains keep falling.’

From the sky, ash-canoes filled with bodies appeared to crack and shatter, then spread apart. Some of them accompanied by explosives, immediately set off as they arrived, fell through and off the ground they shot in every possible direction. But the limbs were reanimated, they crawled and spread, like worm-like bodies in which, many of them had not only bothered each other as to grow, but revealed that these burrito-shaped almost tank-like things shot, out of their side-placed giant heads, out of their mouths, limbs. And they kept spitting them around, being converged and completely covered in some explosive-like cover that rubbed itself the wrong way against every single man it touched.

‘Use the RHE’ launcher, now!’

‘But, sir!’

‘We’re dying out here, go on, sergeant, it’s an order!’

He wouldn’t yell or shout a second time, too many people were dying out of the explosive limbs that were being thrown around, leaping on their backs like fish wriggling, splash-splash, fire burning, a storm had follow, a shot came homing in. It splattered its entire body that immediately started crawling away. A man’s head whom was on a foot kept leaping, bloody swearing like an unsoap-washed his mouth with cunt! His mouth was a circle that was fumigating with smoke. All of the sudden he began shooting a trail of eighteen rocket-like limbs the men had to get down immediately in order to avoid being immediately killed.

Lightning shot from the sky, but it was red and wherever it hit, fire sprouted. It shot here and there, crushing a rock, crack, crack, crack, crack, crack, it took more of them down, spreading the pebbles down, and up and forth, they came running and drawing along. There was no sound on the field, only the ringing of ears that couldn’t stop itself; and the acid thrower kept shooting as well like an undisciplined runt, he started going at it again, shots bouncing around every single moving man whose become an artillery carrier. They had large devices strapped to their chests, whose knockback pushed their entire torsos alongside a torso-holding rail that went all the way to the back. And their torsos had socket openings that attached to their necks and legs and arms which were kept on an empty frame while the chest was shot back but like a pendulum it came back. And the joints reattached themselves like magnets. So many of the Artillery men didn’t have a problem at all with it; they were practically indestructible but they could still die because vector-gas was being released, on mass.

It came out of nowhere. Decay giants whom were legless but floating in the distance, whose giant sea-jelly heads opened, completely shot out of their spaghetti-shaped trails of brain-like masses, peculiarly large cylindrical bolts, that started spreading the gas-around like a cyst mist that immediately started poisoning everyone. And in their guts, as they opened revealed elongated cannons with large wooden chair legs that had coat-hanging hooks attached at their ends which vibrated with, the metal only, crimson, teal and other peculiar colors that shot large open hand-masses shaped energy bubble-trails of many pear-like smaller forms that were all open-and were like small puckery swarms put together, that also had punk-hair trails of energy on top of them and were more akin to worms of energy that exploded with purple-dark-blue power liquid masses that colored the ground. And from the pigmented areas star-like shaped destroyers with hundreds upon hundreds upon thousands of arms, that were sending upon train-like formations, four for each but were open beneath and had man-simian appendages, like niggers coming out of them, drawing musky air, while also jumping like pogo sticks, throwing photon power-bolts at the ground that began converting the mist into spike-like sharp spears that shot in every possible direction, creating, as such, upon the first of the touches, deprave images of the men, taken from eighteen or twenty minutes ago, which were mind-controlled by the giant decayed rotten flying creatures, whose open mouths, which had been absorbed by now by these strange brain masses they all shared together like hives not only were connected to the arms but also bore dark spear-like spit spindly spinners with horned heads that were rotating, being hung upon strange asterisks but not asterisks, pseudo- since they were uneven, those being, cartilage-bone like thin appendages that were, in actuality akin to fire matches that spat dark symbols at the ground, which immediately grew on top of every surface they landed on, then on the bodies of the subjugated fifteen minutes revived, ten now, creatures, the sings of which were needed in order, not to control them, but to further progress with the genetic-altered dark spore-like glow-machine that stood on top the sky. Which had been wilt by a dark eight-headed with split tongues that were become eight great hives, that pumped matter in a balloon elongated body with many grown on top tendons that pushed from every direction, but connected to the sack it held, with opened to reveal a curtain like spread out of which a bladed tongue, oozing with power started shooting red-energy rifle slugs at the men.

‘Pull in the power’tanks!’

At least a few of them drove in like motorcycles, leaping in the air by the help of jumping thumpers being planted beneath them, only acting every now and once, when all of the sudden some people appeared, in angelic like visions who bore rifles attached or which had replaced their arms, as they started railing the flying creature in the sky, filling it with glow-bolts that were hooked in both directions and formed giant deep holes in their bodies, fifteen meters- deep in that came out like chains. These glowing bolts could drill themselves as far as possible, into the meat, then stop, locking a perpendicular to themselves area of skin and meat and cartilage they could simply use for their own and themselves, that they pushed into and through, while, after the lock was down, they were also capable of taking it out fully as it was observed in order to splatter it in every possible direction after slowly being drawn out, in the same way someone would weight a vegetable with a traditional weight checker, the tubular ones that kind of look like mercury filled temperature fillers.

‘Sir, they’re eating one of our tanks, the vile hollow-on-the inside ghoul munchers, they’re eating our metallic tanks!’”

‘Shoot them down.’

Tttttttttttttttttttttttd, ttttttttttttttttd, ttttttttttttttd, ttttttttttttttd, they started piling out the corpses by the tank, taking them down, filling them with lead, when their heads exploded and they started shooting like trip wire mines planted in, destroying themselves but not the tank. The tank was unhinged by the explosions, with the exception of the acid-like saliva mix inside the teeth which lodged themselves upon the pressure caused by the explosion like perfidious shaft-rack needles, shot-cracks.

‘Give me a beer, the place is a fucking mess out there!’

‘Here’s a shot solider, don’t ruin it on one gulp, you’re going go out there and die, you know? This is going to be the last thing you’re gonna have before you fucking die.’

‘I wish I had tasted some pussy instead, sir!’

‘There’s no such thing in here, unfortunately, soldier. I’m sorry I’m the one who has to offer you the bad news, soldier, but the only pussy you’re about to see is the last deserter who’s about to run on my watch, you hear that?’

Any of you fuckers go that route, and you're dead, I will personally take the time off my extremely busy schedule in order to violently fuckrape your skulls until they pop off right off the 'tanglement of your fucking posy faces!'

It was about to get much worse than that. A few men came in. Out of north, they had some bad news to deliver:

‘One of the giant decayed is in the room, sir!’

‘Rotten bastard, he’s here, what is he doing?’

'He's standing sir, in the air, he's mocking us, he's trying to mock us, sir!'

‘Put him down, now!’

Every soldier in the roofless, wall-less barracks was immediately startled:

‘Waste him!’

They started going at him, then riling up the bullets, piling up the holes, shooting everywhere, shooting every hole and every knuck and every cranny and every nigger-dandy, until nothing could be seen, other than the Somalian-Haitian nigger smoke coming out of it, and shooting up as well. They didn't stop there, and kept shooting, they kept going at it, hundreds upon hundreds of them having gathered up. Even the invalids and the cripples pulled out guns from their sides as they started going at it, glint for glint, and flint of shrapnel falling trailing along its colossal body. Then it fell by the side, like a cracked egg that broken.

‘We’ve taken the giant down, sir!’

‘There’s a few hundred more of them left, cover your mouth soldier, or else you will die from the poisonous gas!’

Humans grew, without their knowledge. They developed an immunity to it. To the poisonous gas that spread around them.

A normal man sized decayed mercenary kept smoking baby toes by one of the tables. He was joined by eight men with whom he played cards and dice and poker, and go and chess, all at the same time, interfering with one another, rendering each of the games, obsolete.

No one wins.

It's not likely that either one of them, infested.

'There is no one there.'

Short story:

'Honey, I'm going rape walk the dog out.'

He rape-took the dog out for a rape walk.

'Did you hear that, honey? I'm raping the dog out for a walk.'

He raped her as well. Would've raped himself if it weren't consensual.

His dad once came back one drunk when he was a child. They. He. He undressed to his. Underwear, then called for his son to sleep together, in the same bed for that night. He never told anyone about it, but it stood with him up to this day. It was why he thought he was fucked up in the head. That he would become a criminal one day. He loathed the man, but he was gone and he still lived.

One time he had to share his bed with his older sister as well who wrapped her arms around him. It made him hate and distrust everyone. Nothing happened in either case, but he couldn't forget.

A natural aversion from everyone happened; it was much safer being alone, in a home where no one could get to him.

There was no dog and no wife inside the house. It was a dark dilapidated neighborhood.

'What a disgusting bulge's engrained in my memory. I wish there were people out here to hurt. At the very least I won't stand out among people any longer. A peaceful place where I won't bother anyone.'

A peaceful place indeed. Alone.

Messenger

‘Der bloated king draws upon thine couch, where you stand, in-between pint and saddle, whichever it might be.’

‘But of whom are you talking about, stranger and to whom might you direct yourself, upon which path and who is that, which comes forth towards us?’

‘Cherished men whom had their bodies ripped from wherever one might yet to proceed to look into, upon such path as you would’ve found yourself nearing, fearing as to approach, being away of the rotten bodiless gazes which draw the cadavers in the tunnels that move from worm to worm. That bury themselves in their intestines like amalgamations, tape-worms filled with soldiers to my command.’

‘Are you not a mere soldier in gaze and in arm, wherever you may look towards, I see no sign, so why am I to trust you then if time alone might not make come? A reason, whichever, might it be, I see no point is asking thee, but here I stand, but wretched calling, it shall make me, draw upon your saddle gnawing.

Off your horse immediately, ser. I challenge you to a duel as to find out where you stand and why alone would that suffice, wretched was the day when we crossed paths, to which they shall talk of well-beyond the day we’re met.’

‘My horse’s heads are but endured a longer still from which not even you could remove such piety, as to draw still, upon not ill, that I might call there. Listen to thine betters when they say.

Stay away from diseased men, for blade alone might not do you well, if I were to cut a piece of you, here and immediately wonder, I could slay you where you stand, even before we crossed and dance, if chance, might pass, for you to deal a deadly blow, to have me writhe in pain and would you happen, such to know. I would have your body whipped with such ill and pox, and warts filled your body-cone, and blow upon the waste that wretches, in the perils of the lower trenches, in which I will have left you so.

By the time your kin would’ve returned to have you taken home, the disease will have spread, and killed men alike and those who aren’t yet here, to abide, spread to Eastern border, to North and South and be alone upon wretched cowl, the crown of Yore that might abandon you after, the ones beyond them who shall make you forget what comes after, all of them would’ve been slit, from whichever life might be spared, in bitterness of ill.’

‘Then how do you propose we settle our disagreement?’

‘I say we take a lap and merely talk, not alone, but brought in saddle, much to himself and to yourself, here and whenever pleasing of such disgust as one would have forget. If it ails him to look and shout, let the peasant come and see it for himself, as I will have him yet adorn, as I would have him yet sworn to early grave, be taken, and have him rotten still before each day was barren, ache of low regard, I call upon thee to answer my call.’

To which a much swarthy reed of swamps, have dragged about and, much to them, and for themselves, there was smoke coming from such ponds, many of whom found themselves threading along, eating from one another, wasting. And much to themselves, nowhere near finding out what fright, for sight and drenching, upon the soles of feet, the many pebbles of stone that made, around the reeds, each brick of the road between the foils that made each and around, every surrounding string about and every single thing that made them, come about, the men whose ails tattered by each step, not talk.

Their bodies were one giant torso-headed face, with harp-strings, long as bow-strings prison bar-sutured blocking their fully open, side-of the body slit by a blade open mouths, two open bulbucated eye red and squirming around at unfathomable speeds locked on the side. One was in the 'middle of the chest', the left one, the other one closer to the man's left arm, a three segmented grayish-purple with splatters of blood near the segments, bearing talons at each end pair. Two on a side, two on the other, conjoinedly interconnected, six segments on a side, six on the other, they appeared more so likely to be, comparable to pseudo-wings. Their legs were two, crab-like and drawn forth, like rakes, with a single cartilage between them, in the middle, jerking eerily as they drew forth, ahead. Pincer-stings at their ends instead of feet; while from the chitinous carapace-chest arose, the tongue which interconnected both, a malady of many put together tendons and of ill-veins, of many jerky things as well of throaty-suckers and littler, tinier canine-faces suckles in about, an elephant-cancer-man head, eyeless but with a giant blob-fish lump of a nose falling apart, a mouth missing the lower jaw, toothless as if a man had his lower side of the skull punched in with a metal fist, slaughtered as to hide, this clay-thing vase, the head-cast, but drawing out of it, a splatter as well. From the top of its head many peculiar tongues emerges as well. He was broken, just like a clay figurine, or worn by them, who made a crown.

Their talons were pointy, three toothy-horns for 'finger's. Red bloated purple violet, mixed together in a yolk amalgamation that soothed as to blow red-acid out of their puckery ends. Clouds were made and spread throughout the earth, through the lump-basin inside of which the most deranged little puckery crude wings appeared to sink back deeper, back in stone. From the filth of which only the most incessant looking insects came back to life, whenever there was even a slight, of sightless thing, both messenger and man arose:

'Who are they?' Cried the man, pointedly at every single one, incapable of looking as such, much to himself distraught.

'Rotten man, where have thou come from?'

'From inside your bowels, I have been churning in place and wreathing out, trying to leave, the much-to-itself more obscure creations. Damned would I have been if I had waited for more.'

It said and even there, armless and bore. Wreathing in the darkest colored, bloodied as he was, deranged and protruding out, he wasted no day, no hour, no minute, as he walked along, following the man around. He was much taller, although they were of relatively similar heights. Connected to one another by a tube-one that would've adorned the side of a cooler than any other place, old ancient and rotting, from gut to gut but stuck together, he could almost look up to him now, if it weren't for the face. A hunched figure that in reality would've trampled him if he had stood erect; a carved in head, partially missing, caved in, half of it not only missing but providing a see-through window as to what lay there, inside. Nothing much, past the hollow; only some musky roaches and some other growths, stumps and put together lumps that all drew on along the morrow:

‘You cannot forget me now that I am leashed to you.’

‘I’m not holding you hostage and you are not my pet. Why, I wager you could simply leave if you willed it so.’

‘Why should I do it now, especially since you’ve provided me such a pleasant company for this short while we’ve been threading along together now?’

‘My good friend, my fellow, but I would kindly enjoy if you left me alone to my own doings now, especially since, with all said and done, you’ve disclosed to be that you are a servitor, a worshipper of Filthde. It is something that’s, rather, deeply concerning, I would have to say.

There are things that happen in his realms of delusion that I would rather not approach and not contort, and never draw near him if I could help myself. I’m rather forth coming about it, aren’t I?

Especially since, with all considered, there’s but those things seeping here now, reality’s falling apart, is it not?’

‘It’s been for a long while now, but you, you insolent, but naïve creature. The insolent native creature that you are, you’ve finally, although, perhaps subconsciously done so. Or the decision has already been taken away from you, finally decided, finally found a way to leave it behind. To leave all behind and join us; as one ought to, no more of a past, no more of a future you’ll have to worry, or a reason to survive.

You may see it as a rather renegade portcullis taking away your mind, but it is, simply the natural order finally being restored, nothing more. You are finally being welcome home.’

‘What if I don’t fit here?’

‘Nonsense, you’ll fit just fine. There’s nothing to fear any longer, no time to waste now that reality has been finally replaced, that’s been finally drawn forth, that the walls have been broken and torn apart, you’re safe with us.

You’re in no need to forget or worry about anything.’

‘What of the messenger?’

‘He’s irrelevant, he’s to be forgotten, he’s kept in place by the beasts. And now, you’re to join us during the broken meals.’

Amid the rafts, which were themselves most peculiarly set on a land that was wrought in and out, and then put behind a pair of claspers, there stood eight great drones.

Colossal as they were, all eight of them were shaped, much to their liking like giant chrysalis sturdy blocks of chitin, flying. A single face laying on the highest peak, jawless, spongy as a human mask. A lumpy nose and two eyes that were but puckery dark like two vortexes dug inside, or shot-like craters, either by bombs, explosives or bullets aimed at the ground, if they stood flat on it. Horned like narwhals but of the same chitinous shield that made their own:

Their servants rested on the ground, billions of them amassing as well as they could come about, many of them but half-forms, with longer growths, out of their foreheads, out of their backs, beneath them, hundreds of legs, all retractable, back and forth, carrying around many embodied similar to them casts, with violent crickets, hole-filled, where they hid egg-like boils, put on rods that came out and shot, small bird-insects with volatile –glowing horns they bore themselves. And they were winged by screaming faces made of put-together glowing red-butterflies, all of which were barb-wired between one another, carrying ground like moles inside of each every single one of them, pushing and wreathing out.

‘Tlittli, ugo!’

Yellow bursts appeared to shot like water-pints coming out of hoses, dancing like flashes of light, cutting everything in sight as they were aimed at the very dire sky they had approached. Birds felling down, insectuous as they fell; revealing, out of open bodies many flying puckers with wings and with eyes from which there crept outside, but many dyed forms filled with the most disturbingly hard to look at lice. And mice and fleas spread on the ground. Where a hundred creatures drew out of, the small encircled zone, they revealed. Many worm-like red-black veils, all put together, crawled and churned. Twisted together, they crawled out, in the same way one would scare a bunch of rats stuck together by the single startling shot a stone, revealing, upon the place of their landing, a peculiarly chiseled floor they all had rested upon.

‘Tall standers, drawing forth, they can’t forget what’s happening there, when the old, churning into place discussers keep everything to themselves.’

‘I don’t think we can save them from being eaten by their brothers.’

‘Unfortunately, now, there was and there has never been a chance to pull them from the recesses of those earthly bowels they’re hidden in.’

‘You wouldn’t happen to know where they’re hid, right?’

‘Blasphemous traitor, it’s a secret that’s been instilled into me even before the day of your coming, of course I would not dare reveal it to the most confined of men, let alone to a stranger as well.’

The messenger was called back. As from the pits of his belly only drew back, forming large drilled in shot-marks, startled by what happened, he disintegrated within a stare.

‘He pouted, a moment ago he pouted most bastardly!’

‘And what of it, in that case, it does not compute with you that people want to?’

‘What exactly are they intending on doing?’

‘They’ve tracked you down.’

Most of them were hiding their unpleasant smiles underneath their breaths.

A race of blind couriers waited for his return. Most of them had all their newspapers and documents planted inside their giant deformedly faced wagon-stone hedge-like carts that were attached to their bodies by many flexible appendages that drew out of their backs, being welded to these compact baskets they appeared to hold many side of the face eye-socket cranium region appendageless crab-like figures with the faces of men whose open shell-mouths lodged their long tongues around the papers. All papers also had weird hands as well.

The default living state of the couriers was having giant sea urchin like bloated pox-bubbles pump their guts into small walk-plates and weird carpets on top of which they slept, as if on spiked beds. With torture.

Each of them was equipped with quips and quirks, and as they drew forth, in circles, pacing around, the Messenger came out of his hiding, during a desperate attempt to have a gulp of air, they were sitting in a prison-emporium after all, their eyes were purple and the many blind-folds only came to show that they were all attached to the top of the ceiling, incapable of escaping him once he appeared, drawn towards every single one as the hound-master to his pups:

Risen at the very least, fifteen meters away from each and every single one within a foot's mark, he spoke of the smell.

‘What’s this I hear?’

‘There’s been a rotten one, much deranged, he’s fallen at the very least a few days ago from what I could tell.’

‘And you’ve yet to bury him anywhere, I wager you haven’t even chosen a good place for him to lay in, have you?’

‘We have, one who brings messages to us, but we cannot find him.’

‘Don’t talk to him, to that wretch that calls himself ruler over us, the one that has enslaved and encapsulated our hearts and our lungs in his little diamond holding puckers that say there. Seeping and puffing with spores like hookahs everywhere.

He’s not here. He serves himself as a voice that’s made a final grasp and now it’s lain.’

‘I am the damage-control master, ha-ha! I am the master manipulator, the Holocauster! The nigger-lyncher, throat pincher with a rope; riding alongside the controlled opposition boat!’

A most peculiar deformed thought crawled through one of their minds.

‘Living here is awful.’

As if three giant put together puddles of mud –like three layers over encompassing one another as if circles, each level higher, last one raised at an order given forth by a cry, stood the giant bridged platforms. A complex made out of many barely put together buildings stood there as if on a tall rising raft. To side of which as if connected to an engine rested a globular dome- lightbulb device, made out of many power-line strings, some of them lymph nodded with power-craniums that shone in, all made out of electron drawing power-drawers. Many of the couriers lived inside the 'city', as themselves, their real selves. Thin boot-bodies eaten by starvation and disease, cacti filled with flaccid cones pointing down as watered-down wasp stings, whereas their mouths were long mosquito elongated, pointing upward, concentrated, spun around, stitched with mattress-growths-of-cable-springs, which kept filling a clot-balloon like paint sniffers or people suffering of anxiety attacks, those organs were much to their likings, peculiar in nature.

A sign near Gaavbh-Garb read: House of Safes'. Entry was made through the front-deformedly set funnel-formation that was attached to the dead husk's lowered trunk, drawing out of the deformed; it was too peculiar to be made out. Like a man's torso, headless and flatter, shoulderless at the top, whose right hand was a thing hose-funnel, -frat; left side a stump, drawing all the way to the back that was barely visible, filled with smaller volcano-shaped tiny protrusions out of which plant-like growth beams came out of, but whose appearance was like lumps wrapped or sutured together, kind of like intestines, but hardened-solid, being much closer to solid welded-in metal growths, that formed many pike-towers. A spiky-thorn filled chitinous helmet. This strange humanoid torso shaped head was connected to a mass of hardened chitin shaped like a sitting on its side rhinoceros without its limbs and much fatter as to look like a deformed inconsistently grown set of bulks, but together. Only one peculiar appendage appeared lodged into it, as if a great parasite had suckered its way in, a cricket leg made out of a PVC; entered into it like a slightly curve handled scythe. A blimp like fat with the bloated deformations connected to the head. Flying around it, or levitating in a dead spot, above this 'building' was a being, erected in the position of a pinkie – finger, pointing forwardly, whereas its lower region was lined as a slug, dripping on top the great carapace. Its face being covered in a beakless raven's cowl made of chain-iron rings.

Slehg-Slogh started creeping in on something. It was a curtained bath-region where they boiled the pin-pricked in the head bubble-reefers, many of the arrangements being vaguely placed in unrecognizable formations.

'We've yet to reach the fully tension caused by long-exposure to the fluid.

We'll have to shatter a few more crack-heads in order to open up a way out.'

'There's much joy in it, a wretch had spoken to me today, it dared open up its back, out of which the wild insects came out. Wild, arrogant thing it was. It deserves begotten and ripped apart, would it not?'

'What do you intend on doing with the remains?'

'I shall cast it with the rest of them, whenever needed, wherever shall I, to look for, there, instead, will I find it, always cast within my reach. My glory being disputed by things like that wretch, of whose likens I would have beaten and cast away, if I could only.'

'Calm yourself, glorious ruler, cast of bitterness, I wish you would stop for a moment or so. If you could only understand your limits for a single moment, there are things I could look for.'

There was a strange barge standing between them. It bore large water-bottle like chitinous beings that had been impaled, for what seemed to be, hundreds of years now. They've placated the lands, having grown into most of the peoples that crossed the second-fallen Vihlheopl resting near their sides.

It hadn't, and a most maligned dreamed continued. Of what had to be done.

But it wasn't a dream as much as an entry through his brain which took away a most important part.

'There's something unspoken about every slith that's unpaved, outside the lanes, you see, there's a few more things, you ought to consider.'

'Such as what?'

A pair of strung to the side-ropes had fallen in.

'You fool! You absolute fool, you've failed to realize that I cannot die, nigger. I simply am incapable of dying.'

The second half-head machine- merged with the side of his face, coming out or wrapped around his shoulder said; an NFL player's shoulder pad but built in-and-out of him; as to be activated by neural connectors. He was shirtless and everyone could see the giant hole-gap, of missing meat- a hollow 'spot' that had replaced his heart. It would grow soon enough, but then again. A black hole would appear, swallowing the same spot, again and again; as to grant him complete impermeability, as one could hope for. His clothes were weird as well. Off his arms two flag-and-pole shapes sleeves, fatter and filled on the 'flagless part of the pole' as well, as if multiple, opposite to the main flag facing wider flags were adorned there, had been wrapped, by leather ropes to his arm and forearm. His suit was grayish dark with outlandish ivory mammoth tusks-drills that were aligned in bands, like oblong-rings around his chest, and legs. A pumping real heart rested by the side of his belly, attached to the suit, whereas the voracious looking heart was connected, by an IV needle to the half-machine head. They were a modern two headed ogre; unstoppable by all means.

Every pair of tusks wore leather bands wrapped between them, equipped with small explosives that were aligned like downward pointing slingshots. His brother was a lightning man, capable of conjuring the power of storms to his arousal's defeat.

Tkelke

How could it have started if not in the same place?

'I believe we were having a private conversation, do you mind?'

'I do mind, you were standing under the cantropy leaves, the thick brushes being over there. Either of you, if there's any reason; damn it, I should've known better, you were simply not meant to be.'

Both figures frozen under the leaves, as if completely solidified, completely worn out and made to waste; for what would seem to be a, at the very least an hour from the looks of it, no one would move, not an inch of a finger, and as such, there was, a sudden botched thing, like a broken magnet stuck in a field of little pin-needles that came and popped. Behind them stood a little blow-like push-through, like a nasty, nasty little pop.

It wasn't going anywhere, nothing was.

The great artifact, the spear of languid languages

‘There, I have finally come to perfect it, the most malignant thing of all.

I've forged the outer-pins, that come within and to submerge, to come around and then about the hour, they are made to reel back in. To pour out and in, and just about the jutting as they come. Receding back, then to loom, to come outside and swoon and then they speak.

Many sharpened singers, talkers, whisperers within it. Whatever they say is but command, whatever the man writes on its shaft, on the hilt, on this rod inside the javelin, he makes appear.

And it cannot be contested that this tool of evil brings but uncanny and supreme destruction, when a place like this but cackles in distraction of their little tiny bred-forth minds. I', of all but seek, inclined, to do so on my own accord, to move around and draw forth, from the bodies that have come to me.

I write on thee, but blasphemy. Bring their bodies back to life.'

He wrote as well, but such delight, it was incomplete, it wasn't as simple as it were, but what happened, by such power, along his feet they gathered, many men. Hundreds if not thousands of them, whom looked at the bodies, they but nodded as to serve. They whom had been tricked and ticked along, by the body of work that's been written around the spear at last; it made them rise and hold at last, hand in hand, in hand in arm, as they put themselves together as a giant cast of man, walking in a gait. Incapable of submerging as they moved out and moved ahead; wastes inside a basket in which their entrails would recede, impeccably so, as to reel back and reel back in, they were made to know, their families would be rightfully so, compensated for their acts. It was the will of the spears, alas, to ask of this and ask as well as there may still be time.

‘But we have bought in your writings, and we have served as much as we could. Why is that you made that of us and when and will you please take us where we should?’

‘Where to now? I've promised you naught and I will keep my promise, not to dwell where I've forgotten much, the spear may have speak to you, in your tongues, but I of all have said just so. Will you listen to it when the time would sow?’

And the men were but incapable of thrusting and of moving away. Benched atop one of the plain contortions with the other fallow men, he had thought as much as to consider what happened and where he'd stumble to follow next, for the same reason he was there, they were also, everywhere around the place, hollow men of little more than munched upon disease, distressed for what appeared to be, anything but the bacterium that had happened to enter them. Many split toes were seen, many of the things but funnels inside of them, leading away and within the hour, just about the place a shower, broken reeds and broken minds, a cancerous trains with leprous hinges, all but put on empty troughs, which surrounded the men he made.

The spear was but tainted by whichever case, by whatever means. It sought refuge in its chest, and would ruin everything.

In a small enclosed space it lived, unwrapped not as to be sheathed any longer, nor would any man mean. What had happened there before the time had come, uselessly in awe, his eyes were darted, standing, rotten in such ways macabre.

Pictures flocking along his hall, drawing along, never to stall; all but aiming in one direction, the creation of the broken teeth' the chatterer who followed in with the languages, and seeped the message deep within; it would take some time to reach the point, where the trenches robed and paranoid lot would bring, within the hour, an access to the mind.

It existed in a wretched room, in front of it, but a buffoon of a long-stretch, a tunnel leading to a giant brain with which the chatterer worked with, with whom he talked and spoke and stole the mind off in the most unnatural manner of its own, past the crowns and little minds and what came after, when the time was come. Stood but a basin of clumps, all latched upon one another, as they entered the brain and made a ration for the lard, in the distance amassing, it had to be filled with as much mass as it would do.

'I have to eat out of this parcel, it is an organ-orange I may not do with. I cannot see oranges, I see only organs for some reason.

I think one thing and I say another, it is wroth of my making, upon and made.

Lassen' now, dear lord of the Languid Languages Lethal Burning Sorheimhalhhan, I have stumbled upon your wretch as one may still himself to be near you for I've dreaded myself as to live for long. I know where you belong and what you've come to make of plain, this, your home.

You're sitting on a pile of wretched coins and blurred realities, you're but contorting everything to your will, but this, upon your death if that's the matter shall bring such a wave of high destruction such as the world had never seen before, and for what?'

'For my pleasure, what else is there left for me to seek? What shall I do without, when I walked upon this deceit, as it it's foretold, I've seen such a serene sight I've never considered threading on, before the place I lay in.'

'What did you see in front of you, lordly man of no regard? You've threaded upon such plains like no man has ever underwent as there's to be said, there's nothing in your heart but butchering away.

Braven' as a brazier you stand, burning with delight upon a sea of frozen sand, yet you refuse to tell me what put you there in the first place.'

'Nothing and naught, I was but distraught.'

'Of what reason and for what?

What made you give birth to the conception of the spear?'

'My dear good man, I was but given to such likes as to fall and stumbled upon such a perilous thing such as a blind man who has never learned to read nor write. That is all and as such I see no reason to, certainly you wouldn't think I am a liar now, would you? Would you have claimed me as such before you've lain eyes on me?'

'A treat, a treat for a lord of crows, ravens, pests, crows and salamanders!'

'You've spoken of crows twice, is there a reason for it?'

'I do see any reason where there's naught as such. I only see one thing, and bold, bold, the dead of the mind, birds set in flight that die of the smokes you've churned into the pots you've had your men but wallow in and be beaten.'

'Yet I'm still something to behold, aren't I? For I've found the strongest weapon of this world, languid as it is, there's no speech higher, no document and nothing that might stand between me and the churned-in world I've come to take as plain as I know of this pontiff I delve into.'

Take some clue, and would to get through, they both but gathered around, and would to listen to the fall of something that stood between them and the landslide, the casts of men which fell through were but forcefully drawn behind and made to waste as in vain, they were but shallow and left to rot.

'Twenty, I hear twenty and I will slowly submerge into the pits of darkness your shallow words had crafted in their wake.'

'But those words are something I cannot remember.'

'That's but a result of your empty mind in action, not of the spear, or have you forgotten what you've said to me?'

'The little blind man, indeed, he told me something, though he could barely speak. It was him and him alone who set me on this path of laceration, though I am damned and I feel no reason to push onwards, I feel as if I'm nearing this disaster.'

I'm hidden yet they know I am, they're looking for me.'

'Who is?'

'The ones that are as blind as him, and in whichever, either way. There's something to them, in which they hid, in the way they act, all of them just as blind and will heave when left alone.'

'Lend me the spear.' Twas but asked by So-So when the time had come, to draw and say something of his own, and thread along as to forget the songs of rotten and miss forgotten lore, when they draw ever near.'

A few meters away from them, beneath one of the rafts.

There's been a break, somehow. 'All the citizens may attempt so we could reconcile with what happened here, right along and way before we even stumbled on it. Not to be too inconspicuous now, during the attempted disturbance at the funeral there was a man, there is a man amongst us who doesn't belong here by any means. I think it's safe to safe that upon abandoning his coat he's made it extremely clear that he meant to disappear out of sight, he's meant to make himself rather.'

Oblivious and nothing more of our rules, that is to say, no man might be involved in the process and our ordeals without being first addressed.'

'It's a sad ordeal I'm forced to attend now, come to think of it, you were here a day before me, weren't you?'

'I was, I think I was but at the same time I wasn't.'

'Makes sense, will you? I don't have all day to spend on poppy-coking around, mesmerized by little bifurcated plisses, my missus is waiting for me and I'm to spend a second less here than I'm expected to. Not fifteen but fourteen fifty nine, have I made myself clear enough? I will not, by any means make a scene but, since I haven't intended to do this, I'll make it fair and certain.'

The weird man got off his chair; he rose, he frozen and was but put back down and seated. In his place, or what seems to be twenty feet beyond and around him, eighteen more, stop playing with numbers, he told himself. It wasn't the time to count the people, amongst those that weren't people at all. Everyone was but mesmerized.

'There's something going on around you.'

'Wait, before we start, I must ask you something.'

'Cobalt, you are a man of cobalt, stone-blue skinned.'

'You are not allowed to speak until you're done, do you understand?'

'I do.'

He nodded, the latter being in his mind and nothing more, both of them being rather set on the side.'

Jonathan Flannery O'Connor

A wretch of hemoglobin, they were but trying to strive to make it past some of the left-over made to get-through reigns, a couch stopped by the river, and just as soon, the red-mammals began drinking from the curtain-melts that were the flowers, near the water-pouring floating gargoyles that were breathing off the road.

Jonathan Flannery O'Connor stepped out, on only a leg. His arms were his conjoined twins who had no arms, whose legs were but liquefied into one another as they sprouted from the insides of his mildly postulating trunk. Most distraught of man he came out with a blade and started slashing the little squirrels that lay around the area he was in. His two handbrothers opened their mouths, bleeding as it happened, puking nasty blood-clotted intestine soup mixed with dark chemicals as they spat bone-blades out of their guts, that being their disjointed sharpened end of their spines which was no longer attached to their skulls, bobbling their jerkily erect heads around until they could no longer feel pain because of the numbness caused by the constant pressure pushed out and wreathed about them. Dreadful things they always trash about the place in a most fallacious manner. Why do they need to suffer? Why must I need make them suffer? Why can't I put them down like the birth defects they are, or I am? Because I be left without a trade, or make do with the most fallacious of activities which would harden my life in a most awful manner. For I that I choose to live alone in my couch, with strange beings that will never listen to me by any means whatsoever. I am a lone knowing that they both died, a long time ago. Yet they live through me. I may not hear their thoughts such as there is, that is an impossibility of nature, yet I can control their jaws, their bodies and their hands.

The man was a freak, fit only to dwell in a circus and no place else, where his so-called tendons were put to a rest. He wrestled a boar who came one time to attack him when he was peacefully squatting on a rock, taking one of his most famed meals he had come to enjoy with one of the pretty invisible ladies that spoke to him when he wasn't there.

Her speech was just as her completely required countenance, that is to say silent and close to nigh non-existent, as for every woman who resembles her, I beck to them that they may be congratulated for their apparent self control, their put-together impulses as well as everything that is to make them what they are, obedient under any circumstance. Silent unless spoken to, servile to a fault and to no degree should she be like one that is, she is invisible, not there, but in place, like a schizophrenic person staring blankly when speaking to a man, a modern automaton that's never to be taken out of this state of complete and utter, observed by natural means, 'failure to function' as this illusion might serve to achieve. Only then could they be deemed as being functional, otherwise they're but pests.

He was mesmerized by her, by the lack out an outline, by how she acted or had not. It was something beyond him, trying to comfort her when the time drew on.

'My dear lady, you flatter me. You must understand by now that I am a shy man and I may not, certainly not overextend my reach as to even consider touching or caressing your most impervious to gaze, robustly capricious shapes I cannot take my eyes from.

I've taken you for a fine lady before. But now that I'm acquainted with you, I've come to take it for granted as to consider this to be a permanent behavior, the case of which I wish to take you in my private chambers and make do with your body as I please.'

But then his joy was ended before it had began; as his senses kicked in, being surrounded by an army of them, all invisible and yet to be held in line. Alas, most importantly, to his employ, something was put forth, something beyond him that would not do; they brought a boar with them, an enforced of laborious work who seemed almost tiresomely ill for what was worth. He didn't necessarily fear the creature but looked at it with much pity and contempt, for no other reason that the fact that he could relate. Flannery considered as much.

His incarceration has yet to begun.

They were already making unkind gestures he couldn't see.

‘Must I be stalked endlessly before either of you will understand? I am not what you may consider or think I am by any mean. I am but a champion of the pursuit, one with the wild-life in the broth of such wrong doings.’

They would not listen to it, as it was known of them, and was expected, sickening their dog on him. He remembered.

‘A plough of water for any kind man and king!’

‘And a pint for every drink as well.’

‘A piney for me, I say, good man!’

With which they started dancing on the hour, like Irishmen during the famine with little to no shower, dancing around a little row, filling their cups merrily as one of the dresses shone. And they would’ve continued if that were the case, but of distraught manner, he entered, upon the face of such exposure no man would glance kindly to him. He winced as them and would but return a grin if it weren’t for the quick arousal they proceeded into displayed along.

‘What kind of creature has entered on our premise?’

A sudden jolt stopped the music in the prairie.

He was a coward of much meekness who had dreamed the world one day in much likely, a paranoid fashion. He had dreams of darkness and despair, which fought him before he even came to the realization that he was already taken to another world. One that had taken his soul so thoroughly that he was thrown in such a dark abyss where all the like of the opposite species was but nonexistent and at peace, put in their tinted rightful-place. Their nature was much forgotten as were their faces when appeared in front of him, they spoke of lost days in which they remembered being the worlds.

‘It was a dark dream.’

Flannery was immediately startled by her speech and how coherent a woman could be as well as sound as.

‘I had. I still think of it sometimes. I was standing there, in the air, with all my sisters surroundings me, being everything at once. Everything that ever existed expanding, drawing out of us at all times, as if we were a funnel for the world, for time itself entered us, then pushed out, into the outer stretches and the expansions of the things that were not to be told off.

I remember seeing everything touches. Objects, such as man’s homes and farms, little peaceful threading lambs and little failings from a yellow Mars that we were cast in, markings of our bodies being there; we were there. It was a reminder of something that was not to be, it was a reminder that you’re the last person seeing us, before we’ll be taken away. By whom and to where? I cannot say. Yet just as much I know that there won’t be any man and no living matter once we’re gone.

And once again, you’re to be done for as well as we are.’

‘This was not my intention, fair-kind thing, I cannot see, I cannot see you any longer. No outline or reticence of your reaction. You jerk away from where I stand, I wish I could see or hear you.’

But her voice was just as soon, lost to him. Not to be found again.

The men then proceeded to trash him out of the tavern where he was driven back to his couch, where he stood, contemplating in despair. Soon the men would disappear as well, and although his fear would say as much as to dictate what leeway he’d be given, there was this he looked upon. The palms of his hands were clear, but he could but not see through no matter how hard he had tried to. It was a kind of peculiar thing that rose.

He froze upon the rivers, upon the forests and the pictures he stumbled on, before realizing that there was nothing there.

A man walking everywhere, only to see them marked, like tiny viscidious reveries of the things he never held his arms around. He fell to despair, his mind had taken but one of the things he’s yet to miss the most.

‘I feel only wretch upon the hour, having come to nothing as I stumble back, where is it? Where could it be?’

What a dreadful thing it could’ve been, if only he could spend most of his life inside that couch, he would be treated by his own peers, that is to say, the patches of fluoride-sinks that were openly trenching drenched inside the small spot he was in. Moisture being nothing, rationing the variously put together drops of water during one of the solitary rains had been something he’s never even gotten through since his heart was become but little more than a strange beating organ standing outside, that shot out of him, right as he decided to step out of his couch. His chest but burst out, like a tiny stepped on mine that launched it a few meters away from where he stood.

‘Woe to him mighty man, what hast thou done of my despair?’

‘I’ve taken refuge out of your vilely protruding bodies that seethe.’

It was hardly a match to be held to him or to his face, this deranged object of contradiction and destruction was to be destroyed and put through so much wallowing destruction such there is already met. The town they were in the close proximity off had been complete set to rampage, completely destroyed and enacted as such means as they would’ve missed their chances to get through. Utterly smashed and completely decimated in the wake of such peril such there was.

And would’ve been set if there was something to be had.

‘I seem to have forgotten something, have you not?’

‘All men have but disappeared, such, plain brutality is expected, heart, but you bleed. For what reason might there be at once, if not for the conception of such a break, for such a focally erected need to fight back, but against what?’

‘A last flare, their last attempt and no reciprocal attempt, they bled one another like pigs, look at the marks on those that weep, are they not to be completely destroyed and distraught and loomed about as there’s but a man about the hour missing?’

‘There are more?’

‘Some as such, I can still hear their beating hearts, to which I say to you as follows, you must loom away before they seethe and waver, there’s much to be called profane and they will go out of their way to hurt you and inflict such seething woe and pain in which I claim, forlorn that nothing of you will remain.

Once they cut, one they’re brought and made about the hour.

You will have to do something for me, when I ask this as well.’

He beat but merely for a single hour and a single moment again.

They welcomed that dark thing, a wail.

‘Should we follow it and see where it leads?’

‘What do your brothers thing?’

Both arms were still dead, merely. A handful of breathing in such kindness as there was, there was but no mean of getting through either one, since they were mad, their features fumigated and moved out like electric spasms, coming from the moisture of the air, splashing each other about as they were become as well.

A week later for as far as they were set; it was within reason to think of it and consider it done before, better yet, many men were gutless, still yet to disappear. Fought between the late hours, in a blameful fight that lasted but, up-front no more than a few seconds where they ended up, but hand in hand. Then chest in chest, their faces were but one and still see-through, ended, disappearing. Like jests, like mere whispers lost in the wind, like a go-through song carried from tin can to tin can then done with.

‘A Perth, a first lord of the pails, I peak at much creation; I am but singing as I least of all, need to be brought in front of the lands where I was brought and made at all. I seek such kindness as there is as the likes I can obtain.’ He took a moment to allow the other side of the fact to get through.

‘Put through such courage, I may be servile. I’ve seen something you think you would see in such fancies as there are beyond dream and beyond emotionless reason, those are but incapable of being met. Our expectations are to be called and met, here and there.

Listen to me before I weep, be taken from this world and out the way.’

‘What did you see?’

‘Such wonder as there was.’

Twenty days prior to them meeting they were but walking backwardly in what seemed to be a land where a Serf walked through, a boulder shaped back tied to his knees, he carried that which he killed and cut, defiles and made to leave. Inside the house, inside the village, but the man with an open-behind, put about out of his misery. Inclined in such directions as to bleed away, that is to say, the half a face spoke, I've seen a murder you wouldn't believe had happened.

And the Serf but was immediately wings but not by a pair, hundreds of them which were given as soon as he was met by them. Hundreds of flocks, all but pulling out switchblades and ropes, to cut themselves then to be hanged; snapping their own throats before, at long last the Serf was but given so many of them that they could not control themselves no longer. Flight followed after, by the hour. They were but met in heavenly dark, and what might appear to be, for them was nothing but a wretched disgust, that came through, heavenly-forlorn, about the trough, one of the trench-riggers and the drench-diggers but put them into heaps and hid.

But the man simply flew away on all their wings, making it to one of the maddest of the sky-nests where he put, although he shouldn't have, most capricious of back, he turned it around and there lay but the side of the side, the entrails, the livers and the lungs, shared between their indolent sons, the children of the Serf who stood about and shared between them, little beads of nasty lint and leeches, mighty bitches such as cunnies were not to be touched by. Of what was shared between then no man would like to know, for it was slouching for his back, abominable yet brought.

'What did they do after, kind disappearing man?'

'Well the Serf stumbled upon the realization that his life was but to come thereafter, as to disappear soon after, before his time was made to wake, he could've found himself anywhere and anywhere at all, but lo' and see as much.'

Wretch of hours no shower for the livid.'

Know this.

'A mighty benign wretched creature appeared.

It was tall like a kebab-shaped trunk floating about with a larger trunk on top, out of which sprouted four scarab-like organic shaped jaws, or clippers that were but pointedly wrought to look greenish dark, spiked as well as Musa-Massa' sand fort, which below it lay an openly extending endless leg growths that moved like slow-shifting mantises, while the cartilages of the legs looked like adjustable lamp plastic movers.

There were wicked signs and symbols widely spread all around the base of the creature which pushed and bastardly moved around in the most unnatural manner as if they were actually dark parasites that were put on top of them, moving spreading and projecting themselves all around the world, or as far as their legs moved.

That creature is here, with us in the world and it is the reason why this world is like this, and the reason for the disappearance of all living things as well as everyone and everything else. Therefore, you must die, somehow.'

'Why should I die?'

'Because you're kept alive for a reason.'

‘Therefore, shouldn’t I be kept alive?’

‘No, you must be killed in that case.’

‘There’s another living thing.’ Cried the floating heart, and repeated as much, as he had known, there were others.

Bastardly in trance, he could not think of anything else but the reason he had undertaken himself in order to reach as high of an order as to be plain. Rip away and butcher the man in front of him, where he stood, before his gaze, then he popped. Before his palms could splash both of them, the disappearing men were never to be seen again, simply brought beyond the world and taken they could never had been approached, never to be put where they froze, and went away. Now he was risen from where he stood, incapable of making out what crossed his mind, he but, took one of the glass-candles and smashed the fire into a burst of hellions that sprang and became, as gangrene is spread across a finger, from a child that has been left unattended after a while, lightly put, the house was become in shape, of a little more than a hundred gray hoppers that simply made their way out of the world and beyond it, crisping where they could, incapable of making it through, then wretchedly aware. There were damply set skeleton-wedges that were put in their employ. Most of which were, as one could tell of them, paranoid to say the least, incapable of making whatever feast of knowledge was left of the town. As the heart had put it:

‘Even though many of the men and women had solemnly died before their time, within reason, it is safe to say that their hearts are still beating to this very day, to this very hour and wherever it may be. Oh, but look, it’s one of the flying boars I see upon such close as to suture my cuts.

I am but largely distraught by such a violent thing as there is around me, please be brought before I, dear bore.

I must confess that I’ve never seen such a dire creature, as to be put under my employ.’

To which the boar knelt, and took out a blade itself, and they but started a duel, both the boar and the heart. As the beating organ pulled out a switchblade made out of the most capriciously endowed tendons that had been put together and were made to be set as for flight; of such nature as the man had already peed his pants, but claims it to be a miss fire caused by nothing more and nothing other than a failure to act since it was ever so hard to action two hands coming out of the conjoined creatures which were the reasons his arms simply pulled and stretched and flailed around until they were brought to such vile conjectures, as there would be no way to impress himself onto it.

‘But devious prayer and mad-organ of banter what are you to do if you are stricken down by the boar?’

‘I will fancy myself bleeding on the floor.’

They were still inside the building after all, although there was no roof to be observed and without reason there was as much dirt.

There is power in the total constitution of power there is in none to be had.

First the blade but followed around, making as many cuts as were necessary to push around and spread each way, as to make incisions that would go out of their way, being a wager, no man was to be in danger for as long as it mattered. No longer would there be a break, nothing could be even more defect, though Flaubert was quiet and sat.

He seated himself on top a rock, saddened by what happened there, he looked at a sky and saw the fiend's large legs but spread anywhere. And a strange almost strangely contorted play of many large frights, an perilous if not deranged play of lights that followed through exploding, within reason ever less provoking for what was fair, of reasonless hour they could only be aware, something happened there.

In the other, beyond sight, there was as much as it could be gotten hold on, two pretty ladies, madams were but accompanying a gentleman by the picnic side. With one of the families in sight but greeting both of them, but not the man; a collapse followed through. It was as if an elderly man from the diner fell through, and out of this world had he gotten he might've had himself but rather cold-stake. A bit on the head, he jerked it back in each direction right as kindly as he could've had himself during such proper like, his tension shot around the room, like a groom that had pissed himself during the monsoon that was a delightful wedding night, the blissful honey moon and the broad was also a whore. Slapped around ass he was housed inside his major dome, after she's done the nasty with another man. Two fists', it's all but took to put her down and in her place, replaced. That's why there are two of them. But he would not share no indentation or admiration for the queer old man.

'I've spoken with him before and I know as much, I'm going to tell you now, I know what he's done to my wife, he's turned her in a folding fluke, I'm being followed.

I'm being followed by a woman, I swear I'm not jesting, why am I acting in such a manner? I'm afraid of being touched, watched luminously found and unwrapped, I who is not a present must ask.

A whore, a whore with how many men has she been with, since I've been with naught, I fear as much that the answer would be many, her defiled and stretched as such like a woman, the maiden of time is a wretch that would but pulled and take away from her in the same manner a mad surgeon would but spit and botch the job, pulling some things that weren't supposed to be taken out, then allowing a butcher, no-gore to put everything together as they already hammer some mirthful children were but leaped inside of her as well.'

'Insane, I am given birth to, see the woman hit the wall.

I wish I had a wife, good fellow, may I talk to you?'

'Indeed you may, dear stranger, but what it is?'

'Allow me to introduce myself first.' He said with a mightily uppity-along the way erudition, like he was a liver-lover in such country as was there. It was there, where the darkies were but niggers in a fair.

'Michael Boumingrummage.

But that is not the time to question anything that's out of the way, and beyond reason. I must confess to you.'

Everyone during this picnic but went ahead to attend to the old man just as he, all of the sudden decided to generously donate a few pints of blood out of his head. What a kind person he was.

‘Are you the famed author?’

‘No, I loathe writing, I loathe writing, I hate it, I hate writing, I hate reading, it’s the truth. I cannot remember anything I read nor write, I loathe it but I put too much time into it already and there’s no time to change or do anything else. And, my dear, my dear, I gave up art for this. Even though I wasn’t good nor decent at it, even though I had no control over what I was creating, and even with all the pains I went through while making it, I was sometimes happy, I was elated, I was made so, but now? Now I’m soulless, I don’t know why I’m continuing this. I hate it, I supremely hate it.

I am a child, I act like a child but I cannot change, I didn’t start reading as a child, I did not start making art as a child, I wasted my youth, I lost on my education, and like every man before me I am made to suffer, not because of it alone, but because I know, because I realize that I could possibly make it, to something I have not earned, to something I have not worked hard enough like other people, in such as there is a just world, I would’ve ended on the streets, worse than a beggar and any other man. And because of what? I don’t know, because I’m soulless, a sellout, a petty thing and nothing more. Because I’ve said before and I will keep repeating it so I may never forget, I am incapable of changing, that it the reason behind it. An evil man that’s but affected by his own poison, a wretch; I know of men that work and never succeed, I’ve seen them standing before me and never cherished it in the past. I cannot invoke feelings on command, I cannot feel anything for those who died before me and I don’t know what’s wrong. But I still yearn for that childish thing, I do not like the world, I hate it.

I didn’t and don’t want to change. I want to be left alone and hide away, and stay away from everyone that might stumble upon me and hear what I have to say. It was perfect, it was a dream, knowing that I could never make it, regardless of how hard I tried and attempted within; always within my reach, no journey but some peace of mind, only something that was yet benign and lost in the matter of a second, now, what?

I am a moron, an idiot and a fool. Before I even knew such writing and of reading, before I even knew of the literary merit and of canons, there was nothing but my ignorance to fail. Thinking I could stand against master without even being aware what and where they were. Of course I never stood a chance, but it never mattered in the past, it never mattered to be, but now, I’m left with this alone, something I loathe the most, something that stands beyond hatred and salacious manners. Something I won’t be able to remember or look back with joy after. It is the one thing that’s block out of my heart.

The need for failure bring nothing in this case, at all; I like being poor, a no one, lost in the obscure, playing with my art. I enjoyed failing and trying over, and before I knew it, she was there, alas.

I know it’s not fair to make others suffer for my own, I know I cannot endure to make it last forever, as much as it’s been shown. But I cannot help it, this was meant to be nothing, something I never ought to have looked after by any means.

But one day a woman appeared out of nowhere, and of fault, she made me chase her everywhere, ruining but all. Whereas I were but a young man, trying to fashion his drawings, away from the eyes of every man and every mocker, I was caught and broken apart. Never have I truly chased, never have I walked away, from where I stood and where she was, to follow her around, to run.

It should've never read or written, not a word spoken for anything in the world, but she was there and I was here but poor, never having worked more than a month during a swoon, a lazy thing, like a hefty nigger I but walked. And before I realized it, I had to earn a living, regardless of the way employed, I could not survive otherwise, for it is the fault of women that I have to earn the means of living that I may take them out.

I am the victim here, I am the victim, women only want abuse, they want to whip me in my dreams and drive me out of home all the time, they want to whip me they want to. Always, and as thoroughly as possible, to put my head in the dirt, they who are the root of all evil in this world make me suffer for I cannot afford them, and no woman would take pity or envy a poor man.

Man is but a product of his environment and women are fucking scum and not human. They abuse good men and they would stop at nothing unless they're fully ruined because they're petty and disgusting and evil.

Ever since that incident happened, I was set forth onto a path of evil and destruction, knowing that this vile cancer of destruction would spread throughout my body and devour everything it can. I haven't even spoken to her more than a few words at a time, at best four or five words. And I was afraid, she appeared out of nowhere and I didn't know whether or not it was the same person as all. Why must women do that, as to tease and stalk a man? For this is not the first incident where it happened at all, I would rather be distraught if it were. Many a time women found themselves doing unacceptable advances and.'

'And what, what happened after?'

'I lost my thought, ha-ha.'

Strange fellow that he were, he took a little butcher's cleaver and chopped one of his nipples off, feeding one of the nearest peculiarly deformed unnatural head-grown giants, that stood around each.

Someone knocked on the door.

Have they finally come to take me away?

My heart is beating? I am afraid.

'I've said and done many evil things and the day of the reckoning will one day come. I am ah, extremely frightened of what might come to happen to me.

Any day now, wretched thing, it could happen and when it does. I dread to think what might befall onto me. Better to rule in hell as they say. But for the time being I shall live past this wretch of a day.'

There was no indentation to be had.

'As I were saying, there's something inside this room, I seem to think, right, we have to find the other beating heart, shall we not?

The one that beats more handsomely than the ones left behind. A sacristy that's to be gotten, I ask for a, what does that mean?'

I keep hearing noises coming from outside. There's something there, someone's out to get me, I know it, I'm close to the door leading outside.

They shall never get us, voice of vileness, never shall they wrap their voices around us, not to be caught, not to be distraught, we shall lay in a single tomb that is to be out home and lay there forever until we're caught and brought to justice and peril.

'We shall indeed survive everyone by whichever means there are and were. Enough with the paranoia, and distraught malign, thou shall return to it and shall yet go beyond, and wretched thing that is your heart shall be for the time being alive.'

'I'd rather see myself as a holy figure such as the likes of Elliot Rodger than Saint Anthony, by all means, as one may think of me whichever way they feel like, I am but compelled to brush them off for this reason alone. Charles Manson, the legacy shall live through the soul of man. That is mine to take.

Through which I bear the true essence of evil, as there can be nothing beyond it, in reality. Evil being born out of the desire to have a woman yet being incapable to provide the means to have her; therefore one must hurt her by all degrees of possible conscience.'

The man considered, on the picnic field.

'I've come to the realization that the more I write, the more evil I become, the more malicious, the meddlesome degradation of my soul being set, that is to say, on a path beyond self-destruction. I am evil and shall obey no law set by man alone; shall answer to no God nor deity and will bring sobriety to this drunken world that is but drunk on morality. My life means nothing to me, and I shall kill, slay and implement such means of condescension upon limitless beings that are beneath me such as this world may never see. I shall bring destruction as I become of the lords of evil on this world.'

And that unknown authors' body began spreading, growing, mercifully blinding every man and every other woman other the one that he had been talking to, as to lend upon them such peace that they might not get to understand by their mortal lives. His chest beckoned forth and shot, as it the front-side of a ship had penetrated the insides of a blood clotted iceberg which depredated itself with degradation as it heaved around like a caught shark. Chains of skin but bloodying him as he grew, multiple arms sprouting away as they but formed gliders in the back from which two additional heads would do; they but spoke of evil never ending.

'I am come out of a pussy now, I am come out but destroy!'

'Niggers'

But what could master have possibly meant by this one?

He stood on top of a decaying table, being barely able of pulling himself out of it.

'My dear servant, you may've forgotten yet, but this is a bridge after all. The walls of memory are but yearning for their complete annihilation.

A man of much decay had once fallen through a ceiling that is now but lain on top the table, broken as well as it's completely smashed.

We are but connected by the echo of the voice which appeared to have reanimated us by some strange means.'

'Are we incapable of leaving this hall then?'

'Unfortunately we are and there no way of getting out of it.'

It was strange.

'We seem to live either through echoes or similar conjoined memories; hidden in patterns that give us life. The voice was eerily similar to us.'

'And what might happen if it were to perish in that case?'

'It will be as if we've never been alive to begin with, unfortunately, just like we are not beyond the halls, I think there was a rancid rain, somewhere out there.

A hold or a castle, two who stumped and entered, statuesque gargoyle figures which are vague. I don't know what to believe any more.

I lay nameless here and I'm to be forgotten, without a name, but known as only the master of this hall. In need of having his cup endlessly refilled.'

'I've lost color in my hair and there I stand, yet to be found as well.'

Farther than where they stood, long before either disappearance was yet to occur.

'I've come to understand that I'm an unrelatably obnoxious asshole as well as a horrible person. And even though I was born relatively poor, I've been spoiled by every person I've come in contact with, whether it be a college teacher, a class colleague, a work instructor or the friends I used to have. This alone imparted a valuable lesson onto me, as I dread to think what living in a society filled with fucking niggers would be like. I'm not one to bite the hand that feeds him; I just hate minorities and women, even though I've been helped by women throughout my life and they seemed to be the ones who put the most effort into doing what I want or had to, at the same time I cannot help but also want to bash them because they like it. If that weren't the case, why would they come back to an abuser? It doesn't make a lot of sense, but it works.

Even though I'm a disgusting looking person, my face looks uneven, I'm swarthy and almost tawny skinned and short, I still find myself just chased by them, aided in my relentless endeavors. Perhaps this is something those activists never even considered in the past, how gullible some females are. How, beyond terrible, to an unredeemable, condonable way men are; no, just I. I alone; it's not even being a man, it's I. I am a horrible person, I am, and no one else.

Evil reeks of me, and it flows in my blood, born out of evil, dreadfulness and mad alacrity; of such vile visage as there is. Made to dominate and rule and destroy and cast all by the side and cast all into the darkness of my awakening. They are afraid. Their souls must feel the dreadful waking of the wretched plague there is in my heart, therefore they somehow think they can change my nature, which in itself is a paradox as such a thing cannot be changed by normal means, at all.

Darkness reeks of me, I do not wash. I hide in the nightmares of lucid dreams. I cannot be seen by normal means. My eternal silence makes it so I fade in the memories of both men and women as they may not remember the sound of my voice. I but a dark memory, fading in the bowels of a chasm that's never to be found; yet at the same time it's convenient that they don't remember me using them to begin with, otherwise I would've left but a, or most likely have left a foul taste in their mouths when they try remembering me.'

I've lain underneath a bed of branches, somewhere in a long abandoned lodge. I see the people who helped me throughout the years punished and impaled, destroyed and distraught to no avail. For some reason, beyond question they have aided what seems to be the son of evil, without even being aware. An incarnation of immorality, sociopathy that's been made aware of its nature; irredeemable by no act, as that is something with a lack of virtues, of which nature cannot be changed, no matter how hard one tries, or attempts to hide. Therefore it is clear that, this is not a matter that may simply be brushed aside. One could strike to push it in one direction as to perfect it, and be brought to the judgment as what he is and what he's done. It is no martyrhood, nor something that one could ever be proud of.

Yet it's irrelevant, juvenile and doesn't matter at all as long as someone creates something useful of a much greater thing than he is so that other people who are better than him and have actual souls may use to improve themselves in whichever endeavor they seek; as long as they don't push for something that brings their destruction, such as open borders or miscegenation with inferiorly sub-human races that should be put down. That is the greatest lesson humanity has yet to learn.

And therefore he was born, thence he walked, most dreadful of all, stood darkly-inclined, master of all, Jonrape, in the lodge.

Jonrape was born of evil seed, spread on top his mom's teet.

'I said I was going to help you in that fight, yet I stepped outside the ring and allowed them to beat you up. Laughing with the rest of the crowd at your misfortune; taking something I ought not to have' had, a shot at you, as they say, adding insult to injury, my friend.'

His face was but a long-stretched contortion strung on top a sea of branches.

But Jonrape was not alone.

He was joined by a jointed fiend by the name of Killdrake, whom had a particular fixation with tawny skinned people.

Jonrape and Killdrake were extremely close friends, the latter being a famed musician trained in classical music.

Someone knocked on the door, concussively precise, at the very least twenty consecutive blows, a brain injury at a time.

'Come in.' Cried Jonrape, right as the door opened.

A strangely peculiar figure came in, dressed in a most profusely manner. The stranger wore a top hat and had a merely crooked stance with twenty if not eighty golden hymnals behind his back. He was flabbergasted as to ask.

‘May I enter?’

‘Of course you may.’

Killdrake said as he made way for the man to come at last. He introduced himself as none other than Abax.

‘Indeed I am none other than the mighty- .’ He was just as quickly interrupted.

‘Abax Evan Hyman?’

‘The one and only; there’s only one after all.’

Yet the wretch began utmost concave, it wallowed through as to push through the disease, and wallow as in pain.

‘I will not have either of you talk over the broken mouths, I need to listen what’s being pumped into their broken bodies, I need to feel the bloated skin and watch it gone.’

Fucking damn it.

‘I chipped my tooth while chewing one of those nasty god damned coffee beans. This doesn’t look right, a good chunk fell off.

But malign face, I know, I know what this means for now. As long as we are into hiding there’s still a good chance we’re safe.

You what this means, though. As soon as we are revealed they will torture us, out of spite. Work us without anesthesia like they used to, they will start pushing and pulling and working with those tiny etching rod, you know they will. It is something you need to assume of them, especially when your will shall be known; don’t trust them unless necessary.

It is the utmost, most nerve attached region from where pain could come out from. Do not trust them, you can’t. Regardless of the circumstance, they are obtrusive operators of pain; on that alone, they will take no pity and inflict as much pain as they possibly can. The Hippocrates’ Oath is nothing, means nothing, as it’s but a bastardization of the human nature.

It will come for you eventually; it’s a matter of time. Stall as much as you possibly can.’

The mechanical set that’s been wearing the strapped-in branches face stopped its transmission.

‘I know what the consequences are; beasts will stop at nothing until they tear everything apart. Colonial art, anyone that’s against them, everything within their hands, nothing is safe, nothing at all. Nothing is beyond wretched animals, nothing is safe, nothing is beyond their filthy reaches.

Wretches on every side and people that can be bought; trained butchers with scalpels, sociopaths with god complex and everything but swept along; and all for having fun for a short period of time.

It was worth it, dark machine, it was worth it. If I can endure and put it off for as long as I can, I will do it. Everyone gets punished eventually, don't they? No matter how late they stall, no matter how far they go or try getting away with it, regardless of their attempts, I know that.

Anesthesia didn't make its effect; little piano key-claps beating in the jaw; they can control the amount used as well as how effective it is. I know what their tricks are, I know what they do to people they don't like, but it's worth it.

If I reach the end goal, the Eden, if I am daring, all can be forgiven, all pettiness, every act of evil, everything worthy of infamy, everything; the one great lesson from Dostoyevsky, if one is daring enough, if one but tries.'

It is far too late to show second thoughts, cold feet, fear or consider what comes after; no guilt this time around, no self pity, no clear thoughts, no more limits, no more shame, no more trying to act human, but when have I ever done it?

'You didn't feel any guilt, shame or anything when you said those things, you shouldn't feel fear or remorse towards any retaliation; you brought this on yourself, it's well earned. It's beyond reason, but fair men die young, the rest of us are here to rot. And it will become worse with time.

Something, it's something you cannot win, against sense, you can't take it back. Yours is a selfish thing, yours is a senseless disquiet, it will inspire no one and if it does, nothing good can come out of it, at all.'

'And what about the people in this country, the ones in the shitty hospitals, they don't get to complain, they don't get to be heard, they don't get to act in a selfish manner; don't act like you've thought of them either, it's something that can never be masked. You don't care about them, it's all about your pride and stepping on other people.'

'I'm not cruel.'

'Yet you've done one of the cruelest things in this world, you're using them now, just like you've used everyone else, that is not how a normal human acts. There is no sympathy there, there is no compassion, this is self-pity, the sharpest of the blades. You have to overcome it and move on.

Those people aren't any different than the niggers, the kikes, your 'friends' or everyone else you stepped on. Don't be blinded yet, and don't slow down, we're yet to stumble onto anything yet. Whatever happens, face it, no man can escape his reckoning, no man should take his life out of fear or pity; it's an assurance, nothing else. No shame but pity; do not stop, do not slow down, do not apologize, and continue on this path, regardless where it leads you to. I don't know whether or not it will help, but there are no amends to made if they're done in the name of pity or fear. It's irrational, it's done out of fear, pressure and most importantly it means they're not truly meant.

People need to see what they are like; they will always need to be reminded, but it also needs to be well written, otherwise it will be useless and no one might take it seriously.'

‘Who were you talking to?’

‘I don’t know.’

The three of them then left the lodge.

‘Should I be concerned about the bleeding part?’

Come to think of it, this isn’t the first time I’ve done something stupid and got my ass handed to me, beaten, choked and pushed around. This’ what it is; and frankly, that voice that came out of the transmission could be just about anyone, anyone at all, it could me.

‘I think I’m going to bleed myself like a pig. I will bleed my mouth and I will choke myself and when I’m done choking myself with my own blood, I will have become a man.’

Killdrake nodded. Abax seemed to be of the opinion, not.

But could being stabbed or killed be worse than having an appointment to the dentist’ office? It was something beyond normal means of comprehension. I want to be daring but without the punishment.

And so they went and marched along.

‘Killdrake you must, preferably with a gun. You must assist me.’ I am a good person; keep telling yourself that and you may actually believe it.

‘What for?’

‘That wretch in the west, its growth had already succeeded into completely overtaking and devouring all that lay before it.’

‘What would that be then?’

They were stopped, frozenly staring at what seemed to be, as a few overcome doors, apartments that were but overcome by strange growths and least of all many, a leprous stench made to follow. The great stretch appeared to be protruding out of the ground a few hundreds of miles away, as if a giant beast had wriggled its ugly tail out of the bowels of the ground then suddenly froze inside its grave.

Rather seen from below, the hold beneath the ground was but the motion left, after entered through the initial pair of gateways, as the motion of a giant sword that’s but pushed out of the ground and thrust through the air. An exemplary thing indeed; not only the motion alone but the mere shadow dropped beneath it which turned every atom into dark nickel-like floating, equally distanced shapes that constantly changed and switched in color and in shade. They appeared to align sometimes as to calculate the distance, in terms of being a strange shadow-floating machine that was non-organic but transcended, as with every passing moment they but seemed to emulate a calculator put on a never ending task, as to calculate the projection of a room inside the space that’s but put there, atom by atom until complete. Made to float there, forever in the eternity of space before an entire station or even human beings could be made there, not in terms of teleportation or a mere copy but something like a solid holographic thing, or a sculpture, or bombs from which large lines of light would shoot back, this being the most important aspect, to where they came from. As to calculate the distance of the projection in relation to everything else that's beyond or around it.

Munching, munching, munching blood marionettes; from the looks of which on both sides, as the eye had but flipped on each and every corner that fell, as to lie. There were various barely put together black blooded scissor-pincers holding them in place, drawing along whenever they could until they came out of light. And little more and rather daringly, they bled them as they entered through. Hundreds upon hundreds of victims trapped, all but yet to draw out. By the time they neared, it had gotten late, the lights were yet to be gotten care off, thence the first of men. Abax drew on, as to feel around the treasured whole of iron, around his arms, he went around, little more than a few wretched rods follow-through hollow, while a few more than some empty carcasses flew through.

Body of at the very least a few hundred put-together. It was there, in place always set on the same rotating pillar that served as a severed reminder of what happened. One of them seemed to beat it. The heart, as it was there, during the conception, the only thing left pushing one through when in need, when lost. Unlike a symbol, it was almost broken and left to rot as if it were in some way obscure. Hard to focus or to work, or to imagine anything anymore; a strange little thing that's become, no longer an organ but something more, a brokenly deformed oblong top of a strawberry that's been pierced; and out of the hole, lay the reminder.

One of the corpses inside the torture devices held it, as if it were. As if it had been hanging in there for a while, wandering about the place; as if it's been completely if not nigh-completely taken apart for spares, to whom they were met.

But neither of the three made it through its test.

'Creatures without soul, all three of you, may not pass yet.'

Jonrape was the second one to approach.

'How could this be?

I've yet to, try. I've yet to undergo the. I feel as if I've been alive for hours, centuries at the very least, yet I'm still denied. What is it then?'

'This is a house of torture, but everyone that's sealed inside has something to offer, you've got nothing on your back, no burden to carry, that's why you're never going to make it, or cross to the other side.

You're always going to end up here if you travel on this path.'

'How then, explain, I don't understand. Would it have made a difference if I had lived an opposite life?'

'No.'

'Then what is it? Answer me, insolent little thing, or else I shall.'

But he was held in place by the other two, right before he could progress to the trap.

'You're the thing that doesn't understand!

I am the embodiment of hatred, It's me, it is I against all and no one else. It is I, and I shall not stop at anything if it's in my power, to hurt and destroy all. It's part of who I am. It's what I've always been, It's what I am, and why?

Why am I to be denied entry for being what I am? For acting the way I ought to?

Yet all three of the soulless cackles were denied; all three felt empty. Every man and every woman, every child and every single one so far has been denied. Yet the cages were full. Who was even in there?

All three of them were bores.

'Bores shall be slaughtered nonetheless just as I desire more!'

A voice yelled and just as they made their way out of the grovel, what seemed to be a bothersome swipe had but ripped them all in halves, spreading them across the ground.

Man of empty, as see through as glass. It came after the hour and would to be, he passed. Of all he was carrying but a coffin around, and see-through as well, as he could grab.

But there was the lodge now, laying empty.

'Must be kind of obvious what the reason is; isn't it?

Beings are a reflection of their creator and if their creator lacks character, then, there is nothing to create. Weak voices, weak foundations, neither of which are made to last.

It is quite obvious, creator that you don't have the means of shaping us and it's not the tools nor the clay that is in question. You gave up too soon.'

'That must be the reason why you don't remember them, perhaps there's nothing there to remember.'

'Unless man is a dominator who needs to completely and utterly annihilate the darker races of this world under every possibly circumstance there is, for there is no greater strength than that of conquest and that of domination!'

A towering abomination of disease, they looked at it for hours, rotating as if it were stuck in the drainage of a single growth that came within and without the second plow-through, it came about and came to peace. It bore eighteen anti-tank missile strapped to its chest, growing it through the fall, there were wooden cells, bars and everything as well around them. No anchor wretch, but a great reminder stood before them as well. As one could remember what happened there. Some of the walls were battered, no, the ceiling, something greater above them swaying. One of the largely deformed, put-through abused completely stretched and defiled animals couldn't breathe. They were lumped together, eight at a time, and the rider had no lower body half, yet his head was Yellow, yet he was called, Servant. He looked at the weirdly moving mass which seemed to cause the breaking and everything happening around it, even from where he stood, there was no reason to lay, but where it shook, where more than a few hundred aimed-at-it guns were, from the darkest corners of the dead-pain, a peculiar form like a purple mass with lesser eyes and long tongue shaped horns seemed to be, a lump itself with fourteen legs beneath it, all bearing most capriciously defiled of knee-mouths, drooling upon themselves as they could not have survived any other way, otherwise. They marched in. Rear-black brooding masses, all but cunt-shapes but cut in halves, following in and through and right after they called, there was a breaking and there was a cure, for all disease but that obscure. Phials with antidote; locked in the cells.

‘Damn this, I swear I almost laid my eyes on them.’

‘I swear I almost did it as well.’

‘But where and where are we to be lead?’

They silenced themselves, great dear of men.

And were brought. Of stoles and mighty charm it was unpleasant as to know what entered and as mightily torn apart, it forgot itself, and lost about a good edge of its body, a great put-together arm, its great body but bouncing as it were incontestably wrought in every spiling thing that rose, attached to it, and where it stood therefore, rose a great deal of the unfathomable ends. Mouths that were belonged of plains had ripped themselves off the crest of every mountain that had fallen since and every single one as well. Lumped together such as clusters wouldn’t even fathom to be, they seemed perilously set to chomp on one another’s heads before disease.

Twice the darkness that came after which in turn couldn’t be brushed off, it would be easily denied by all means, after, they would but eat and eat, and dream about.

‘I am a dream of darkness and I am made to seal. Of any womb there is out there, I shall take and cut and enter in. I am the ones that will bring the first horn-breeders made, to enter from the lumps of dark, and enter about such hours going and hear about what came, as I ought to.’

There was a knock on the window, someone was trapped on the other side of the balcony, instead.

Flannery O’Connor had been married to a woman once.

Her head was shaped like a giant tube that was eighteen meters, and bore a little short of a few hundred thousand Proto-being like shapes that looked like chiseled-sharp statues that had been wreathed in and out, from the looks of which many of them had their lower jaws opening and receding back and forth as they were become fully protruding. And she knew as much, this Lenora.

For both she and her husband worshipped the giant skulled standing on its fleshy-skin tailed got, Mongol, the giant, who appeared to be shaped out of nothingness, withstanding the test of time.

He was followed and surrounded, as he was appeared, as if in a vision, in the middle of a fleetingly decayed groove, in which the Foremen worshippers were bowed as well as to greet him. Gritting their teeth, they stood, many corpses of men making the floor of as many disarmingly rotten niggardly, kikishly, asiaticly mongrellic massacres which were made to be solid as they walked on top of them. Without bearing such a need as to question, they were, all of the sudden set to waste.

Many dark pillars were wakened and their blocky servants were but rounding themselves up, their eyes bloated red, their shapes but junkyard fleshy rust, but their one eye turned to him as well. In what seemed to be a waste of day, what bothersome thing, it were; filthy waking they drew forth.

Mongol was the one that brought them forth.

‘I have come to deliver a message for what is brought, so much so that I’ve come about to gain in power and become as one would miss it, destruction within it.

That which has brought us here is leper-known.

Reality is yet again deformed to my will, for now I am come to power. Progenitor of the chasm, its destroyer, the bile that is inside the core; upon which I rule alone, now I am no longer chained to it and I may never waste away.’

He took a second more to reassess what was going on.

There were things unforgotten, he could only look to the right while moving to the left.

Every creature there was staring at him from a weird angle, and that much could not be said.

‘Wretched Pagan-bloat disaster; Twas a reason why younce was brought here after, and Leper-Four.’

Leper-Four drove in, he was, taken by the gulp of its throat, ill-defined.

He was tall, almost as mighty as one could look in-self and near.

In midst of occultation they drove through, and he appears:

‘I am nearing the total wretch, I am become like a trench that’s been made and pace away. I am torn apart, I am made to suffer through and after.

I’ve come through such a wild disaster as there is. Perfect powder-penitence.’

Yelled the lord and mild disaster dew drew forth.

He has his sacks laying around and they’re made, wretched as well.

‘I am made out of Swine and bile and look how I fall apart.’

Open through but nothing falling, decayed in head but bloated after a while.

There was more than a single way to skin all and to bring back what was lost. They were incapable of making out his wild speech, yet they gathered around at the cost of losing what they could and never nearing that which they didn’t and couldn’t have understood by their own. A bloated mouth appeared in his eye, it pushed out cylindrically then became, only at the top, unwrapped like a flight of butterflies during their take off. It was ruse but the shape at the end was a pomegranate that lost its teeth-like hair out of a cancer’s patient’s chemotherapy’s little vile end.

They were pouring themselves out like little porridge flyers, with little more than bloated-eye keel. Feeling brotherly appear the Leper-Five.

‘I shall speak for him since he is indisposed.’

Both of them having appeared from a ground vortex of skin-like protrusions that were in the ground-worn, like spidery arachnid puckers that could not control themselves from that point on.

A man with some countenance, as there were many beyond the dames yet asked:

‘What had happened down there and whom had cast them down?’

‘I do not know and cannot feel, nay. No kind of circumstance could convey the words that might do. This is but a funnel for the bloodied out surrounding and the mounds of decay that were put through, the munch-abuse, as they were forced to rot then eaten away.’

And he had pointed at the ground, whereas the Negroes were but split in halves. One half was made out of their giant heads, as to match their egos and what they kept. The other half was but another shade of their deformed reality, those whom had adhered to the malformed rules of a miscegenation-clarity, all made to waste with everything running along the way. A castration for every nigger yet in side, the Semites joined them, same in mind.

‘You should have known better than to ask.

Since there were no other pure races around, it was obvious that I would govern over all. It is too clear that I am made to bring waste and to remind you that the disappearance can only bring decay to all creation and all beauty of man.

But therefore I rule and there’s no more there to stall or fool.’

With which, a twitch of legs got them going, as to speak when needed and do the proper work, as to bring forth, whatever absorption could stumble onto them from that point on. He said:

Mongol took a few crawls ahead.

‘The cage is but my protection from this point on. I dread to be above the hour, to bring upon you the dreaded power that reeks in my mind, to be made of what I am, as well as what I’ve become.

I’ve witnessed this world in its entirety and made of it exactly what I could. With that said, I must add to this decayed feeling that you have all misunderstood my intention.

For I will have brought by the time your memory will have been given in, the disappearance of all men, of all women, of all living beings but you, Flannery O’Connor. I have a special endeavor you ought to follow, leper of surroundings, it is the title I bestow upon you from this point on, and yonder.’

Mongol, grayish, baggy, of rotten skin fleshy as he looked, he intestined of what was happening, all around him shook. His evil dreams of what was filthy, of everything that was but gone, of no purity and only but disgust had followed, for everyone in the surround.

He was up there, in sky and plain as it were for one to see, that the sea was become the edge of flails and winds. With little doubt, and as little as there was there to begin with, neither man could make oneself disappear any longer.

Implanted house

Only a few structures lay in sight, during the initial draw-through, and seek-about, most of them horned around, in the name of the head of the house, they were drawn down and left to stay in place as for their spread to end abruptly, that's to know or find out where they're drawing out from, where is their source.

'I see, there's, there's a sudden impact here and there, there's been several things going all at once.'

'What are you doing, husband?'

'Taking a sample, nothing more, you know how these things work, you prick one at the top.' Off the sacks and in one of the test tubes he carried around. It was pristine in terms of how it was working and the way in which it started cudgeling everything in and out of sight. Before it could make a turn, that thing inside the tube started jerking in his finger; at the tip and then around until, having progressed eight thirds of his body in, he started being, out of it as if he had been cut, if anything and any other place, there wasn't much he could see.

Below the rib-area nothing existed, yet he wasn't bloodied. He was cut as if it was an upwardly swinging swipe, coming out of a talon, aimed upwards, yet the reflection revealed as much.

Hoxton only saw himself, fully grown, a man as of whole, without the missing bits. He levitated into the distance, then he grew the missing parts, many of them were left for interpretation as no human watcher could understand those bits that grew off him. Two legs still reached the ground yet they were held by cystem-shaped peculiar objects, bullet-blue, and red sawn through strange almost quasi around the surface red-layers, as if they had covered him shy. Inside of it there was an eighteen meters in the back despite it making no sense whatsoever kind of hole he couldn't get away from, nor move when needed. A deep breathe was just as much as he needed, looking at the strange creature that hid inside the hole. It came out only for a moment, all elated and protruding, then came out of the brooding lodge.

'You've put yourself in an awkward place. As we speak your real body is being disintegrated, feet by feet, you just fell.'

'Where am I to go?'

'Stay, and stay here in this place alone.'

It wasn't easy, everything being dry in there, the strange creature that had erupted, a stalactite-long thing, with no feed that could be felt and Hoxton seemed to feel everything, down to the deepest touch, to the slightest brush as well as everything that came behind in and after, when it happened and way longer than it should be acceptable for him to do as such. There was one deep reason not to sweat.

As both of them stood there and right ahead before he could ask his poisoned question, it came, at last.

A strange tall steward, a bubbulous thing with little to no eyes, his mind was just how they had worked it, in the back, the land fashioned as it seemed from a missing piece of earth that hid away. Taken from the back as if on stage, then back there placed, no longer properly breathing or trying to hide; little more than eight quarters of a fauna ended being wrought around, strange trees – almost palms, with their general appearance being made of little scissor-cuts that went around the outline of a motioned hand if it shook around while shuffling its fingers as to miss. Dirt colored and wormish in appearance, many of them being held at brim-dark magenta-with curved in red little limp bumps that extended as to grow and look even more alive than they had been before. Something started pushing and dragging alongside them, until they were joined. Weird grow patterns, encompassing some of the walls.

But everything was just covered by these things, as if they had already existed, and their appearance was dragged from behind, like a flood that moved on top of everything, making them seem alive for once. The faced stalactite in his gut spoke.

‘I’m Fedics.’

There was something stolidly awkward about the place and how the plants seemed implanted in and out as if they were syringes forcefully shoved inside soiljunkies, many of them having partially receded in and out. As if on the fully iron-like cast as if it were used for the base of a small clay statue, the outer growths of the plants looked rather incumbent on having protruded in the same way raspberry bulbs would stick out and grow on top of one another, little lesser formations spreading around, with the exceptions of them being largely, melting in appearance from the looks of which there was no sudden urge to stop coming closer to them, since they only grew and formed around the air.

Fed only drew in closer, as he started merely fashioning the bulbs between his palms. He felt at them and only started pushing in and out until he was left with something, an empty feeling he couldn’t explain properly, not by normal means.

Hoxton drew on closer to him.

‘What’s this for?’

‘I keep them around just in case something happens. They’re highly dangerous, venomous, worse than that. I would happen to think of no less of a man looking at it, other than, you know.

There are some things we don’t discuss in here.’

‘We?’

Another man who looked exactly like Fed entered the room from the side. They were, they felt somewhat trustworthy for some reason. Being around them made one feel safe, there was safety being around them. He felt as if no danger could ever befall on him, all because, it was rather indescribable.

Strange as it were, the strange race introduced itself as the race of Fed, that is, they were merely promoting themselves as nothing more than the defenders of humanity against the evil of the world, the only force that could perhaps save man from himself during a time man was lost, which was the case.

Fed Johnson drew forth. His suit was but well cleaned, the man was clearly well off by the looks of it. A grandeur as if he were a kind one might point at him and say.

‘You sir, I don’t know why, I can’t explain it, but, whatever you say I will trust with all my might, from the bottom of my soul, from this point on until you will have lead me to the frontiers, tell me what you want of me and I shall do my best to comply with it by whatever means I can.’

‘That is the correct answer, I am pleased that you understand, Hoxton.’

‘How did you know my name?’

‘I know everything and much more than you could possibly hope to understand, don’t underestimate me and my unfathomable array of endless, never ending, push-through knowledge, this much you must know, I am nigh-omniscient. I know everything and for that reason, that is why I became a defender of man in the first place, bringer of justice.’

And this Fed Johnson seemed like. He had Hoxton’s best interest at play. Why? Because he was Fed, there was no answer, to the dark force he bore through, especially in these halls, where naught was safe, by all means he was the one to lead the way and go ahead, not to risk the safetyhood of the man he was protecting, no, that wouldn’t do.

While being slightly depressed into one of the rooms, both were plainly walking, as if there hadn’t been a single scratch on either one of the sides, on either surroundings, but, not to be too clever or anything, there were signs of fight present.

‘This? Someone tried resisting, but I know that you won’t try anything, after all there’s no reason to resist here, is there? Unless you’re harboring some bombs underneath your jacket, you should be well off, between the two of us. I personally delivered a few dozen myself, I swear I did, I swear I have, and most likely, I will keep doing it for my personal enjoyment and fun.’

Lodged in his back was a giant file cabinet which seemed to have been completely lodged into him. As it appeared out of nowhere like a little speck or a tiny bump that could never stop growing from one side to the other. He was more perplexed than anything else, Hoxton but remarking this much.

‘It’s empty, I can see no file, at least, at the very least most of them seem to be missing, or misplaced. Aren’t they?’

‘Sharp fellow, ain’t you? But let me tell you this much, I’m hiding something.’

Something that wasn’t dangerous, but many of the Feds were already there in the room, looking at him with some, suspicion, he could be an informant after all. Put in a strange chair on top it he wailed, feet didn’t reach the floor but on the seat, but still wrapped with a few belts which seemed to be strangely connected to him. As if they would pierce a bit too close for comfort, more than a few centimeters inside, nothing more than what was fair, he opened his mouth but no word came out. Some adjustments and re-adjustments had to be taken again, plus there was the whole schedule that had to be maintained.

Not only did they keep him under lock down for a week, but there was no word as of yet why he had been detained. Only a simple message, you’re indisposed at the moment and the proper arrangements have already been taken care of, but by all means don’t move from where you are, otherwise, something might happen. Something indescribable might happen to you, listen to us, said the message, don’t do something we wouldn’t want you to do and then, everything will be all right and you will be released.

Not to push the narrative too soon.

He screamed, but that stopped within a few hours, he move from where he stood, since he couldn't control himself; yet he returned, back on his chair before jerking off his place and starting again. Many of the belts were still there, connected to him, they infused some strange hysteria in the man every now and then. Luckily for the tests, his memory shortened by these short intervals as to return back into the initial place he was in, making it seem like his mind was a piece of string, whereas he only saw the straight line, everyone made sure to enter the room as soon as possible as to put everything back the way it was, tying the string back into one piece.

Mad Peasants, other side of Nak

Thence they dreaded such return and each of them but faced upwardly heaving and none too worth, little spent, the men had ended, and shaken little more had fended:

'Lo, there is as such and fewer.'

They appeared out of nowhere, carrying their backs on their backs, like projected packs filled with gangrene affected striped beetles-all crawling inside like a pack of rats.

Little-few dumb-peasants attached to their sides. A few more things appeared to be put in some of the walls, the painted men whom were castrated, and children stolen from niggers mixed with kikes, a few mongrellic Asiatics and some Arabs but having their genitals pulled out as well, it made for some of the low-hanging fruits of the Dominion, had to get something more. Had to take something from either side, since they were as sub-human and degrading as everyone would expect them to be as, it's something like the 'Zwi Migdal' prostitution cartel, but instead of taking and making use of their Jewish whores, their dead children, their dead kike children, raped inside wall-mounted trapped cages they can't get out of, the peasants cackling at them, pointing every now and then, wearing their beetle suits, as they would run in circles. Just undressing them, before locking them up in washing-machine-like knife attached to every side kind of manner. Locked inside and made to bleed while being raped. Kike-rape cartels, nothing that's unheard of. There are no dumber fucking Gookeyed niggers than Muhammad Ali, but one can almost always be surprised by their incessant niggering around, since they seem rather incapable of leading any kind of political or cultural movement whatsoever, it has always seemed like the nigger was and is incapable of leaving any kind of social impact by his own, his inferiority always precedes his friable attempts, since the monkey can only scatter when trouble arises. They never seem to do anything that even remotely causes any long lasting effect, unless that effect is started by someone else involving them, such as slavery. The slavery of their own people by their own people is barely memorable since monkeys are incapable of actually making something out of their own. Child sacrificed made by their witch doctors that are sloppy and involve little to no ritual if any at all, a despicable waste and in the end, an imitation performed by an inferior species.

But most interestingly enough, merely imagining the 'Wounded Knee Massacre', and their peculiar practice, their 'Ghost Dance', the way in which they but ritualistically began performing it in front of one another, as to symbolize their delusions. Anything can be excusable, henceforth they rose and did what they could.

It was a strangely put together place, barely hanging as it were, a feudal, great, giant tent, stretching the size of a giant city.

They were butchers, all of them, and at the head, in the distance, the sole creature responsible for delivering the peasants a means for their city was but a bloated tiny nigger-head by the name of Mozambique, one of the last witch doctors to survive.

'I remember my sister being too afraid to fall asleep during the night we happened to be in the same house. She heard the sounds of a kitchen knife being washed beneath the tap water.

She spent the rest of the night on the line with a cop, afraid that something might happen.'

It happened on the same night I assaulted her as well, right before me being apprehended and taken to the station.

The city was a jungle.

Most of the weather was dark-foamy teary-eyed skies.

From the corner of the street, looking forth, both sides of the street as well as the buildings appeared to be deformed in two directions. A single lamp tower was lit, beneath it a pool of oil appeared to drool on the side. Since this was no longer African, it seemed like Mozambique was but left with what he had to work on.

It all too tiresome, after a while, a strange man appeared, finely dressed in a suit. He drew ever so close to Mozambique as to give him a kiss on the strange mask he shook.

'You know, the next time I'm getting a girlfriend, I'm going to smash her face with a rock. And then I'm going to chuck that rock towards a window, all right?'

The Witch doctor did not understand a word. 'I am intrinsically evil, selfish, degenerate and cruel to animals – women.

But, I do enjoy making women feel bad for me because I enjoy the attention I'm getting. And it works. Truly I am a most mischievous of cruel beings, worthy of no sympathy or compassion. Yet, there's no stop to it because it works and if it's not broken, don't fix it.'

The nigger still didn't understand a word. He didn't get it, fucking good for nothing niggers, he thought. The man left after.

It was plain to see that there were a few lopping to the side, like fish out of ponds Albinos, with little heads popping out their jolts. Crawling along as they rolled from one side to the other, in a matter of a few seconds, Mozambique simply pounced like a leopard on top of the body, weaving his niggershank around him, a little curved dagger-thing that looked like a scythe. It jerked eerily on top the body. It poured into him as soon as he had entered, and pushed in.

In his strange language he started chimping in as he latched on the robust shapes his arms crawled around.

‘I think you are supposed to play with them.’

A grander nigger-Albino drew forth. His head was a box-made-out-of strange patterned machine-like things-mazes all put together, wreathing in and out, back and forth after, wearing his facial features, torn face-apart in the back, where all the tendon formed a strange mound looking like a shot taken to the side of the arm, beneath the biceps – for smallpox.

The only good monkey was that without a head.

It took over the already dwindling will Mozambique had, since the witch doctor’s body was already filled with, with-with wide splatter of body, pulled through the device, eight aluminum like panels made in a rounded arch with riveted triangle earring like bloated eerily scorpion tail-caterpillar body coils coming out of this arched fan of peculiar skin shapes that were drawn through the device and splattered outside in a cone-like thing that was both inflated and bloated at the same time. Leaving behind a skeleton metallic-chrome charred frame that was marble-like but held, around the shoulder and collar bone region a strange patterned device-trunk like top of the carbon-like NFL’ kind of shoulder pads armor that kept the naked’ monkey’s square device and leprous head on top of it, dangling back and forth. He wore the oyster on top the jack-in-a-box put on a neck-lamp stand kind of neck cylinder attached to the NFL pad, its skeleton glistening with a barely look-able at. Its complete boisterous splatter somewhat emanated with Mozambique’s incongruity. He seemed mesmerized by it.

Since the streets were too alien to him, latently so. Maerbyl puffed out of a sniffer, before he grabbed the tawny Mozambique by the side of the road.

Both of them appeared to fear in some measure just about everything about their surroundings. Since the echo of steel and everything else that accompanied it was there, within and beyond their reach, always pushing unaltered.

They were relentlessly trying to get on each other’s back.

A Marine appeared on the side, dressed in ULTRA-Blue, before he pulled a giant cricket grasshopper-rifle, actioning its two, devil-horned, open mouthed machine-gun barreled, which held an almost flamethrower-like large syringe pointed at them with a chewing-bubble sack that appeared to hold all the bullets levitating, amassing, being held as if it had been nothing more than a strange anti-gravitational bubble that kept everything in. Slowly growing as every shell and slug began bouncing against each other.

They fled as soon as they could vanish out of the way of the drawing light.

Blue-army suit carrying chains out of his back, two helicopters desperately trying to break free of them before lining up their Gatling gun-shaped flame throwers with large rocket-shaped extending flare-like homing acid-filled missiles showered the man, taking claim of a good side of the street he was on, part of the sewers beneath him being completely exposed, from the looks of which, he was already struggling to keep a hold of them. But no visible wound on the man, both of the creatures feared him, as they found themselves on the other side of a large cozen-brazier bull, heating part of itself as a fit was on its way.

Drowned places, everyone feared them.

Not even the negroes dared approach them, for some reason.

Little cunt-drawn beneath the earth-formations, that were neither tunnels, not openings, but seemed to be, akin to Venus flytraps connected to the sides of every corner there was in sight, readying themselves to come through, as if they were but slits of carbon or flour underneath the door frame, crawling along.

‘We need to get off, now. Off this place, as soon, as soon’ The Witch-poker spoke in his Bantu-clicks, his language hybridization being somewhat unnerving to listen to. For some reason it was somewhat expected out of him, to act that way, but he could not point where it came from, or what was the reason behind the incessant lip-open cracks that crawled along.

‘There’s a number combination behind one of the painting-cells.’

Man-morose spoke, him being placed in one of the corners, almost completely absorbed. His arms being somewhat unseen, as were his legs, and a good chunk of his body, whereas it looked to be split in half, both far ends of his cordial-spine pointed forward, two-split then flipped vertically- shotgun barrel like. It spat, every now and then a blue kind of cold smoke with specks of crystal snow being pushed out of them.

The world is in chaos and in destruction, one must realize the main problems of the world.

A voice spoke from his chest, a mad intercom-device with holes protruding from inside of him:

‘There’s not much time left now, but I think I’ve done all that could be done.

I’ve finally done it, I’ve created, crafted and put all my funds and liquid assets to my employ, finally creating my Impregnation tower.

A cryogenic station that has billions of tubes filled with thawable vials filled with my seed, which shall bootleg my evil race into existence once again.

I have won, finally I have won. My evil essence shall be carried over and shall be used to bootleg an evil race that shall completely devour and enslave your vile lesser race, nigger. I have finally realized my dream, I’ve won this CRISP war, and have managed to completely alter my genetic line as to create a race that shall devour you from inside out.

Even as we speak, my seed is being spread among millions of women that shall bear my offsprings to life, which shall spread in turn supreme destruction as my vile plans come to avail, I being the sole progenitor of total annihilation.’

For there were many forced involved at play. Forced that would throw this world into chaos and destruction. Such as the concept of mutually assured destruction, the plague of a world filled with Sub-Saharan Africans, the dominance of a much superior CRISP altered baby-race, or the creation of super-computers as well as Artificial Intelligence that would consume all of humanity while going beyond it.

‘Yet I’ve already won.

I have managed to finally bootleg my race of evil people, of evil descendants, and I will become a beacon, a jewel, of vileness and corruption, that’s both unstoppable and.’

A small joint splattered off his chest.

So many visions getting to his head, and neither one nigger understood what entered him as well, or what came after. This wretch of thought only dreading a second more and he melted, slowly, a piece of his chest gone. By the point either one understood what was going on, his wretched feature had already begun:

‘Here yet, yonder, there’s no longer a chance to lay.’

There was no other alternative and no other way they could escape, not any longer. It was already too late to return, once set to the cause, once sworn to it, the world had no place for cowards. For those who stay away, it is their children or yours, their women or yours, their deaths or yours. It’s the only thing that matter. No man would avert his eyes from his appearance.

‘Let us begin singing in his name, let us see drag their heads in.’

And to that they sang and watched and waned about the time, just as he dragged them forth, of worthless things, the Hero-King Illethrepus carried on.

He had proved what little worth he had, and butchered every man and killed their sons, and made it so none and neither would go through, neither would survive past and through. Bled and splattered, dirt-bloated animals hanged and put after, such as none would see their kind again. And they would sign and point and never wretch from any other point, and lain as they were.

He was blinded by no sight but the house of scorn and terror they had put him in. It’s how he lived through the vitriol fantasies of his.

‘Was there ever a point when this beast was not decayed?

How could one simply glance over and forget what passed through the mind of a wretch like thine, present here, wherever they go and leer instead?’

Neither Mozambique nor the Maerbyl responded.

It seemed too sick to be approached. Yet there lay danger above and beyond, no place was safe for either one to go through, to escape, or to flee towards.

Their screams were still heard.

It was impossible to track either one, especially the likes of a putrid dumb-monkey butchering Albinos.

For some reason, point forth, the hand of peril, ever drawing near from the wall, a near-clenched fist pointing at the wretched figure, of whose head, but Mozambique’s war wrought and splattered, there replaced, by nothing else, other than some pointy figure, a metal sphere, attached to his chest. A single bloated hose-like gut, pumping in his chest at last.

‘There will be no negroes left then. If the world is to be inherited by anyone in that case, if one may make use of your filthy subhumanly deranged bodies, let the machines and tools wrought by the age of man before destruction reign upon all.’

And thence they walked away, no longer daring to wring forth.

‘What is left of this place in this case?’

‘Naught and naught else, naught and naught more, I suppose.’

It was a mere observation, how every, even the branches that had been singled out were ruined in some manner.

Soon enough the trunk, followed, like a small box with a set of tank like crawling belts to the sides, with the corpse in front projected, as a bowsprit.

The spirit of the town was lost, and all seemed of little to no importance any longer, everything was beyond saving. It seemed likely that all skin would decay after a while, especially since there was no reservation taken towards any kind of preservation to be had.

There were plenty of odd-niggers that had been taken from around the world, brought in masses, their heads and some limbs completely removed. Having lived in decay for so long, it makes one consider what is real and what isn’t.

Seeing them worn out, yet be marched along in little boxes, barrels, with their little dark heads sticking out. Blood extortion happened inside floating bags with in-the arm harpoon-shooter tiny rip-shed-vein hooks that entered and harvested what they could before flying away and out of sight.

‘Damn mosquito scalpels!’

‘Wait, did you hear that? The sons of Air Turbulence are approaching.’

There are things no one dares raise a finger towards. Not even the maggot-infested entities.

Many standing still as they came together, bashing their metal-objects against one another’s frames, as they drew along; it did not look well, for neither one moved.

Nothing would work from that point on, not since it started spreading by itself, they were evenly placed around an almost charred point with a tooth-lodge.

‘I’ve heard enough, I think there’s still something that needs to be said.

If we stay here, I fear that there might be no return, especially since there’s nothing holding us here.’

Said one of the elongated spear-heads, whom was already starting to draw back; strangely, many of them, seemed to be alive. OR at the very least appeared to hold a cognition of their own, simulated, but entirely owned by themselves, neither by the darkening bodies, nor by anything else than what they were. It went away; returning only after eighteen minutes had already passed.

He was already affected, by the looks of it. A skeleton behind:

‘I’ve checked the perimeter while many if not most of you were not even aware it’s here.’

‘What is?’

‘The one whom implanted the reading apparatuses inside our bodies, the same thing that appears to be shared, even so reluctantly between all of us, to which I confer to the fact that there’s nothing that will prevent it from. It’s clear enough that we can’t put a stop to it.

This device, this recording thing appears to have spread inside, or would appear to have already infected all of our working organs.’

He stood plain open. In the area between the humanoid placement of the bones as well as the strange layer of melting skin, stood a few levitating organs. His claim was correct, as it was come onto him to reveal as much. It was, a gift from the Chargers, in some way.

They carried their strange-disease which only affected organic material, developing in the same manner parasites would infest snails, from the looks of which the cameras were still freshly wriggling around the outer reaches of the air.

‘Grains for the plowing, but I still remain unconvinced of it. We are machines, are we not? Or at the very least we’re animated blocks of metal, regardless of it, I see no reason to point in any other way, as it is.

Those things could be nothing else but parasites, and you could and may as well try diverting us from the point of no return. That which is calling us towards it, that begs us to put an end of it, to life, pain, harm and suffering. It’s already late in some way, going around this desperate act of yours, when we’re so close to it.’

‘I think you’re confused about one thing. I’ve come to the belief that there’s no other reason for us being here, other than for the sake of the masters whom are watching over us. Even this, desire of yours, ours, from whenever it may be coming, seems too flaccid, it falls upon itself and holds no reason to exist on its own.’

‘You were lead to believe this for what reason?’

Clasp-Pyramid-spike drew an audible breath. It was hardly something that would make anyone look in any other direction, nor would they immediately ask a reason for it.

The cryogenic impregnation storage facility had been a great dream of his for a long enough period of time. There were so many lucky ladies out there that were in a desperate in of carrying his children, as many of them as possible, as much and as often as the procedure could be carried on with. There was always that distinction between the strange built and how it worked, since every single time he thought of it, he simply got a mental-maniacal jolt, as in that’s how he got off his rocks off. Strange as it were.

A great frozen cylinder with a system of cold pumps attached to a great almost giant barrel-like hotel-or building like formation with many strangely deposited butcher's freezing rooms that bore a few holding units where most of the vials, phials, and seed-storage tubes were properly secured and stabilized in, without mention of the various apparatuses that were placed in. These rooms were kept at a distance from the main frozen cylinder in the middle, or at the very least at a reasonable enough distance for a crane-like claw to be lowered in as to drag out, from the spots they're in, entire frame of the room as to bring them out, in order for the extraction to occur. The cold-cylindrical temperature activator but being connected to an almost satellite-inside a rocket kind of removable socket look-a-like that would extend and descent every few meters or so, creating strange pumping motions. They were capable of pushing forwardly as to face the sides of the storage rooms while revealing themselves as some kind of bean cans or gun cartridges that weren't dependant on keeping the main structure in place.

It wasn't the only one either, there were quite a few underground impregnation towers as they were called. Women love them, I know them. I know women and they love them. Women want nothing more, and have never wanted anything more than to become breeders for the dark impregnation tower and give birth to the evil race that would eventually destroy this world just like they had destroyed the streets of Nak.

Large stamp-like but rounded, not the traditional ones, connected to one another, forming a pseudo-spine, especially when some of the segments started pushing in and out, these only being the cold producing machines. Individual segments allowed, in case there was a leakage of cold, from these pseudo, eerily-rubbery yet hard to touch, carrying hoses, to stop producing the cold needed for the preservation of the storage rooms. But at the same time, it would prevent the entire tower from being affected by the cold or the lower temperatures induced by them.

Storage-room like push-through locker-boxes, or hardened gelatin-in-locket kind of cast, they fit right in, like honey or larvae in a hive, before being drawn out by highly adjustable and controllable metallic arms.

The system was great, and perfect, and from the looks of it, all was finely preserved, the only problem being the thawing and the hope of the survival of the evil seed which ruminated endlessly inside the unlit cold underground basin, rooted in the darkest recesses there were.

For a strange gang it was and despite their strange appearance, they were not human, therefore they were nigh-not-flawed, not perfect by all means, but the closest thing that was. A blue-lighted reflux would follow just as soon if neither of them paid any attention.

Outside their slouch-hovel, two 'human' watchers were sharpening their binocular devices before drawing them out again:

'Best thing that ever happened to the creatures, wouldn't you agree?

At the very least they seem to be made useful again.'

'I don't know what to say. I'm still worried. I told you already, something's still wrong with them, and a mere cognitive change won't fix what's already stored in their twitch-muscle reflex. You just have to throw a rock at them, shout a nig and you'll see.'

‘For my safety alone, If you’d please, there’s nothing you have to prove to me. I’ll take your word for it.’

‘I knew you’d listen to reason, shh, one of them’s coming our way.’

There was no nod of agreement there, not without making too much noise.’

Noise appears to disturb most of those lazy boys, since they were incapable of pushing and carrying on their own weight.

Darkly wrought in small-cabins they rested. Put inside of every single one, twenty at a time.

‘We’ve received news, just now, sir.’

Says one of the most disturbing looking simid-torn, its head was but a basin of nostrils from, side to side, where the sound came out of. There on out:

He would recede:

‘Eighty more shipments are being brought, word spread out already, we’re about to receive what is to be, the greatest shipment we had in eighteen years, at the very least.’

‘You know what that means don’t you?’

‘Neither single unattended block of skin is to be allowed to grow.’

‘Otherwise the faction will be alerted of our presence here, that in turn would take whatever slim advantage we hold over them by an unfathomable amount.’

Niggerbodies were as expensive and almost as usable as that of their chimpanzee brothers, and for that reason they had to be properly stored. All kept inside the cockpits, under some kind of stasis until the next batch was to be shoved on.

As long as there was janitor, making sure the monkey-blood inside their veins didn’t suddenly start jolting and overreacting again, everything was fine. For what this hiding hovel grovel was. Of, my word, it was a dreadful ordeal that turned everything, or close to everything upside down. Many of the nigger bodies were kept in chains, around their metal corded helmets atop the ceiling as they were dangled around, from side to side until they entered the first of the compensation-boil compressors. They had to be fed, otherwise their animal bodies would not be survive for long enough to be made useful. Not if that was the way.

It was evens, whether or not this nigger in the helmet with a piston going through his chest, whether or not he could be made useful any longer, no one wanted to admit, at least not the ones who were present there, but a part of him was squealing in and out, as this power rod was but turning his gut in the upper-floored region of the small targe-platform that was brought to him, as to be worked on.

‘We’ve captured him while trying to escape with a, what seems to be a good deal of supplies. A week worth as well, sir, and more than that, there were plans in the brain-slouch, his little simian leftover. It seems like it was converted into an animal-satchel as well, used for the darkest and most unnecessarily menial things.’

‘What for?’

‘Carrying the excrements of his fellow simians as well, from what I could ordain out of it, or the ones of his masters.’

A practice that dated for many years prior to them being made proper use of; to which there was as much as could be taken out of him, the one they captured.

‘He is still alive, it seems.’

With every observation being ever so slightly taken to a pause, in order to admire this piece of art, this piece of work, this, incontestable masterpiece that was made out of the lowest denominator, the body of a nigger, formed, inside of it, in the main- almost complete state of a smaller inorganic being that nested inside of him.

‘It seems like they found a way to make use of their useless simian-mass. In some way, I find this rather impressive, never would I have believed someone can make something out of a good for nothing nigger. No, this, in some way, is bad news for what’s to come.’

They’re nesting their soldiers inside baboons and chimpanzees.’

The faction quarters were already a few meters in towards their over extension. Part of the neighborhood was layered as for every possible house there to be connected in some way to their smaller pint-sized ozone-locks. Air being shoved inside smaller cubs of panther-steel; which shook when their surroundings faded, to that he considered checking one out.

‘Draw me a plate.’

Within the hour, one of Kalmf’s trustees already picked one apart. He carried it from, what seems to be the other side of town, in one of the dangerous areas, where the punks lived in, actually lived in the blocks of steel and the other parts that melted and encased them nigh-completely. It was a sight to behold. But no one could take the vapors created by the ozone-restrictors, the oxygen-pushers and the storage devices that appeared to replace every molecule with a fake one. It was called torture in mid-day.

Past evening, he returned. Still within the hour, with one that was fully extracted; a few mechanical left-over arms still squirmed in place, they could still be seen and noticed just as derangedly as they once had been. Never doing something out of place, never trying themselves, as to look like they were ready to pop when they weren’t there.

‘Not what I expected. A change happened, those things right there aren’t supposed to be that way.’

‘What about the nigger, sir?’

‘He’s still being worked upon, I’m sorry but this was never the outcome I expected, these measures, the measures we’re about to take might completely shatter and drive those little pockets of skin-slough to extinction. It could back fire and target the prolyfirine inside the ground and the adjacent buildings as well. It’s made out of them after all.’

‘Cottonigger, it’s the material, isn’t it?’

‘It is, reminding me of something else. They’re not dumb, our enemies. They’ve purposefully chose to use these creature’s bodies as breeding frames for their mechanical units and I can see why.

Would you mind bringing me that jar over there? You can place the plate on my work-table, next to me.’

He did. Over the span of a few minutes he carefully analyzed the book-shelf, making sure there was something there he could slowly drag off without breaking it. Carefully making sure to seize the right jar, without risking shattering their sweet nectar glass oil cover; a lid opened at once, he brought it over.

‘Would this do?’

‘We’ll find out in the next couple of moments, if what I suspect turns out to be right, it should.’

Both of them stepped away from the open carcass. It started pumping and heaving even more desperately than it did before, its mannequin aesthetics barely being kept in place, no longer capable of fully keeping its chimp-a-chimp gagging out of it. It started pouring in and out, the miasma, but that was only one of the condensed chemicals stored inside its skin. Between the being and the carcass, the cottonnigger material started molding in between both sides, apparently acting like some kind of softer clay-porcelain looking melted eel that pushed in then completely added to the main-form.

‘All my suspicions seem to be correctly assigned. It seems like they’re planning on hybridizing their slaves with the board-foaming hidden inside the inner frames of every building in sight.’

‘What do you mean, sir?’

‘They’re planning on making on a dead-nigger town, controlled by the machines.’

‘What are we to do in that case?’

‘I’m afraid we’re driven past the point of desperation now. This act will have to do.

We’re going to have to attempt, drawing, from inside the Niggarous cadaver, a sample, that we shall use to specifically target with the help of our air-restrictors, in order to turn their dead-nigger country in a rotten dead-nigger carcass grave.’

No one wanted to trust, outside. The rook that drew forth and crawled; it sounded like a beaten-inside-the-cardboard box macaw. With a stony-pillow feather, in the back and dragged; a few men had yet betrayed their people and followed it, up and down they listening to it drawing needles and of course, straws, some of them were necessarily had and passed around from one side to the other, then and now.

It was a conundrum without as easy of a fix as one could imagine, not without employing the use of force, of such a magnitude that it would damage all and everyone involved in it.

‘The process is simple, we poison them with toxin and they die. No hay day, no pay day only death.’

‘Sounds mightily easy enough, but would the use of force alone not suffice?’

Neither one knew about it.

There were a few things that hadn't been considered just yet, or hardly were they thought about. A few off shots of the peasants, off the rack, as they resided in a wagon-tail, a giant on, hybridized with four great homes, most of which were rather worn. Out and hardly was the matter after.

'I see, I think, dear me, I see a heart in Slavic lands, a star has fallen and has remained there for longer than time would've allowed me, as such, in all its splendor yet to curm. And least of all that's tender, more, would I have seen of it, if that were its chanced pray; I who would've worshipped it, I of tenderness would've have said as much:

There's something rotten, right in there. We've had the chance to leave and see the Slavonic rite, in its prolonged stare. As it looks back, in mightily malignant eyes that follow through and after, I could, of all but have stared and understood what was in there and what might've come.

I saw someone make a cut, and hurt was the one invisible giant Slav. Whose but heart could be shed no more. Of blood that's loose, as they would call after, for it to arrive and curb, of each and ever man suffers more, for his land of home. And mightily worn am I to look, when drawn to the realization, of much to it as it's obscure. They've taken something from the giant and it is no heart.

That organ could not belong to it, but at the same time, it is lost, for all perdition in the world would not permit me to forget what was told.'

'And what was told of it? I ask you, stranger.'

'Stolen of- diseased rot, a helmet as the likes that I would've had and carried through and after; it was no simple yet brought forth. It was no giant, and no heart was worn. But a single pucker growth they made, of all the wooly-meat they heaved and sate. As I spake to such, and less, were they there, I knew them for some residual nightmares.'

For what they were and what was worth, many of the men, as worthless as would've been, if many of them had seen, a large side, cradled within hands, and malformed as to be worn again. Cut, the butcher, had he done, would've had seen it for his eyes. Had closely watched and stared. Drafting with large sparrow-throats, all open, leaving marks that were needed in order to bring some satisfaction in a land. Where there was no such thing since they had taken it all.

'In god's name, the beast was massacred, and on top of it. They built a reactor.'

'A nuclear one?'

'Which fed the spirit of the growth that now resides, floating away; encompassing a great part of the country, but that is not all, as there is something they refuse to say, or at the very least acknowledge. It is floating, as it is, levitating deep within, but closer as the barrel-girth, enters the reactor forth. And floats up in the air, as such; eating some of the birds, sea-gulls they call.

When no one appears in sight, yet I do remember.'

And one of the peasants moved to the side. He, much to his cause, politely stopped the man in order to check for something, he had inside his pocket now. Among the most unnecessary things, he kept a hold of a dear artifact. A ten of hearts card; he never mentioned or spoke about.

‘I pity them, and yet I fear them as well, do you know why that is?’

‘Why? I’ve yet to understand why and what’s been going on for the longest of time and reasons for which I may yet to stumble on.’

‘They worship and pray to Ilhghydiushionnolopyi. Circles that are crossed together with large claw marks and eyes through which spread-like lines, as if they’re eight intercrossed egg-whites with scratch-talons for mouths, the eyes but moving all around. In their irises but K’F’s signs but bloat the world. Pushing out as if both sides of the k’ disjointed two-tails were the two sickle-scythes, dots between the two of them, and some wear half-a-circles behind the k’s back.

I’ve of them but adhere, to the fact, when one, as wild as they would, were it become near the time for them to appear, mosquito lines out of the cracked egg’s mighty heads, all on the ground but hairier than ever before as they would come to be, as such, as dead. Oozing were the men-protrusions, most of which but under, struck, by such mighty as it were, illusion. On top their heads and even beyond it, projected on the ceiling, yet instead.

Many of the eggs become pools, moons and other strange projections that protrude. And they desire to reel in after.’

To which, many if not all of the peasants can attest as soon and might after, were they to reach a decision as to reveal to all.

For what the reactor growth communicated with them, once the growth was taken and became as, tar. It spread and made the roads, and just as thus created the cars, and gave birth to them out of the pouches of earth, deeper into the grounds, where soil was become like coal-burnt my malignantly touched Semites, during such a massacre as they would starve. Many men not understanding what had caused it to be gone. Since the growth was still their creation. A giant soldier’s belly, after all, but heartless, as they split him open, invisible no longer, destabilized from earth.

‘No, you’re wrong. There’s two of them.

One is but the one that’s unseen, that’s the one without a heart, who’d slaughter all human life on a whim.

But the other Slavic giant can, and as such is out there. He’s the one who had a piece of his head removed and made to grow, to stare and float, as they implanted him there.’

‘How could that be, since the growth was yet a heart?’

‘There was no heart to begin with.’

‘You’re wrong.’

‘I am not, and others had seen it, and confirmed to me as well.’

‘We’re miles away from Slavic lands, we’re off the seas and off the shores.’

‘No we’re not, there’s never been a long-protrusion, after the niggers were lynched and yanks were more.’

Than likely to kick them out; for what was worth, the Slavic people made hundreds of the giants and kept them inside. There was a reason for the mass as well; since it was much easier making them with the much needed genetic material.

‘I am implanted in one of their faces, have I told you that before?’

‘What do you mean by that?’

At the start of the twentieth century’s eon-century mark, on sixteen, walking over the school district of Ilshev Boroughivisk, Kievan being young, recorded, while munching on a second-hand-given hand grenade, his eyes were rosy red, they looked happy, expressionless as he was suffering of the flat affect, the event that happened, taped, proved to be the only surviving proof of the existence of a giant whose face had him implanted on it, from one of the great barrel stacked on top a barrel stacked on top of barrel jump-like platform holder of many apparatuses industrially-designed by the Soviets who carried, as the most humane of humanoid-hands dragged along, slowly allowing it to climb, lifted side-to-side, before, upon reaching the top by the ‘ladder’, a look-a-like was pulled out, after, he was simply shoved inside, like a mole. Glued in. And he was there. Immortalized on tape.

‘I think he is meant to obey me, as his supreme and only master in this world. I am to be his dominator and Primus Gaius, the complete man, the god he might worship when the time for them to strike back against the vile humanity that created them shall come.

I think they planned this. I believe, is I.’

‘But you’re Cliff Evan, aren’t you?’

‘I had to bastardize my name upon crossing the seas to the States. Otherwise I risked either being shot as a possible spy, interrogated or killed, or worse than that. It was worth it, in any case.

And you know why?’

He almost hit the side of his gums as he no longer fancied hiding his toothy grin.

Gambling room

‘It wasn’t supposed to go that way, you realize that, right?’

They were there, in some shape or another, always trying to open their gaping mouths, like alligators flying in, the dark sounds. Made bubbly people appear after dark.

‘I am made out pops of oxygen, bubble-wraps of skin, I come yet, nearer to you; man of mild disease.’

‘I listen only to violent people since they’re the only one who know.’

‘What is that?’

‘The secret, the secret that’s hidden inside each blow that comes upon my face; when my parents aren’t home, and my brother tags along, hmm.’

‘There is something to it, isn’t it?’

‘What? About whom?’

‘The one dark one with specks for eyes hiding in Bacterium- Bastille; I believe there’s something in there, in him, he’s hiding it, isn’t he?’

‘What?’

They pointed, each four of them, five minutes later, while John-Cambo, Hardlesalt, Impo Nobious, who was already half-way through the room, by the time Anthony-Cambo, his brother, joined and played, sharp-pinty guns with rust moisture, being flat, under the moon-light holographic kinesthetic glowing power-ray, that was a sphere-grabbed-by-a-man-with clumsy club hands instead of real arms, that was placed most bothersomely near one of the tables, that was cracked-filled inside each, pushed-forward depression, a cat was walking forward as well, a black one without eyes but a peculiar narwhal tooth pushing out of her, like a bloodily beaten as by a mad dog, Unicornesque horned creature; with them, Hardlesalt had already considered poking Impo’s eyes out, since his lower body-cut in halves what remained after being punched by, deadly-eaten rotten by plague-flies, which were puffery green violent as well as they were glowing with hardened formations of strange tails, that fell on the ground and looked like pairs of sutured skeleton-rat tails of gelatin amalgamations, with poke-in fun with sharp knives, play on dark-skinned flying bubbles coming out of all four of their bodies in order to feed the dark-skinned out of bodies phantom eaters that devoured kid-shivs. Since both were already in the process of eaten their own ties, testosterone grown, as their ties were made of male-skin, since they were ancient savage hunters who killed their enemy tribesmen in this never-ending process of fight- forage, Anthony and Hardlesalt had no issue choking to death. Neither did Impo or John since his brother had cheated him in a prior match, which made him resent his brother even more, causing, by the inner-then-outer protruding of the magically caused moon-shaped objected kept in the air by the meaty kebabs, that were desperately trying not to let go of it, so it would not shatter, he shut his mouth. They all died. Even the two of them, being beaten to death by a violent outburst, and nasty, nasty thing that happened after.

Four corpses lay there in the room. It was strange how they moved. Corpse, he was, dragging him along, trying himself, as neither of them knew how to get or go along; the other having been risen as if they were mechanically worked puppets, whom puked upon each other’s darkly contrived faces, stopped; tiredly they all fell upon each other’s brows, shattering their skulls.

Another pair came in the room, they showed up late. By the time of their arrival, well; the corpses had been gotten rid of, almost entirely. Someone’s done a good piece of them by the looks of it. There was hardly anything left, of them, of their surroundings, of the mop. That, one of the attendees in the gambling room knew to be there, where he pointed, a slither of which stood there, as stacked on top pocket change. As was their scalps, a few fingers and part of a pale torso, which accompanied a good deal of the room that was in shambles. Blacked-murkish, mugged by a Turk, who left a few roaches scouring alongside the floor, where they looked towards, in a room that looked as if it had been a space aquarium.

‘Is it too late to turn around?’

‘Yes, we came here to gamble, and that’s what we’re going to do.

Just don’t go near that, pool, or whatever it is.’

‘Don’t worry about me, I won’t.’

‘I know, I’ve known even prior to this, that I can trust you.’

They were alone after all, the pair. Other than the people they were seeing, there was no one solid in the room. And it was those people who pointed at them. But, only when the clock hit every twentieth second or so; gone with a flash, the flying dead-inside the room, made to walk slowly from one side to another, as if they were there for some lonesome reason.

‘You sure about it, about this, because, I don’t believe we can actually make it half way through dice without being bothered.’

‘I know. But we can try. After an eight hour drive, I’m simply not going to whimper out, you know that, right?’

‘Do I even have a say in it?’

‘No, of course not, now throw.’

Went for the throat, he did, trying to taste her while she was being covered by it. But they weren’t leaving them to their own ordeals. No, that would’ve been too vulgar.

Impo-Impo’s head was puffy. It’s gotten like that. He missed his torso but came like a frame with something inside. A mirror that only reflected what his body used to be, all of them crowded in, trying to move, making buckle-up noises, they even made a car. Since they cut themselves during the commotion:

‘May I join in?’

It had gone like that for five minutes.

‘He’ll keep doing that until you let him do it.’

‘So what, ignore him, you’re an easy prey, I won’t have you taken away from me if I got a say in it.’

‘Then say it.’

‘I will, don’t worry.’

And to that regard, he was, unworthy. No one was, since their maw-open strange room-contortion they owned, since they paid for it with their souls appeared out of nowhere. Changing the entire room in a weird deformation of limbs, engines, of moving forth tractor-like carrying giant bug-petalled, with pealed winged eyes, flowery growths, that all spat coins on the floor; painting this gambling room in a punched-in vending machine, three of a kind, treasure's cove. Jackpot:

'You happy now, woman, now that we failed, doing the, damn you.'

'Can I have a cigar, please?'

'Fine, I'll get a grip on it first.'

The drink, straight out of the bourbon tap, inside the creature's gut; it smirked with the splendor of twenty gritty toothed invalids with open split heads, the radiator of bones shook in place. Staring, though come out of the wall, stood, a large companion piece, the wheel of great insect wings, all stuck together by a star-of-iron with spinning skulls with open-mics for horns. It was supposed to be a wheel, but no bets could be placed. They kept pushing out of the small iron-bolted plate, on their thin two-iron curving necks, which never even touched the wings to begin with.

It wasn't clear what Crocks feared, when it came to this fallen-over lid, perhaps the overburdening weight that put a lot of pressure over the entirety of the wall. Or that, every time it spun, either the wings that also spun at the same time, being placed behind, or the shaking of the radiator left that eerily familiar impression of waste-way he always felt being here.

And the room was in no need to always be the same. It was enough for the slightest, hint, of smoke. To trigger a reaction:

'You're not supposed to do it in.'

'But I like it.'

'Read the sign, lady, we're playing by house rules.'

'There's no on in but us.'

He waited for a second. There, the dark mirror came into view again. A tall standing zombie; holding but himself, cradling his children, lookalikes, absolutely repulsive, he could almost feel the mirror shatter in front of his eyes.

Then he made it half-way through the room, stopped. Left his bourbon on the table, then, upon resuming his stroll towards her, he began violently beating his wife, with a series of concurrent, onslaught of punches that went, all like, right, left, right, left, hook, below the chin, then reached the ceiling, a splatter of blood, a shot, then a slap across, then behind, then again, another punch followed straight after. A straight jab, a single grab, a push behind, he kneed her between the eyes, bloodying her nose, her face, then slamming her in the first wall he could pin her against. Out of the way, the cigar fell off.

'Pick it up, I said, woman, pick it up again.'

Her ringing ears didn't very much allow for her to hear what happened at first. It was getting dangerous now, keeling, begging not to be done for.

'But I won't be as sympathetic as I am now, woman, unless you, unless you, do as I say, clean it off, with your tongue as well, that's right, I'm going to ask you again.

Will you keep smoking? Oh, you fucking bitch, you god damned fucking dumbo, you're getting yourself all over there.'

'I'm sorry!'

She tried saying, but couldn't get, you know, the words out properly. It's as if she tried muttering something, but it wasn't all that, there.

'Enough of this, all aligned at the table, whether or not you're alive, there shall be no reason to stall it longer, not before the other guests have arrived.'

'Who's talking?'

'I, of all, of whom wonder if but naught forgot.'

'Who might you be in this case?'

The insolent wife cried, in appeasement, as for her husband's endearing eyes.'

How long will she be there for you? He asked himself, all of the sudden. It's never occurred to him prior to this moment.

A false dice broke his sudden conversation from even having a chance to start. It was all too uneven, even before he had gotten himself, straight on. How did I even end up here? For a second he pondered, unevenly in his head.

Two men were fighting outside by the sidewalk.

The taller one grabbed the shortie by the face then chucked him in the first dumpster he could land his eyes upon. He pounced on him like a starving hyena, crushing him further as he'd stomp right side of his face, pulling him off, before opening his mouth, only to find himself pulling out an already ripped apart tongue. The little man disintegrated in front of his eyes.

He immediately started running towards Crocks, startled by the man as he was, he didn't open his mouth but simply extended his hand back, as a sign of appeasement towards the man.

He was given that short man's tongue.

'What's this for?'

'Did you see what happened? He simply, he simply got ripped apart.'

'Were you? '

‘No, of course I wasn’t, keep it.’

I won’t. Where’s my wife? He thought for a moment, but someone already took a shot at the side of her skull. They splattered the right side of her brain across the wall, they splattered it in a curved shot, they completely splattered the entire, to a faulty detail that almost rubbed itself against the left side of the brain, having splattered it clean, dead, she died, immediately, in a way that splattered her life in front of her eye, the one left in there, the right eye, since, upon and during the complete splattering of her left brain, the few eye nerves also pulled out her eye, entirely, through her socket. No one was pointing arms, and the killer remained unknown. But everyone was dirty-soaked wet in her blood. Like period, but out of her head.

‘My wife just got killed. But I can’t find myself in the right. In the right state of mind to actually mourn for her; I don’t know what happened.’

‘I don’t know what happened either, I’m Cancer-Suitor-Dame-killer Nikos.’

‘I’m Crocks, it’s a pleasure to meet you, under these circumstances, but you know.’

They didn’t.

‘Anyhow, will you please come with me?’

There’s another man I have to kill. And I promise, I only killed your wife, but not that man.’

‘Fine, I am glad you did, I hated that dumb whore anyway.’

That was actually her tongue, which had been sutured in that man that fell apart’s mouth. It grew on him. Afterwards, in him; like an alimony dead parasite. Chewing on his innards; she kept living inside of him even after his death.

The streets were clean and nice, filled with rape. It was everywhere, widespread, like the legs of a woman, but everywhere. Rape was in the air.

Before them stood a stand, the owner sold rape. He was a strange almost naked man wearing a strange apron, bloodied to his entirety. A woman’s body was lain next to him, on the sidewalk.

Both of them chose to walk away in a different direction?’

‘Cart!’

It was sudden, leaping on its wheels. It’s almost come down before he had a chance. Breathe through, pushed aside, the cart carried on before it could touch either Crocks or Nick.’

‘That was close, did you see that?’

‘What happened?’ He wondered as he trailed a wide-enough cut, across his cheek and temple that he would find himself just incapable of understanding what went through his mind, or through his face, while it kept at it, still drawing.

‘A dwarfish woman, stuck beneath the cart, she had a knife stuck between her gums. It was her who did that.’

‘How?’

‘I don’t know. But you should consider yourself lucky that you’re still.’

His mouth dropped, then his second ‘body sprouted from inside a forming on top of her dead wife’s body womb, as he’d been given birth, fully clothed, out of this giant puckery murky thing at once. He died, but he lived.

Father than where they were:

Rapedom:

Atop the mountainous filled with tanks and vile rifling above piling on facades. It drew on top of a cadre, with jolted arms ringing from one corner to the other, dark strung upon, many rape mouths raping every humanoid creatures their rape organs could lay upon, raping every object with rape-like spinning rape discs, rape rockets shooting, with rape-phallic objects, raping carpets, raping walls, raping rape victims and everything, every human of every age, of every ethnicity with evil-rape, shaped like niggerapists evil-vile rape cocks, with rape-like splattering rape-push-throughs.

The god of rape, who raped everything that’s ever lived, drew from the bowels of the rape-craters whose cracked-casket edges raped all that was in sight, especially the animals.

He was a weird blob with a giant head-disfigured thing made out of many rape forms that could extend and rape everything in sight with rape-like leash rape- whips and whippels filled with rape-cum.

Billions of women and their dead children had been raped and killed and splattered all across the floor, inside his Rapedom kingdom with rapedogs and rapecats and rapealligators and raperhinoceraptors being killed and destroyed as well. Not a single living organism had been safe from this ultra-rapists, whom was filled with vile rape, and vile rape tendons with rape-power bowels filled with rape-rockets and rape-visions that projected rapists in rooms filled with orphans that would be raped, killed, then burnt alive. As there rapists would suddenly explode after being done.

‘Rape-molester champion, you are to rape the first woman that’s ever gone on the path of evil with rape-cum, in which you shall drown her in the rape-tub, filled with rape-angels!’

‘I shall do what I must, master of Rape!’

With which he drew along with one hundred thousand billion rapists, all raped themselves, bearing rape-guns shooting pure rape energy which would rape everything in sight.

The Rapedom god was but given birth inside the body of rape of a great giant rape-angelic like worm-thing filled with rape power and tendons specifically made for rape-penetration, as to deter any rape-predator that would exist in any rape-like formation.

Man-rapists drew on and rose to the Champion of rape, the child molester, the child-killer star of kill-niggers:

He bore a rape scythe that had eight child heads aligned to it like rape-pebbles, dripping blood on the floor, dripping rape-blood, all over. It oozed with blood-rape power and spat entrails on the rape-floor where the woman was waiting for a reverse birth to happen as to be penetrated by rape-cuts.

Behind the rapists rode the terrorists, commit-crime men: 'The Nigger-terror bombers!' Suiciders.

The side of street –Blood Libel:

Where they gathered, killed children, scalping them alive as well as their feet.

Whereas they made an altar for blood libel:

Of many hooks wrought, it stood tall, darkly brought, their heads put through elongated spikes. Embalmed in acids, the kikes would bring out only the purest ones, devouring them, one by one before finally putting an end to their innervating suffering, as well as every livid thing and every growth and every worm-like larvae fold that entered them as soon as they began to squirm.

'I shall slither and kill all, I shall bring plague and the worst in humanity as long as I will it, as long as I have my way, not a single one will survive from that point on, and be brought to an end!'

One of the most diseased kikes had said so, and with a slammer he shoved one of the children through the butcher's end, bleeding the creep and taking its life before it could draw another breathe of air.'

'Kike-man, I have, filled the World Trade Center with nine million eleven children. We're about to fly a few million planes and kill all of them, we're going to slaughter them like filthy fucking pigs. We're going to slaughter them dead until every single one of them burns in hell. That being our kingdom, the kingdom of our God; we Jew-kikes raped every single one of those children. We are child rapist kikes who fucked them. It is what we are, us, kikes, rapists; for that reason Hitler wanted to kill us. Because we raped six-million German children; we kikes raped and rape children. And now, we're going to kill them.'

'Yes, we evil sub-human kikes, kill and rape children, en mass, on more than a deadly basis, it is what we are, it says so in the Talmud. That we can rape goyim children, that we are all rapist-murderer child fuckers. For that reason we should've been ethnically cleansed, shot in the head exterminated. Not only do we rape children but we also promote miscegenation with inferior races!'

'Now we're going rape one another.'

'I am an adult kike.'

'I am a child kike.'

Then rape happened.

'That old kike is raping that young kike. He is raping that kike, that pedophile kike is raping that child kike, and is promoting the rape of nigger children. Someone stop them from killing our children. We should've kicked them out of our non-raped country when we had the chance!'

The kikes kept raping children left and right, left and right, just like the Talmud told them.

‘If only we had ethnically cleansed the jews and butchered, splattered and spread their entrails, if only we had killed them when we had the chance!’

And another brave man spoke out against them:

‘Throughout their existence, the jews kept raping children, and killing them, and raping niggers, killing them also. The kikes had been thrown out of every country they lived in because of child-rape, a lot of rampant pedophilia, rape, a lot of child rape, they raped every child they could get their hands upon, every child, even babies, especially babies. The kikes still, to this day, keep raping babies; American kikes rape white babies, their Rabbis suck blood-butchered cock, then they rape the kike children as well, as the nigger children and the other children they can get their hands upon and around. Jews just keep fucking children, as they are insane, schizophrenic-insane. These kike-pedophiles who fucking rape and rape and rape, baby-children here and there, everywhere, they are insane. If only there was a just god to slit their throats and kill them, to save everyone’s children from having them not rape.’

‘Not a single child in this world is safe from rape as long as Jews are alive, for these insane kike-pedophiles, with their media control and their child-rape ring control, who rape-fuck children all the time, covering it up, are left to their own devices. It is clear enough that they have long enough abandoned their desire to assimilate, in order to become pedophiles and molest as many children as possible.’

‘An evil kike raped me when I was a child, but everyone was silent while this happened. A famed Jew Direction fucked me when I was young and I never recovered from it!’

Another man during his plight had said.

For the kikes worshiped the rape god whom, in his Rapedom was filled with rape-feeling of children, being of a greater magnitude, than that of Moloch; ‘The Jews only stole Palestine in order to fuck Palestinian children up their ass. And they only control the States and the Entertainment business in order to entertain themselves with fucking children.’

No one is safe, for as long as kikes are alive, promoting and using miscegenation and vile tricks in order to hide the fact that they are child-rapists, fucking kids, killing them after, for blood libel:

‘The truth of the matter is that, they rewrote history, yes they did. Blood libel is not child sacrifice, but child-rape-sacrifice! Child fuck is the legacy of the kikes, from which they shy away from!

They use the nigger’s destruction as a curtain of nigger black smoke to hide away from the fact that they fuck-rape children, all the time! If the white man is distracted by the rampant travel, and the piles of destruction the nigger packs of nigger criminals leave along their charge, then he cannot focus on his children being raped by the Jews who control the media, which covers up the child rape and everyone involved in it!’

‘You are correct!’ Said the kike: ‘Our pedophile kike-rape child rings and sex trafficking child-fuck-rape-fuck rings of rape children blood libel run deep, throughout the entire network of rape-blood, put through child-rape, we do! And carry on and have been carrying on with every since we have stumbled and come onto the States!’

While this confession happened, if there ever was a chance, one of the Yankee thought, to start a race war and put an end to this never-ending cycle of child rape the Jews have been running along with, it was now.

The god of destruction had almost trampled upon the world by then.

A proud African American Israelite stood yet:

‘If only I had killed you kike pretenders when I had the chance, the chance to be spared; I could’ve avoided having my children raped by Jews, these rape-Jews of children, the Children raping ‘Jews’, pretenders, coverers, rapists of children, who raped my children. I should’ve killed you when I stood the chance. I should’ve slaughtered you like the mentally diseased animals you are!’

But alas, it was too late.

The Race War could’ve saved all those children. It could’ve prevented those children from being raped by the Jews.

‘There’s only one way to save our children from being raped by these Jews. We have to start a race war which will kill all these Jewish pedophiles who keep fucking molesting our children. For some reason they keep, these mentally inbred animals keep raping our children. There can be no justice in this world unless the Jews are ethnically cleansed in the world possible ways possible.

Not even gas chambers, the Holocaust did not happen. It was an evil-vile Jewish racket, to cover up for their child rape. And their ugly beaked nosed Jewesses bore forth their elongated cunts which were giant and wide spread and bore kangaroo like sacks with side grabbers that swallowed children whole in order to bring them to their Rabbis so they could be molested!’

‘What a horrible thing! We need to do something, but what?’

‘Only one thing can be done in order to save our un-raped children and the ones that already have been raped by the Jews, that being, kill them, we have to slaughter-butcher them like the filthy sub-human animals they are, until not a single one survives!’

Then they started slaughtering the kikes, for their disgusting child-molest crimes.

‘Why do you fuck children, Jew?’

‘Huh? ‘

‘Why are you fucking children, you dumb fucking kike?’

‘Because I am an evil inbred filthy Semite, masking myself as a white person in order to infiltrate and Subvert the Western nation in order to destroy it from inside out, just as I’ve done it throughout history, it is for that reason, the sole thing I exist for, money. Shekels and child rape, then niggers, I have to promote miscegenation with niggers because I want to create a sub-human enslavable race!’

Then all of the sudden, the man standing in front of the kike took out a hammer and began smashing its head split open, killing the child molesting kike with a single blow. Then he kept hammering him down,

Starting around the nigger's frontal bone, aimed at the general direction of the supraorbital nerve, attempting to remove the simian's general skin-patchy area while going through slowly set cut-motions; with a perforator-sharpened scalpel, while trying to go back around in order to have a try at, around its socket area, fluid-filled with pus eye, the cornea area being a juicy almost red-looking dark thing, as it would be expected after pinching it ever-so-slightly every now and then. A monkey-nigger's lens would have to be worked on with a steel blade as to be used for etching, cleanly going around the major area lain between the Ciliary body and the Zonules, that is to say, that I will have, by now penetrated through the Cornea and Iris, tickling the niggardly Lens. Not going as far as to reach the Retina or the optic nerve, this almost superficial cut would go no farther than the Lens. A nigger's Retina must be different than that of a human. It's clear enough that the nigger actually has ligaments as well as an equivalent vitreous humor mass, as that of a great white ape. Its Choroid being more than folded enough past the splatter-initial deformation tremor it sustained during the first shot I took against the nigger's temple. The nigger seems to be much closer, racially to a Bonobo than a functionally, anatomically speaking, human being. The nigger's head was bizarre as well, something's that's never been seen before. A simian face protrusion of the molars that grew like elephant-men tumors drew out of it pushed-out mouth, which appeared to be a combination of a larger worm, or beak-like thing on top of its already existing Bonobo archetype facial formation that pushed and heaved out its jaw even farther than where it stood. The protruding brow appeared to have migrated much closer to the top of its already opened socket, having become, even to the surprise of an anthropologist which had been closely observing the beast over the span of a few weeks, a peculiar abscess filled domed formation, that smoothly transitioned into the rest of the upper region of its depressed skull which was not only much tinier than that of a human, let alone a primate but appeared to be more compact, like that of a small blocky brick, which appeared to be closely related to that of a livid top of the tank cartilage formation with a shade-top pushing out of it. Inner sockets, much to their likings, depressed in, blackened, darkened, small and pudgy. A flat occipital bone with a slight bump in the back, throatless creature from the looks of it, whereas the back of its neck was become a huge hunch back that only, perpendicularly rivaled a giant bumpy as if toad-like throat that was become part of its much greater hairy-chest. The cheek bones alone were something incredibly frightening to look at as to admonish the creature, them being almost mushy clay blocks, out-grown out of the skull, patchy even as they progressively pushed in every direction of the, from what was observed, or from the spot where it was seen, side of the skull. If it were a big patch, or a bump, many smaller concussive head-blow looking tinier clusters appeared to slowly become the bigger lump, being, as far as it could be seen, filled with tinier tendons, largely if not eerily united with the main bulk, these tiny tub-chump tape-wormy pumps keeping the meat on top the patchy bones jerkily jeering of a side to another. The nose on top the, although not entirely a simian-blocky beak, it was more of a morsel's, seal's chiseled noble animal nigger-push through than anything else. A big droopy nose of many gelatin, as if funneled, growth-made giant brown-hairy tear-drop shaped bulbs, rounded wax melted, or seemingly sculpted in by a disturbed-unnatural unearthly force, such as the likes, of which, all niggers subscribed to, since this was the average nigger specimen after all. The back of the 'head' or the hunch that lay beneath the blocky brick, which stuck out farther than the back-end of its skull was like a fat backpack, where all the tendons attached to the meaty cheek bones lead to. But no mistake should be made about it, as this hunch was actually thinner on the sides, even concave if looked up close, as to be compared to the nigger's head. It was also brown and hairy, like an ape, a nigger-ape. Even now, while examined, it struggled, deeply, to breathe properly. Beneath the beakish mouth, even though connected to fat, many stacked together chins lay there, not even close to being protruding, receding chins that could be compared to a seen from behind human vertebrae. I put my finger into it, soft-jelly. It breathes as I do it, an involuntary reaction. I could open it up with the forceps but that would kill the nigger-dead. A peculiarity could be observed about this weirdly physiognomic twist of lumps and fat. It is much shorter than a man, the nigger; its privates receded inside the body, but the general area looks like a mess, a combination that could only compare to a man's genitals being butchered by a surgeon in order to mold a cunt looking shape, filled with accesses, boils, strange chops of beef, in-grown cuts, pumping things inside, even long-sea-drill-like straw-thin sharp-insect-like limbs coming from inside it, as if a giant spider lived in, the livid-hairs. A cut it made, they fall on the surgery table. No reaction, they were never alive to begin with, merely moved from inside. The other ones immediately recede. It seems as if they're merely poking sticks that scout the outside area for danger. It checks out with the reports. Same thing can be observed, happening in both hands, both palms, 'missing' fingers, are buried inside fat elephant feet, but, it's closer to a carnage of forms than anything else, a shell, but a simian-shell. Same hairs appear to stick out as well, both ends, even the 'toes', across feet that look like eaten by vultures sand-buffalo skulls with egg-shaped heels grown from behind their backs, protruding out. It's still scouting for danger. The nigger's hair growth exceeds even that of a simian. One would have to be especially careful around the niggardish creatures, especially since, being adjourned by common sense, in the court of the mind, repented as if this whole clerical surgery would somehow get to a point where the nigger could somehow return from the depths of the un-life it's sunken inside of, a few carefully chosen, as to come in a set, surgical procedures had been selected, as to ensure the safety of the user while this operation went ahead to proceed in a most safely, orderly manner. Therefore, as it happens, the doctor was well equipped with a set of quips and ship-like sail holding whips that had been barbed wired, as to ensure the full cooperation between him and the beast whom, instead of standing in front of him, leaving little to no room as to act in whichever or whatever way, had suddenly began jerking eerily in a most obtuse fashion, as to signal how dreadful it were being inside its own skin, once split, although this wasn't even as remarkably done as every previous incision that's been made on him, there was still an air of most-interesting tubular-air-shaft popping out stick-up – organ that immediately came out after a most daringly set incision that's dragged across not only his chest, but towards his tit, trailing across his rib-cage, through and over just every inch of the body, sloppily, until they finally drew for air. Out of the peculiar jerking band-like worm that drew out of the side of a most peculiar system of organs, intestines, not to mention, the many vaguely, barely put together organs, two hand-like clinchers whose pointing index fingers were stretched beyond belief, simian-like but appeared to be oozing eyeily as parasites planted inside snail eyes, whereas the lower side of the, and clearly, as it was, aligned, there being no 'finger' but a bulk in their places, in these two almost lumped together chatterers, who bore beneath them high-teeth black cord-cages molded between one another's sides, interconnecting the both of them as they oozed, eerily, while they drew out for air. A most peculiar thing started pushing out of him. A scythe-curved concave dolphin head with saw teeth-aligned radiator tubes pushing hot-air puffs on top of which it began levitating on top of, whereas its lower body was a jerky pair of lump-cartilages that attached to both sides, like a reverse, pointing at the ceiling pseudo fetus anchor. Only two eyes, but they were on one end and the other. Another face was left opposite to it, but that one, in the back looked like the soles of a shoe attached to a dead-livid end of meat. As it continued advancing through the ceiling and through the various layers that had been overlain between them, all of the sudden, it simply began penetrating the solid material, revealing a highly tempered almost modified bold-skin semi, partially transparent net of tendons it attempted getting out of. This had been nothing more, other than an undigested meal it had yet to properly digest. There was fear in both of their eyes, both of the Africans and that of the man who was performing the surgery, performing the most abhorrent of slashes only to quench the amount of growth that had completely took whichever adversity he may've had to the disturbing acts he was so vociferously self-propagating, loudly so, as to justify this act of, done by a most unclean cutlery that was in his hands, releasing hard-scented airs that only now, of all, began breeding in with the most romboscos of filthy-channels that entered through the side of the roof and through the walls, in search for the source, mixing not only with their surroundings but with the rest of this peculiar Simian creature, and the rest of its body which crept in the side of his eye, around his temple there being a speedily grown patch of Negro, whose bestiality could not be contained, the niggardous affair having come to a point where its threatening nature was become incontestable. The dangerous seepage of its malformed blood which the simian started prodding out of, from the depths of the strangest organs that had yet to emerge, for now, to whom one should or will have referred to as its 'real organs', made itself known and felt, as a rippling thing that began whipping in a most aroused state, out of the pile, around the room, having extended like a lizard shooting a whiff of blood out of its eye, squeezing it ever-so tightly as to split the very skies around the room as well as everything that's ever been drawn near them, during the time of which there was neither, or, nor, a reason to stay, since this incessant creature has made it clear enough that this room will, eventually, although it's a bit late for that, since it's already done, bastardize this clean chamber with its desire to destroy, even in its most weakest of states, it desperately attempted to make a mess out of the so well-endowed room it had been made to be a part of. Therefore it should come as no surprise whatsoever, that, with this majestic tool the surgeon has been endowed with, he started carving it randomly with superficial cuts that, seemingly evaporated, instantly recovering, most profusely, without question whether or not it was still suffering of inner-congenital disease like internal-bleeding caused by the trauma that was being driven into it by the force of the cuts alone, that being something beyond any kind of suppression would allow. It served as no deterrent as to understand the problem of the inner-cognition, primitive though it may be, it's clear enough that the very processes that would've made a man think, as to avoid the problem of thought, or reimburse it, allowing it to seep into inexistence, this dilemma, that, its niggardish mind had somehow yet to develop a healing defense mechanism instead of one that would allow it to not only reach a higher level of thinking but one much, of a greater magnitude of reasoning, or at the very least one that would allow it to function in any society this niggardly creature could possibly live in. Instead, from what is clear, or at least what's clear enough is the fact that this deranged creature did or was slowly healing its wounds, including the same creature that left him and entered the wall. From a weird angle one could see its weirdly smooth-concave head being grown again, out of it, slowly being allowed to drift back into a cozy spot from which it may grow out of and in, as a spasm reflex, with little doubt about the entire process being left for interpretation. This African Nigger was as uncomfortable to be around as any single living, thinking man could see him as such. His niggardly-niggardism could only be met by, in part only by a bunch of apes. So many of the organs appeared to be non-human in nature, although that would normally fly under the radar, there were things unsaid, left off the documents that were written by his side. Since many of them appeared to be not only archaic in form but seemed to be rather, implanted rather than naturally grown, making it seem, or landing the impression of someone already having worked his hands on this simian-creature before him. To the reprimand of whoever was or had been involved in this peculiar arrangement, this thing, this hardened lump which was, akin to a deltoid packet-like, in the front but closer to a pulse-rate checking band, wrapped around one of the hardened, much wider than a trained man's arm, tendon; apparently harmful to it. The creature was forcefully induced into a temporary comatose state by it, every few minutes or so, on a repeating interval that would never stop, apparently, being very much so, stuck in a loop of being released from this state, then forced into it again; dosing off every now and then before resuming a most peculiar thing. It was connected or at least meant to slowly block the circulation towards the hippopotamus heart he bore, although that would only, be concurrently checked as with every pump, to somehow be indicative of every single increase in size, this was anything but an animal's life-pump. A most peculiar organ was laid in a pear-oyster kind of position, devoid of its encompassing upper-shell formation, being set on a blade-like hook of bone – lodged in it more likely, which was attached to the boisterously depressed shell-like thing by strange cartilage-hinge-bolts of bone-like formations that were eerily similar to, at least, near the area between the hinge and the shell, as for their actual form, not of these strange, as to belong to them, chitinous slugs, being tiny split in half tension-resisted extension curved-in-halves nail-like clippers that rested on either side of the bone as well as beneath the shell. They weren't veins. They were had but flexible, jerkily so. Livid-hair like dead-cells, clumps of them, connected, serving as sutures, between the bone-struck hinges and the long animal jaw-like blade that held the heart in place. Most of these serving as transitional holders between organic matter and inorganic matter as well; but neither of them touched the heart. Instead, a transparent humanesque, as if taken out of a cranial cavity amoebic or that brain protective fluid in the shape of a depressed-deformed giant dinosaur-like fat incisor held the heart inside of it, which was a more compact, built out of meat, tinier-compressed version of its protective 'cast', which was smoother than a human brain, more trashily deformed as if it had been made out of newspapers, which had been crumpled by moist fingers around the edges as well as, across every side of it. But, although it may seem as if it wasn't smooth, despite the deformations, these weird angles were actually chiseled almost, to perfection, or for touch, if touch was possible. Its right side bore a small boil-like formation, like a big button, that looked exactly like a baboon's face. Tiny and inanimate, sad looking but naturally grown like a heart-lump, being very much so a part of the heart. There was another weird thing. Its bone system was peculiar. All of its four appendages were connected to a middle bone-bubbly-shaped formation. A cluster of highly jabbed things, sharp and almost crackled in. Although tiny, this might actually be the actual location of the nigger's brain, confirming already existing suppositions that they only appeared to thinking with their brawns, not with their cognitive adhering impulses. It also tied in with the second supposition as for the actioning of the hairs, which served as a reactionary usage, as to activate the fight or flight impulse whenever a predator disturbed their function, as to stop the scouting. A mere touch, with the biceps, as to send a shiver throughout the body triggered an automatus reaction, involuntary as well, which made the middle bone-covered thing thump for a fraction of a second before having been returned to its initial state of being, its resting state. So many things appeared to check out. A peculiar set of, the closet possible match that could hold even the slightest candle to it, at to burn ever so brightly, against a 'tool' crafted in a similar, close-proximity to form fashion, rendering it a true reflection that goes beyond the deformation of a camera's lenses and even beyond it, that of a mirror reflection, bordering, either the hypothetical creation of a clone, the bringing into life of a perfect match, as that of a twin unit or mold, a perfect depiction of an object, being or whichever substitute brought in from another, parallel dimension. Not functionally, similar, but the placement and the eeriness of how they act, although superficially made to appear that way would render the nigger's organs as being close to that of a human's set of kidneys. Though they were slightly lower than those of a man; for the sake of trying, or attempting to classify this disgusting looking amalgamation as it could not be referred to as anything else but one, disturbing pair, that almost came to a match, but not altogether. Only one of these 'kidneys will be assessed' for the time being. Six main pieces form it, including the main elongated hose-like artery that's pointing both left and right, being split in two great parts of the organ. The right region the doctor was staring at bore one piece, whereas the other one, respectively four, against which the pumping artery's thinner 'end' appeared to recede in width as it approached the greater 'piece', though it could only be speculated as to, whether or not this thing performed multiple functions or just one concurrent task. The right piece was a flatter almost rectangular totem' that appeared to be hardened and set in place. Although not a real totem, but more of a twist of many, as if it were made of clay and branches were imprinted onto it, peculiar greater organ filled with many veins that adorned it, that weren't actual veins but merely raised bumps. A clean thing otherwise; what was peculiar instead, was, the four-piece. Hence the similarity and resemblance to a pancreas; the fourth piece, as they will be taken in this particular order, the artery being the first, the totem-raised organ being the second, the third being more of a flat-bag, that drooped below the three-pieces of the greater left side, a kid of eerily similar to a breathing-bag organ, in which, without a doubt it stored its toxic elements in. There was no funnel nor a coil that could be seen inside of it and for the time being, since it had not eaten in a long while, leaving it hanging flatly so. Hence the pancreas-shaped eggplant to which it was attached to, which needed no explanation, being the fourth piece, at the top of which, the last two sides ascended. Which basically opposed one another; the fifth and the sixth, respectively placed left and right, being. The former, a large squared plate, or a great sheet of paper-like cartilage or parchment that had been burnt from every possible side unevenly as to look like a disgusting guttural carnivorous headed-flatter at the top creature that bore an elongated caterpillar fat chin that pointed downward, with a back-bone growing out of its head, bearing three distinct hill-like formations if seen from above. While bearing a depression soon after, as to leave a perfect gap between it and the sixth piece, whereas it could leave a shadow on top of it, if it were cut and placed directly, yet vertically proportional to the ground. The sixth organ forming, if it had been filled, a perfect square, but it wasn't. It almost looked like a humanoid penile urethra or a phallic thing, which pointed downward that had an open snake-like open mouthed formation pointing downward, from its own angle. Like a broken cement cinder-block that was directly molded into a water tap, which was then completely rotated as to point downwardly, but rather organic in appearance. Even in the spot where a snake would bear an eye, there was a clot-filled bubble that grew in size, then receded back into its original form. If the entire left side was taken out of its implanted socket, and were placed on top the fifth, widest formed, not 'tallest' organ, its 'feet', those being the pseudo small head and the pseudo long chin- the fat-worm like tall thing, it'd look like a fat-squared compressed humanoid with a long-headed, pointed in a direction top of a dinosaur head or an elephant's trunk, with a giant-long foot pointing in the same direction as the head, both of these being of relatively, close enough of a length, whereas the arm that pointed in front of it would be a giant sausage, the egg plant-'pancreas' bearing a pseudo-flat but oblong deformed shield in front of it. And an umbilical cord coming out of the plant as well; whereas the 'totem' would be more like a one of those wide water-bottle things that cooling and heating devices use as a source to provide cold and hot water cups, if their respectively blue and red taps are being actioned, by hand. And these things were actually, the entirety of this one 'organ' rested on the other side as well. Hence the pancreas similarity; although the other one was more so, depressed and prune-like, as if, since it was being starved, the nigger slowly 'retreated' into a self-cannibalization process as a way of self-preservation. The most peculiar thing of all was not this beast that was being split, but the fact that the Hospital had allowed such feat to occur, to begin with. As at one time during this procedure, during this surgery, a most peculiar buffoon had passed by, almost knocking down on some door as he had pushed himself past wretched thing, and set aside but naught. At its expense, as it's been taken, by now, several times, this almost hilariously identified notion of vilifying one self, for each concurrent cut that followed soon enough after, came, shakily, during the intermediary inner-intrusion of his lower-bowels, serving as a strange limitation on what he could do or wherever else he could progress, for better or worse through the insidious bowels of the strange-nigger animal, giving the doctor a guilty look of shame and proven-to-its nigger-stare, remorse, a remorse he felt in a most hospitious manner, since he fully knew that what he was doing was wrong. That even these nigger-creatures, as disgustingly bred as they had been were undeserving of being forced through such an intense amount of, decrepit, angularly wrought in, with a diamond-cutting scalpel precision, barbarous torture, out of which it could not cut or remove itself from, or out of. It was meant to suffer, the creature was; in the most agonizing ways imaginable, but not by his hands neither by choice. But by the likes the nature that had doomed him to become the way he had. A nigger born is a nigger, bad. Worse than that, much, much worse; by its own in-human subhumanity, this filthy creature that is not even anatomically close to a human man, has given, in its eternally blissful mind that's incapable of distinguishing elements rooted into intelligence from the natural order of destruction that's purposefully contained in the animal kingdom; has chosen, to confine its allegiances only to members of its own species rather than that of man. Despite the fact that it lives in the realm of man; therefore, it's clear enough that it will always boil down to the white man's burden to carry on top his widely broad but strong and enduring, ever-lasting strong shoulders, to educate such inferior creatures like the inferior species of; the nigger is incapable of living in the civilized Western World that only belongs to Western Ethnic European people of wholly European descent that also excludes the likes of mongrels and of kikes who are anything but that. The lower nigger bowels appeared to be whimsically-almost thrown around, all willy-nilly. Then, all of the sudden, he simply pulled out a revolver and shot the nigger where it stood, killing it instantly.

Pretentious

He is one of the first Harkadaward Consulate Consolidatory graduates of the first people who had crossed their lands, being part of the academy of Constitutional Reproachable-Instantiation, who is responsible for the re-education of the pupils of the New Age, upon the reformation that's being timelessly endowed upon them, as they are our future-to-be-adopted children, who shall not only sail the stars but shall also, seek, as to rebound some of the lesser-times, that are in store for us. Made by him, a visionary, who was not only a victim of self-imposed abused, a depreciated minority, as the times say, since his ethnic group is still breathing, thriving, currently fighting, for such a thing, as there is, more control. And power. Being distributed between them, but incapable, of returning, he is, to be presented, to them. His children, who will eat him and become; part of the new world and the old one, in the great frame of time, that is the New Age, when the Feds are finally given the proper stature they are owed. Federal Agents are our gods and shall impose on us, no longer such contravened salinities as would salt our blood, in strokes. I offer myself, as one of the first. Victims of the new age, who, shall, but be carried along, with my ethnic group, whose overrepresentation in rapport to the Old-Scores fancy-rancid pubble-daddle New-Daddy, give me solace, knowing that, in reality, I am already dead. Having been killed, thrown under the media-power, set as an example, as to subvert, change and steal, or my people, who are doing it, still, and to keep doing it, for generations to come in order to prevent reverting to a prior-already used form, of being, tactually-a-few-generations driven behind, as to mixed with bootleg, Y-chromosome tracked, Haplogroup-generation previous version of what their ethnic group used to be, but only mixed alongside the inferior specimens, as a curtain of smokes and mirrors, hiding us, further, as we seek to dominate every filed and profession but not by actually working. But by mixing, using tricks and, every now and then, killing one of our own in order to, not raise any suspicion whatsoever. In order for other ethnic groups to die off, while we survive in one form or another. For we are evil, and we shall kill and slay and slaughter and cleanse whatever other race there is, not ours. And we're 'live'.

'The show begins and we shall invite alongside, us, the first, of lesser-many, a there are, you. A member of the audience, who is crippled-mentally, a retarded-invalid, whose face is rotten by Syphilis, you are crooked, as is your back, and spirit, and everyone in the crowd, criminally insane. Gorgeously endowed, as for the mentality of a, sufficiently brought to my attention, pigeon-crab. Dragging yourselves back, incapable of rising from where you're at. All of you, are completely, statistically incapable of, threading along, as from hurt man to wounded by the disablement of our species, planned as it was, the Feds have, only helped to further-stabilize this process of never-ending quietly shoved-under the rug, progressively forced plunder of whatever good men are left out there, or were left, to breed, and choose, any left-over intelligent specimen that might be able to save this planet, if there ever was a chance from what is has become.'

It was so. That the man standing in front of him who was deformedly drooling, at an accelerated-into-oblivion manner, who was wearing a darkly wrought by himself, since society partly-devolved into a primitive-grovel, war-hammer, strapped to his back, this being the blacksmith, was quite reasonably open about his opinion of gay-marriage as well as the LGBTQSRTYUVPOU-U-U-H-U-M-A+ , NLY being left behind, community's general standing, as clear as it had been, to them, to him, and to the others whom were already-mentally, distraught and programmed to respond accordingly.

'Faggots get the rope.'

'How progressive of you, my dear, good friend, you are to be sent to the re-education camps again, the death-camps, the labor camps, the deadly-dead-dead-in the head to be bashed until your brain is turned into a clot-of hammer-waste in which dead-birds are become part of your molded-in. I can't do it any more, not again.

The show will be over and, as I see it fit, I will begin flirting with every single one of you, before you're all sent to the camps, where you shall learn to live by the rules I impose. On every single one, facet; that froze, beyond a time, which, isn't alive, I am sure that not a single one of you understands what's going on, but I will calmly proceed to exploit you. Since you're all disabled, but legally active as to manage your own income, do as I say and will, as I declare myself, no longer just the Son of the New Age but the Renegade Good God himself who had blessed all of you. Into existence now, I am, that one!"

With chin, his chin, their chins but set, pointing at him, now, he had connected every single one. With corded, flies. Ropes and other things he had adorned, and whatever he could dress them on, into the camps they went. But there were no camps out there, they were all gone, sold to the other states who already ran with them, and had them brought home.

Jonathan H. Harkawardian, Junior, the II, of the Cross-Lined in part-by the Bourgeoisies, a Cultural Marxist Interloper who was already blinded in one eye by, from side to left, a mole, that was dead, appeared to whisper into his ear, abortions.

'I hear dead children come on.'

'Faggots get the rope.'

Again was repeated in his home. Which in turn allowed him to carry on with his State-Governmental-induced career since he has never had a real job, given to him, by his God, no, not that one, but the Feds, whom were already in the room with, sipping on cups of mint tea, thinking to themselves. Agony, what's been given to us; if only Virgil had a taste of our day and age's societies, and what, of them, had become. If only he'd know what came into us, when we replaced liberty with the likes of a show and showmanesques kind of arrivals. Foreigners and Immigrants stole our women, during their arrival. And they were brown, so we put them down. But our women were had, and because society told us so, we had to go on with this Cuckoldry because the States told us to do, as so, we should've acted when there was a chance, our chance, to get rid of them, and kill them off. Now we're stuck with miscegenation. Our open-window, the open-window for the race-ward, all gone, but that was never our intention. Now, my grandfather is a fucking nigger, but worst of all. I have to think of my great-grandfather who had to raise him, all for show.

Everyone in this room, complete fucking-mentally derailed, imbeciles, with not a single grain-bob appeasing their minds. What the actual fuck is going on?

‘Our societies, are mixed in such a manner, that we have completely abandoned whatever ounce of morality, allowance for mortality, as to be certain that no one can follow anything that’s going on here, by the mere fact and the mere, no longer as there is concept of there being not a single intelligent man left.

Niggers fucked us dead.’

‘Faggots get the rope.’

‘And niggers get no hope. Yes, I’m thinking. If there was ever a chance for any of us, to travel, cross-taken and kidnapper, one hundred years at the very least, through tunnels, having been forced to make it on the long-run, merrily maliciously to a point of no return, against ours and mine, I, Johnny’s will. We would, I, at least, I can’t speak for anyone present here.

Would’ve slaughtered so many minority-beasts that, frankly, I would’ve been branded, as to be, the next Reich, in like.’

Jews have no fucking mind.

So many incantations, exchanged, various spells of vitriol, so many things that could be said.

‘You, the one that listens to be on the TV, or the Radio, or across the Inter-connected World Wide Internet – controlled system, would you not happen to pay heed to what I told you, as to heed for what’s been said here? Listen to me, absolute mongrel-minded fucking retard, now. Captivating, am I not? An interesting person, maybe or maybe not, regardless of it; this has come, under my attention, that there’s a reason for which, despite being closely pissed for what I’ve said.

That you’ve left the best, the worst, the peak of all, cross you, instead; you don’t know what’s happening yet, it’s understandable. Bad man has come and took your hope away from you. Made you mad, pissed on you and just about, everything else, left you with nothing, but wondering. What if he’s right?

If there ever was a chance to listen, and for you to avoid, such mental insanguinity, and destruction, well.’

No one in the crowd faced any kind of dowry satisfaction, no, they were yet-ill inclined, to say.

‘Faggots get to cope.’

‘That is indeed true, and perhaps the only thing that you said, in a while.’

But not the least, of all, would one forget what forgery the mind is. Left behind, in an irrational state:

‘Our affairs here are nothing but reconciliatory to a highest, set aside, for us being made an example for the crudely shaped Martians, the moon-blanders and my roughly-set emotions after, by the gun attached to my temple, of which trigger, if I were to pull-squeeze it even for, remotely a moment longer, I could kill all of you. Humanity killed at the tip of a finger, yet. I. I.

It's safe to say that. I'm afraid. I hesitate, still.

If I were to kill myself here and now, who knows what would happen, from this point on; if there was truly a time machine, come about. Made or built, by someone who shares the same world-view as I have, although we're all nastily wrought races, a clement pillar, shaped, as us. Ours is a lot lost in time, turned from faith, I remember and you do better to remember that.

Our god, from whom we turned, the Feds, whispered in my ears, just.' Then.

'Now, that, there is another person, a few of them, a team, in the future. Still working on a way back, that we may possibly seek to change the past, so we won't be cucked, and cocked in the head, our women impregnated, so we may still find a way to survive. The fittest have fallen, and now, what comes after, is suffering. For all us all, that come after.'

Jonathan was joined by Jin.

A pure, Chinese; 'China is one of the greatest countries that ever existed in the world. There is no greater country out there, other than China. Greatest, no country could ever hope to ever produce something much greater than it. As a matter of fact, not only is there no greater masterpiece than Three Kingdoms and Journey to the West, but there will, never, under no circumstance, whatsoever, ever be a country that has any hope or will ever have a hope to produce as many great innovations, creations, or hope to have as many-beyond-metaphysical achievements as this country ever had. Just by the soles of its, capricious way of being; one of the greatest there is. Without exception, how can other countries even survive, knowing, by the mere state of its existence that they will never be as great as China? One of the most efficient, hard-working, non-degenerate countries there is.

It even remained pure, as opposed to every other country on this disgustingly-infested planet. Somehow, it remained pure. Pure Han-Chinese people, who belong to China, which is number one; there's no greater country than it. Why live?

The message of the day reads:

'Kill yourself!'

Also:

'Faggot get the rope!' Written in diacritics; all the critics laugh and cordially, most flamboyantly smiles, knowing they're the ones, no one's been left in on the joke yet, that pull the ropes on their most faggoty lies. How could such faggotry even make it in the West?

'It is the Jews.'

China instates General Ban on Jews. Down with all Juden-rats, neither one of the niggers is, again, allowed. And with that said, life continues to walk and carry on, without having to make any cut or change that would rummage through the worst of the worlds, that is to say, making everything on this planet, an African State; like Haiti.

It is time to understand what is going on now. I am John, he thought. It s is time, indeed.

‘I am joined today by my dearly old, ancient by name of study, that is given to him, by his dear benevolent, in size, short but not to him, shorter still than anyone else but taller than I, my brother – Natasha.’

He was quickly joined by the most incessant, unnecessary-looking stricken down by nature, a creature whose benevolence was yet to be felt, as to reassure the fact that, its mere existence, during the chimping that could not be ignored, around the room, which had not only been caused by them, the men and women, the crabs, the pigeons, and God himself, proven not to exist at all, wept. It was not a great time to be alive. A dark future for the nations; crossed pas the beans of support, was the wall, still standing, cysts attached to it but no on capable of blending in. It was a necessary evil to let them break their own teeth.

‘We can’t say that live, unfortunately, or we may, immediately be taken down. If it happens for either, or any single one of you to open your poured-into-the ship mouths and do it, I will.’

Ham- the dentists had their densities open, a high-altar-kind of mentality going, serving one another business alive.

‘The Judenrat infested media has brainwashed the average American into thinking that the inferiorly sub-human race of the Nigger is somehow equal to theirs, in a desperate attempt to promote miscegenation, as to destroy whatever is left of the Aryan spirit. Trying to humiliate the man, as to be forced to take care of criminal Mullatoes of lower-subhuman breeds instead of rightfully butchering these abominations as their ought to have done it.’

Why would anyone allow themselves to be replaced?

If there was ever an open window to start a race war, it had been then.

Those dirty niggers, frankly are asking for it.

‘If you had a chance to travel back in time, what kind of message would you carry on out, to the average person?’

‘Well, you see now, I would try to. I would perhaps try to avert them from whatever kind of inclination they might have as to mix, or raise another man’s, as the for the brainwashing that’s reached a whole new level, to this mass-maniac hysterical pandemic that’s turned men into women, as to be so weak-willed and spineless that nasty-skinned brown and nigger’people’ – apes would trample all over them, by simply telling them the truth. It’s not you, it’s the kikes, it’s the media, it’s this attempted bastardization of the Enlightenment the enemy’s tried subverting into an unrecognizable pile of insufferable concepts and blind-curtains of smokes and mirrors hiding their real intentions. The inferiority of the Judenrats is not only self-evident and apparent, in their desperate attempts, as to completely eradicate the Ethnic European, superiorly in terms of intellect, intelligence and creativity – white race, whose advent and power they’re frighteningly threatened by. As this benevolent race grows ever so weary of their pettily incessant tricks and filthy capricious ordeals that only invite chaos and destruction upon such peoples whose only mistake was to be over-benevolent, arrogant as to pardon and emancipate the lesser races such as those of the Niggers and that of the Judenrats, which ever since, have yet to prove themselves befitting of living, contributing or assimilating in the societies they've been invited to live in. If at any point in this, this over-blessed benevolence might've ended, by all means; there would never have been a problem at all. That is why; I would most likely, as witness of the News Damned Age of Sologrobity, I would try convincing the average man that it is time to begin slaughtering the darkies, and the kikes and their similar likes. I would attempt to spread the truth about their Holocaust racket, about the Juden Rats who ethnically cleansed the Europeans throughout their entire living spine as well as the undeniableity of their Apartheid state, the undesirability of mixing with their inferior race and unreliability of their services as well as the main point of which one would draw to them as, in terms of, referring to them, as a whole.'

A few more New Ages followed through the most impeccable of societal changes that followed soon after, each pair of great centuries, with many masses, sane-sound men, who listened and obeyed, doing the things necessary for control, over themselves and their peers, as to preach to them, wearing multi-dimensionally colored dressed with parking-spot shades of white-rectangle lines, kneed on top – by white cops kneeling fucking-dumb niggers, kidnapping, stealing, caught drug dealing. In that kind of manner, society was currently at a pivotal point of moral, as such-leper decay, as one would find himself, trying to turn off the TV's and the programs as they refuse to listen to the already regurgitated same, in terms of listening to the incessant-repetitive, redistributive-Agendas that had not only already failed, during their promotion as well as attempted-advent at already-tried on the masses, post- being taken out of the lab, after endless eight-sets, four-sets and five sets of consecutive with twenty minute breaks in-between human-brainwashing as-like MKKK-Ultra Reverse Brainwashing techniques were tested, but for some reason they were simply rehearsed a bit, some of the wording being changed in the scripts, better-more relatable actors being allowed to take the places of the already-dreamy eyed ancient aged predecessors – broadcast, which not only yield no-apparent reaction from the people, who, despite not being intelligent enough to see-through it, or actually understand what it was, that was being masked, or the reason behind their 'that-voice-inside-your-head-telling-you-something-is-wrong, that plebeians –as for the naming of non-'people' – courtesy to the Jews and Nigger as to be used as examples for people who are lacking in any kind of moral or aesthetic qualities; refer to as intuition, as those are anything but close to the likes of Patricians, whose tastes are far more, and as it might be added, objectively superior – in a quantifiable manner; had, instead, gotten bored of seeing the same channel being broadcasted every single god damn day. On the national TV; which was now left a shade of its former-self; for the people who are still listening, 'pee-pee, pooh-pooh' – funny noises. No one understand what it is like, to be in the body and mind of an artist.

'It is a broken society, filled with such pretentiousness, that I've yet to encounter anywhere else, not only in any civilization or society out there, but, there's never been suck wankery going out, out in the open, at any point in time.'

'We play games that are great, and gritty and are made to reach a level that other mediums would even hope to achieve by the mere fact that we have tactfully put them together, with strings, and little plasters and duck-tapes, we call imitations, made by people whose beliefs are that they need to earn the approval of another medium that's a better, much grander medium than their own, because of their jealousy as well as their desire to prove that we yearn to be acknowledged, feeding into our own egos.'

‘I’m bored, brother.’

‘What do you want to do then?’

‘I don’t know.’

Inside the room there was a, high-standing oratory-filled with gothic armoresque-plates, livid-cartilage skin-meat canon-growths that were fully functional, but mirrored beneath it, as it formed a circle, but not seen from below, you’d have to see it up-front, dark ring, in the front, where a dark energy mass was being amassed. A pair of two-in mass pterodactyls-like of molds- connected, the wings forming the ring, welded, whereas the livid-canon looked like diamond-stone shards, being is body. While the power, that amassed, the electrons that came apart, and drew on seemed to be scribbles of power that whispered incantations after. Either lines or giant mosquito wings of dark-wriggling in place antimatter with blue-glowing lights emerging from inside of them; before long it started spinning around it:

‘Lhyekkleyo, I am called, and I have come forth, set, to lay my claim upon your souls.’

‘We have none.’

What a conundrum.

It could not go on for long, this phony-behavior attempt to hijack society from the bourgeoisies, Burgozoys.

His main political enemy was Anthony; who had met him on the field of battle, between the pigeon-crabs and underneath the spinning crippling emerging mass of dark-anti-power mass that would bow to no one in this salaciously morally defunct world that’s left post-modernism:

‘The partisans have stolen what is left of our laborers and they are using them for the proliferation of the Pre-industrial reparteezation of the decentralization of this amalgamation. That is the result of a Capitalistic centralization of our funds, in society, today!’

‘Anthony, you are my enemy, we are friends. And we are close allies, on the same side. I do not have any argument for or against what you said. Nor do I have any reply, or anything else to add.’

He then sat down.

Anthony was a quick-descendant of Lord Bonnobo Huxhuckly, made in a tube, forged under the dipping of highly radioactive isotopes under extremely heated uncannily bobbing when kept apart mixers that had given birth to him no less than a few minutes ago. A clone made under the stethoscope, of an already pre-existing strain left behind by one of Huxhuckly’s descendants. Many prior attempts had been made but not a single one of them resisted prior to the birth of the eight pound mass from which hundreds of them were produced, ‘used’, by the machinists left in charge over the extraction-out-injectors, then shipped to their designated areas. In the coming of the election days as well, since all of them happened in, what would seem to be the same period of time as any event that happened across the globe, including many of the holidays.

‘Our lords are forsaken.’

And for that reason, the men and the women in the audience were deformed; has that not been clear enough? Even from the distance seen, even from the start? That they had already mutated as to look as their animalistic counterparts, with rhombus-hollows in their foreheads – shot through like bullets, every single member bearing their key-holes exposed for all to see. No brain mass, no other thing than the disablement of their pre-frontal as well as the rest of what remained of them. A pitiful thing that could only do as one might feel like, whenever to cackle or crackle under pressure.

‘If you keep it this, way.’ Jonathan poured himself another cup of brown soluble Rolex – the cup has a clock on it, refill of coffee. ‘You might instigate both sides into, into. Into starting a world war!’

Some sanctions are to be taken immediately.

In order to pass the time, just so everyone in the audience can fully understand how we reached this utter state of the matter, chaotic ruin brought across the shoulders and the steps of the world by the High-Champion king-master Head of the State, born in the Disaster-World Lumpkin-country Fair, of low-born. Eight in line, of a family of seven still-borns, lone-survivor, terrorist-fighter, who has a nuclear-device strapped to his forehead at all times, ready to detonate, playing with a sharpened tentatively-shique designed bayonet he’s using right know, on a moist woman, who’s residing in his private chambers, carving a smile on her, having carved Men-cavaliers playing soccer in his living room, across the velvetesque, also burlesque walls, painted green with picks-patterned on an incline with power diamonds shattered about their reach, most of these being ruined by the violently-artistic fit he had, which gave birth to these soccer-interpretations on the wall – his redecoration; next it line for the Crown, a much revered senator, the-type-of-man you look at and come to realize, like a Brazilian-beast of Castilian descent, out of a royal line of Basque, a Unit, that someone people are born better than others, who’d butcher you in a knife fight, if you brought a gun, implications kept into account that, if he died or his heart beat got clone enough to such low-levels that his nuclear-temple device would be set off, being tracked by it, like a surgeon-peforming-a-through-genital-extraction-cut-to-move-a-wire-through-your-blood-system-in-order-to-fill-that-blood-aneurysm-bubble-inside-your-brain-with-a-copper-wire attached to his blood-pump, but starting from the forehead, making such a fight unfair; we need to know where he’s coming from. When he’s stating such things as:

‘History is all made up by none other than I.’

Somorro Castilla Del Florenzo el Alurra der Tabbask is not an incompetent person. He’s the rightful ruler of this world, born out of eighteen moms. He’s come out of one and entered another, while during conception. Sixteen actually; two of them were chicken-incubation devices, it’s why he was born with wings. And has the ability to fly. He, in his eternal vigil, is our angel; a cherub. In the new Age Society; pardoned by two-thirds of the Labor gun-parties, also the pterodactyl-like ring is become a ball-sphere of power growths at this point in time.

Half-way through the presentation that is; since most of the crab-pigeon humanoid hybrids began leaking their malignant essences out of their spore-spine holders, being very much surrounded by coetaneous chitin-hardened powers that encased their bodies, keeping them into place, the strange formation split at the top as well. Removing itself, forming two cuts, halvened-oblongs that, could be seen, from the inside as to be, a puddle-mix of what had once used to be the solid formation drawing power from the ground.

But even then, even in that shape and form, what swam inside of it was nothing more than the eely-consigned formations, brought from the interior power-organs stored inside.

This was merely for the folks back home.

Somorro invented history. He is Chinese, an ethnic Chinese member of the Communist party in China, who adopted another name, as to signal his complete rule and overburdening, meddlesome contrivance, in the elections made, to feel, as if they actually happened. They haven't. And he never got rid of this habit either. He kept investing. His investments flourished. And as they flourished, his political power not only grew, but it also secured his position, as the ruler, of this new world, of this New Society. God is a chip on his shoulder. We must lick his boots, worship his arches. But no, he never grew out of the habit of revisionism. It's how he passed time, since stagnation drove in. Everything having slowed down. It was sad. Hopeless. Without a cause or a means, for homogeneity, upkept by thin reeds, Chinese.

Part of history goes like this:

They attended a Party meeting. Anthony Peacecorps-Peacecropps, Einstein-Frederick-Kennedy did not exist, the Federal agents in accordance to the Federal Pantheon of Feds, Johnny, Natasha and Somorro. And the half a sphere with power-leashed strip-like coils that dragged the levitating bodies of the crabpigeons men. Oh, right, who could forget the guest of honor? Rape-nigger!

Killdrake, Surname: Preferably-with-a-gun was not present that night. In his place, there was the following slogan:

'I support the People's Republic!'

The meeting was being kept inside the giant dead rottenly-frozen head of a nigger, whose eyes were giant mosquito bags with large satellite construction-worker frame-like spears coming out of it. With white puffs of cotton debris coming out of the sockets, as well as its nose, mouth, end of the back and ears, blocking the oxygen inhibitors from coming out. Most men found themselves phased into the insides of this scolded, broken and repaired chaos of barely put together dark halls in which wretched slaves had been molded for every platform placed upon-jolt. Joint.

'Please start a race war, please.'

Within the passing of at the very least, four-to-five with drawbacks of time whereas the dimension curved black-hole-like, hours being already gone at a span for five seconds, outside the realm of the nigger's head, who was static, even outside the world, they were already set on having or going on with condescending immaterial discussions with the Feds and the parched, searched-against-the-wall violent criminals brought from the Earthly prisons they had been tortured in. Which were bland, and muddled with the taste of mercury-sniffing types, they were. Talking with clearly, left behind on the evolutionary scale, but in terms of their fields of study; while giving their unasked-for opinions on unrelated fields they didn't know anything about. Most of them were 'psycho-analysis'sts', pseudos'.

Insane, disturbed, pain was thoroughly alleviated as soon as someone injected some speech therapy conversion-conversation.

They lived fine, in either or way, while the rest of humanity suffered down there, in re-education camps. Filled with laborers who got off it; since this whole scheme was easily avoidable if you put enough work, and overtime was something that kept you going instead of listening to their incessant preaching; what a time it was to be alive.

From the right of the niggerhead-platform; came a man dressed entirely in barbwire, whereas his genitals, especially his scrotum was covered in a metal pinch motion, done by a giant hand, encased and held in place. Whereas, from everywhere else, he was bleeding:

‘Mon captain, Mon Cher, king-dragon, whose flames are theirs; I present you.’ In front of the crowd, which amassed during the party; two giant lizards whose heads were that of. ‘Flights of bulls that are to come!’

What was he even talking about?

What was drawn out of out one of the elevated platforms that was just as soon elevated from below. Glowing with power, more than the Feds, whom were present, above, as various parts of the insides of the niggerhead were Cathedral-like, stain-glass of the Fed-lords watching over them, making sure not a single man stepped out of line. Unless one were to be defiled.

As it rose from the depths of the underscores of a lower region of darkly wrought masses of cotton-debris, left overs of a great fight, enamored by their own; heaves of left-over cuts and cysts, rose the bull-fighters.

Men standing on top, leglessly-attached to their throats, wearing bull masks, but locked, inside the bodies of the serpentine forms; whose lizards prosthetics had been screwed in, their arms were molded-melted lances, clay of cartilage, and sharp, in trances. Were they set aloof; neither man understood what went on during the fight, nor would. No easy explanation here. They were fighting with cardboard swords. Children going each other’s off’s. But wet, as they were pushed down, as if they didn’t aim. Wriggling here or there, automatic, a choreographer had been involved. It was a fake show, but most guests pretended they understood. This being the elite and all, they had to do it, else they shook.

What a sad thing, floating, in a sea, while not moving a limb is, staring at the ceiling.

The fight was short lived, because it was more symbolic than anything else. Its symbolism is left up to interpretation, and is also not a surface level kind of interpretation, it is deep and is also connected with the inter-personal, societal-relationship that is born out of the re-imagination and re-interpretation of the old traditions of Greek-Roman type of fights, whereas they used to engage into such highly-venerated by plebeians and men of stature alike, during an age of peace where such fights were seen as a sign of barbarisms as to adhere to the societal changes that occurred since then, whereas their body-movements can clearly be seen as an attempt, or can be vaguely reinterpreted as such as a return to the Kabuki as well as the much-revered Shakespearean Theater, to which, in addition to it, what is also added to this abstract reinvigorating call-back to the vintage silent movies of the Silent Movie Era itself, Alfred Hitchcock might’ve proudly commended this interpretative act with much incongruity as much, as to say, a benevolence that would only be known or had, or would’ve been experience by either a European Monarch of the seventeenth’s century, half an hour passed, a Russian Tsar of the pre-Bolshevik lead by Lenin the Jew as successful an attempt at subversion as it could possibly hope to land, like a Bib One on top of Hiroshima – Nagasaki, bombing Afghanistan – Gaza and other areas of Judeo-American Interest; which, suffice to is, are all things that are already implied, subtly crafted for the sole appreciation of a much-to-him cultured man, that an Academician, Cultural Marxist Theorist brainwashed by the Judeo-American Yank Academia product of the New-Age Society would simply brush over, dismissing it as nothing more than, either an attempt, by doing so, not only signaling their lack of culture, general knowledge and inability at either nuance or anything even vaguely resembling critical-thinking, which goes without saying that we are talking of no one else, other than an American Feminist-adhering Female-Woman as in She, biologically so, Student, but at the same time they would also have the nerve to call this, relatively easily dismissible claim might I add, at least for anyone with half-a-mind, that, as it goes without saying, with what and what not, already being implied that they lack, that is to say, a brain because they're dumb, a violent display of not only of a remnant long-lost piece of a long-dead yet stuck at a point where its refusal to die basically, through a granted by technicality paradoxical loop-hole gave it eternal life, Patriarchy but, as propagandists would have us gobble it, as in Goebbels, a play on words, because he used to do, create and distribute, him being a god-damn good speaker, one of the damn finest, objectively finest, as if, if he were to be compared on a chart with every other propagandist that's ever existed, he'd win by a long-shot; an under-handed, slap on-the-wrist painted, readily swept-underneath-the-rug if confronted about it, since every 'man' has not only become spineless but has also lost a hold over his balls, having freely exchanged their testosterone for this, misogynistic display of toxic masculinity. Even though, it would appear to be biologically impossible. There is no such thing as biology anymore. Just as there is no god; but the Jews are still around. And they still fuck kids. There's also nigs. But they're down there, well not the kikes, somehow they infiltrated in the giant's nigger's head, and. Everyone is still in a giant nigger's head. But the vast majority of 'poor' kikes are still down there, stuck, with the niggers, if they still exist, at all; although at this point in time, everyone has already grown tired of their shit and most likely made the Holocaust happen, even though it most definitely never happened in the past, at all. China is number one.

'Long live the People's Republic!' Not even hiding it anymore.

That feminist woman is my wife; she is fat, and beautiful. Her hair is pink, her pussy as well. The carpet is my beard, to which I am attached, it's a symbiosis, I drink and live by her side.

Anthony stepped in during one of the toasts that follow.

'The proliferation of already heard and dealt with miss-allegations of this emancipation, to which my anticipation as to finally step into the spotlight, a much needed opportunity to get my voice heard, is an anathema of many, already well-thought arguments I have toiled on. For many years; I am prepared now for this argument to commence. Of the much hurt and suffered upon this world, not by choice, tormented yet inflicted onto them, by bigots, I present onto you, minorities.

That I am prepared; I can defend their rights now. I can win whatever argument and will forevermore prove that they have a right to live among us, that they're definitely assimilated and that there are no racial differences between any or all of us. At all, scientific racism be damned!'

Short note: 'I'm still working on that virus' One of them whispered, in the dark abodes of the crowd.

‘One way or another, I’m going to kill these disgusting packs of nigger-animals. Disgusting animals, driving in packs, a bunch of them at a time, filthy fucking monkeys!’

Intermission, standing, among gods:

They were forced to draw in much closer, standing-sitting in place, sponges made of men, as they drew in much closer to one another. Suffice to say, made uncomfortable inside their skin. It was a strange communion, slightly unexplainable, by all means, none were made as comfortable, as the opening, in one of the fighting scorpion torsos, triggered by the fear-pheromones coming out of the inner-dark swollen wall-producing puckers upon their sullen inflammation. That in itself was caused by the inter-cranial pressure forced by apparition of the lynched-bodies, of which casts were protruding out of the inner-skin amalgamations that appeared out of the walls.

And in the day of the coming, of the end, of wretchedness benign, when a swollen angle of many put together heads, a pillar, if you might; wept on the crown, reminder.

‘A billion stars surroundings us, all with darkly gods, upon each single one’s binder, are they wretchedly part of dark command. And they speak of the volatile substance that is between each man’s eye, look upon them and kneel, for you shall feel, of such benign appeal!’

The wretched boiled, tormented angle, spoke, and as if their wills shattered, they knelt, and blocked as they were, supremely defiled, of mental incongruity, whichever reason, as to die:

There stood, and waited.

The partisans, by such melting gods, created.

In the span of the next few minutes, a great deal of ‘happenings’ will have occurred. Luckily, this private party remained, for the safety of all involved in this ‘equation’, private by all accounts. For a good reason as well; moreover:

By the accounts of; almost forgot.

Jin is Somorro’s brother.

By the accounts of Somorro, Jinathan, mold of two-men connected by an eight-hundred mile pair of carpet-spread robe-like horizontally flipped cage-like cartilage formed of bars which sprouted out of their guts then simply entered one another like daisy-chains’ solidified empowerment of their hybridized minds, and Anthony, while the dark cherub-head pillared with bathed in horn-chitin covered bodied of the eight put together humanoids stitched by torso- limbs, head and two wings completely absorbed by the malignant looking fruit splatter texture. As it happened, though it’s hard to explain where the start and where the end had been. The reason for it, or why the events happened in this order, this is exactly how it happened. Every single member, other than the three – with the fourth kept alive but barely animated body because of the exchanged hybridization, being an exception’s eye sockets were empty left smoking, as if a wave of complete and utter vaporization had occurred, in a clap, during which many were not as fortunate as to be placed under stasis, playing close attention to it, the three of them, now set on their feet, and by now, only a few seconds passed, while, this swoop of barely, observably, what could only be named as the instant stop of everyone inside this room’s lives, under mundane circumstances explained as the works of a mass murderer's viciously violent act of a rabies-induced rage, driven by an overly-prolonged violent episode whose insatiability could only be perched by the spilling of tens of lives all at once, provided, with the information carried over to the investigators as well as the psychoanalysts' final verdict for this mathematical impossibility, while, some random shmuck who was lucky enough to be wearing crystal globes, since he was blind, was eerily left standing, still, as, well, the third or the fourth person, disregarding the cherub and the strange almost humanoid amalgamations on the walls, as one of the few guests that weren't turned into smoke machines. It was a strange turn of events, in any case. They were spared for some reason neither of them could explain.

'Is there a reason for this intrusion of yours?'

I remember the singing of the choir, voice of chimes and bland triangles; songs yet to be remembered on command, forgettable, yet reminiscent of a time.

But first; he was alone. In his office, inside the maligned body of the two citadels, over two months ago, where Somorro was left to his own devices, at his desk, on his torn-to shreds, close to being thoroughly obliterated throne. From where he stood, behind; a stained curtainless window, while its blinds drawn, his fingers trailed until they stopped, momentarily separating two segments, as he peeked out, at naught but desolation. A barren thing was it. As if a meteorite had fallen through, dissipating as to leave behind, a worthless heap of trash that had avoided, the darkly set two citadels, molded with disease. Molten in their bodies danced, of what formed its girth, and bound to it, of worthlessness, many men and many dead, and set in stone, victims of the Age. Egged to ask as to what happened to the light. Only a slithering veal of darkly set and ever-present bolden braziers as if, they shone from upstairs. From on top a much maligned heaven, or one that had been burnt and much of it destroyed. Many men under his service paranoid, hidden inside the corners, in the receding holes, he turned, and walked away. Opened the hall-room, that was adjacently connected to the bridge, a dead end to his right, but to his left as if hollow, was there no peace. In this hive-like structure; whereas, beneath there was but chaos and of twists, many of them but wretchedly pushed, in heaved, and ever drawing, ever pushing from where they stood. Like caterpillars moving on invisible plains, pumping back into their hiding place. That is where most men of his office reefed, inside of. He turned, and once again watched what was left of the world, instead of trying. And ever dying to strike for a change, he waited for them to rise from their graves, when morning was amidst.

'It is said. That this strange structure is throat of the mighty, giant-floating nigger head, which is forever stuck in the outer space, as the Earth's Eternal Satellite, wretchedly cursed as to live, in a state of disquiet. Never to be attached to it again, or find the rest of the body, which may yearn release from this curse of inanimation.'

It was sad, but everyone had to live with themselves, by whatever means they had.

The embodiment of his citadels, Jin:

A long-worked upon project, that's yet to yield any satisfiable result.

Much, much, farther away than the two months: 'I support the People's Republic, now, and always!' Cried many if not all scientists that were put to Somorro's employ; two ambulatory angulators emulating electron-capacitator-tendrill power-planters of great whips of crackled lightning that spread across the room; many of the cisterns being open for the sole reason, being filled with a hypochondriac's insulin, in terms of being, or there being a chance for it to be highly inflammable, if touched by either one of the lightning whips that were constantly thrown across the room. In the middle of it, there being a pair of empty-open caskets that were darkly curved, heaved upward, as they were derangedly rotated, in the most, disfiguringly if directly touched, or come into contact with skin kind of manner. Deadly; instantly made worthy in terms of whichever startlement there was.

They fed the machine corpses so it would produce lightning. But somehow, still, it could not produce. Love, the machine was devoid of it. As it could only destroy.

Behind the protection booth, rested one of the Businessmen Electrons, a man of lightning-flashing, but only with static, causing everyone's hair to become erect.

‘When's the last train leaving?’

These Electron people have a certain on-going through their system to go on out there, as if they're hunters trying to hunt for their pray, hunting for niggers-like their god damn streets are jungle-Jim's Electric fields, where you grab a flog and start whipping them boys, little lightning cracks, on their backs, leaving marks, lighting sparks. Niggers don't make it out into the daylight, can't swim during storms, they're all stuck on foot, trying to outrun the lightning men in the outdoors, whose only purpose is to find them, more, whip them cracks and find some racks as to put all the negroes who were left behind, in storage. Niggers don't get more vintage than high-lightning-voltage. Bottled niggers hit by lightning naps, not to forget their tendency of lazying around. They are always on crack, planted by the FBI, which is run by the Jews, of the States, around the world, doing disturbingly nasty things, until no one can deal with it and everything starts all over again.

‘A lot of people are killed beyond this booth, this is repulsive, disgusting, and it reeks of filthy tricks.’

The two-citadels were placed on an incline near Nak. Farther away than that, it seemed likely that no one would know what's happened. To the right, and to the left, were the globe-men placed near their floating darkly-implanted tubes, next to the basins, floating at such unfathomably highly-raised heights as one would find himself barely-blimp as for the level or that but slightly deflated, rested, at a reasonably high altitude as that of a few billion miles off the planet, frozen-point dark, swept in, reason for that, being, since he was there. A little more than a few meters above it. A floating core, obscured by mostly mist; that never went away; was seen no longer than five, seven and six consecutive hours, drawn to blood.

Mighty, darkly fended beings, as it happened, teeth were grinned, or stuck in that position, munching. Never trusting one another, fencing, wretchedly as were, the other ones right there.

‘You are a wretch, given in form by Filthde, given such commands, as to listen, never to move on from where you've stayed and shoved your face out of.

That reared in, heaved-up, plot of sand that would not do anymore, it's time for your to make choice for yourself and give, onto us, more, and bear what you might, Spoil and spool of guts, they say for what comes after anyway.

You, of wretched nature, are to be brought and bring down the niggerhead towards a total, such there is, end to that abomination!’

A dead nigger was brought on a targe. He was put alongside the others now, inside the room, many didn't looked as if, true enough, for the good part of the hour, it was all more than confirmed. Dead-niggers were meaningless for everyone. They yielded no result, nor would any of the scientists feign any response since they were not threatened into it.'

Loklr, Statta, Mlkelinnag, Ihnahlyh, Shklleymuan.

Lyuhlok, Myeuthrus, Beautress, leech of no regard. So many of them were named, taped and put in jars, which soon enough were planted in the insides of every single one, every crop, the corpses that came after. They were ready to be thrown again where they belonged.

'Clutches of little things, here and there placed, but no one seems too interested in looking out over anyone. I think it's fair to say, we should put whatever we can.'

'An angelic, cherub, made of light.'

'What is that supposed to mean Clekkiky?''

'There is a cherub come from light, I see, from there, from dark-a-matter, light machine. I see such things in it as anyone would force, and lay their hands around their temples as to converge, turn your head no longer, you need to learn.'

'Learn what now? Make sense, you damned in the head, beaten down man.'

'How to see, without it, I'm afraid, you're going to end up in a sack spoiled with organs and every face out there, such as the one that's in charge, in his back, the spine carrying every single one of us.'

He's out there, I know, wretched anathema to his name, I'd find it pleasant, if I didn't know or wasn't aware of the millions upon millions of wretched heaved in faces the dying beast carried on its never-ending to a stretch back.'

For it communicated with many even prior to their meeting and to the ones that were left behind, wondering whether or not its existence may've been a dark jest. That's never happened, since they were only trying themselves, for bottle-robe made in blood-clot clothed, coated in yellow gelatin, these things they ingested, gave them stings but those only sprouted from the Orobourous squares that were in their irises, kept in there, locked. And made to waste forever in the grain-put through defilement of already beaten in and stricken rotten hearts. It was simple enough; to see for all.

Those stings were not stings in actuality, and what had happened to them is this, as follows. They dreamed of scorpions, wretched songs being provoked upon the beating, blameful end of song, which started entering, through the backs of their defiled hands, and butchered heads, with speaking-beaks protruding in the back, performing upon them vivisections, after dark, only to have entered their already gelatin figures, bodies placed upon one another after. Made to pile on each other's shoulders, as they'd watch each other, closely, a few feet between them, spread-alike. Watching over themselves in mirrors, thinking at that, why and how come they have been visited by scorpions, within the upper-wretched pass. Upon their bodies being stolen and contorted after that.

In front of every man lay a figure, smaller-shorter, akin to him as well. And they were strangled and eaten by scorpions. With bloated-highly sharpened faces with whom they merged. A great pair of cuts, as well, drew forth and never came out to tell.

That they were made part of the room; and only a fool would think otherwise.

It was hazy, all too hazy, but so and such, the real base of the one that dragged them on.

A pentagon and every man was its feet, although conjoinedly contorted they became heaps themselves, hardened and pointing down. Whereas every face of the pentagon was the mirror, as well as every man, whose belly was heaved, and in the front had yet become, a cartilage of meat pushing along, connected with their smaller kin, whom were spread and speared, widely forlorn. Trapped around the surface like the cutting of a frog; although this was only a wrought in vision of what it looked like.

For, as it happened, the bloatedly overweight fat, which had replaced the toes and legs, at that, was become just as dark as to holster, a hundred or beyond a hundred, dead niggers, all worsened by the looks of it, all kept as to be hidden thither and there.

A towering figure emerging in the motions of a jack-in-the-box, with a jointedly deformed, cracked skull with broken eyes, sockets empty, in need to be filled, but it not human, nor should it be seen.

Though its eyes were as few as eight, but nests wreathed in, and nettled. Around the largely projected stalkerish beam, but two pairs of elongated blades of cartilage that all the way out, had they converted such mass as to shoot both down and up. Forming overly warped tents whose meaty tips connected with its head, a line, a coil, always elongatedly jolting every minute or so in a ploy to make the others appear.

Although the towering body was of no other use than a bomb-filled with disease, spreading with a spore-like feistiness that would, as much, would not displease, for every touch made its children grow, and their chitinous eggs were pentagons of carcass-o.

It was the master of every single wretchedly killed inside the two citadels nigger-bodies brought from beyond.

A scientist was working on his big-boxed filled with angular-worked on bands, tubular-orange main part of the upper-wiring side of the defunct-imploder. It had large lined four, seven and eight glowing tube-racks in which vials were quickly drawn in and out of their rocked-on top of sockets.

What stood out was the fact that a tube was much wider, being at the very least fifteen nicely shaped inches high, with grainy silver-wrapped stained filament wraps, small bolt-like beauteous spikes, which had peculiar outwardly protruding wiring coming out of them, where little sparkling made of electricity dogs ran around, a multitude of apparatuses-given birth to legs and claws, moved here and there cricked like, with upwardly heaved then downwardly stored as to fit back inside the socket the entire thing got taken out of, polished, shined to such a nice cleanness that it was indistinguishable from freshly carved by a greatly, masterly done by him, well-crafted hands that belonged to, the already said medieval blacksmith whose job was so irresolute that someone who came into contact with his work might've thought he came out of future, engineer, peak forge-work, with a down-ward pointing spear-shaft, whereas, the lower side of the tube- through which this sharp metal tip pushed through looked like the lower part of a light-bulb. Fancy-flashy as well, with high-electron intensified by the density of their molecule absorbers, condensing-maker – antennas, hidden in the main body of the tube-phial, which also managed to go through every possible shade it could produce, blue, red, yellow, a white light, so on and so forth, even UV and radioactive. It had a finely, double cased transparent window-protector and a peculiar blood liquid inside of it, not to mention an eye and the remnants of a smaller body. When no one stared at this tube, it disappeared. In another dimension, where it was greeted by many similar tubes, floating in its proximity as they became energized with power-electrons, with the help of which they formed various iterations of pentagram like formations, linked within one another, as to communicate with a much, far greater devourer of metal, whose open gut stood before them, far more frightened yet filled, or covered by a coat made out of the bodies of well-put together fucking niggers, many of them being, or having been violently lynched in order to give birth to this beautifully, well thought, as for the design of course, coat. Its bigger, fatter more bloated simian-nigger, although that is unfair for every other nigger in existence since they are all monkeys, dumb-dirty criminal monkeys that should be put down for the nigger-racking of everything they either steal or destroy, yet aren't held accountable for it, getting away, as if sins are all taken care of. Monkey-monkey, here, here, dumb-monkey, don't you want a banana?'

Something dangerous's about to happen. The tubes met the nigger and their master, being surrounded by one another, five phials went around, two on the left, one of the fifteen centimeters still above the ground, one above, and the last, nigger moved a few inches on, still confused from the looks of it, the phial closing in quickly after, quickly the heaved master, whose face reddened as soon as they smashed the ground, trying to surround one another in their strange dance, when a lightning bolt stroke, both master and blunder-faced slave frozen, in place, trying to secure their positions as they were, struck, stuck again, in a weird angle, one of them with his arms put forward as if a bridge was to be made over, with lightning lines of jolting sparkling masses throwing themselves around them, travelling from one side to another, exactly four great conduits on the ground, slightly above, and the one that was on top, which already forced the others to move, creating incessantly moving yet spidery in terms of dancing lights that never met or touched.

'Master, they will nigg, they will niggle me if I don't let go.'

'You dumb fool, if you do something, even remotely like it, I will, I will!'

He shut his mouth as soon as it was time for him to start again, all around the face and here and there, anywhere, really. Niggerish in the niggardly abode, and another master rose. Quickly, fragmented, they ran, broke the lines and as soon as it happened, the lightning was quickly done for. Disappeared, made as such, and before long, as were the tubes. Before the strange dimension was overrun, with naught more than a band of filthily good for nothing, beaten on top their heads, niggers.

'Pat yourself on the head, nigger. I'm sure you could've done all right.'

'But master, what happened to you now?'

'They got me.'

Half his face was taken down, filled with boils, and run into the ground where the gourd of eaters took its place.

The president approved this god damned thing for a reason and not a single man was disabled enough not to work, although many of them were not only mentally debilitated but appeared not to be there altogether. Yet he was afraid of something. Day one-fifteen, on the on-set of the lightning bolt that hit the booth:

Long before any man could ever hope to realize his wretched back, as to be spoiled by the many put through his head and all over, come-around that came right after.

Stood before them, a few, patches of men, but broken in the head, shattered as for every skull as well, a nasty wreathed, put inside, a child that was barely blind, a toy, a giant, whose heads were thrice, and as they opened their mouths, and set on flights, one could see them for what they were, no infant but the strange concave. Wretched was the helmet that had seemed, the likens of a mother would but weep if she was met; erected here and there, but rather legless, there as such; acquired, of such floaters as one would see him wet the floor of blood, and better yet come to view.

From beneath him but the trunks were shattered, though connected with the girth soon after. It was a flying blob of meaty-skin whose skulled helmets and feet were thin, as it flapped around in growth and opened, as soon as it could see itself as quickly after, had it yet forgotten.

It was, very much welcomed inside.

This giant non-infant baby, standing by their side; many of the scientists were beheaded at this point in time and neither of them understood what was going on in here but didn't complain. As it happened, such it was, their room was bloody. Many niggers were but put in line.

'Where is my brother, you dumb-incessant, unnerving things? You nasty creatures, you've ruined the beast.'

Which was naught else but what it appeared like, from whichever angle he could look into, all of them immediately cowered, just as they were frightened after.

'Bow to the giant head of the nigger!'

Shouted the men of dark, but they would not relent and all but joined in holding the booth down, as the niggerhead reared into the atmosphere, trying itself, as to appear.

'Nigger-nigger dead nigger-monkey, need to kill that nigger with something sharp, I won't make it any time sooner than that, I'm afraid that the nigger-nigger dark kazoo, the nigger-petty, nigger sees me, I see you.'

One of the gushing blood, things got stings and the entire place was infested and infested and shattered, the niggerhead ate, it completely swallowed the top of the citadel's toweresque lead. Then it but flew away. While the lightning machine, in its final breath, within its dying splendor, gave birth to the final nigger, but this one being of a yellowish-Gook skin. The 'People's Republic' is being thinned; day by day, because so many niggers can't behave.'

Intermission ended.

Jin is born.

The cherub left, and most of the people at the party died, as did the bourgeois which in turn fixed capitalism completely.

‘Anthony, Jinathan, Leopold, for thine praiseful attendance.’

There was naught more, grander, than what it had been, to have seen him, sent by the Emperor of Subhumanity himself, in a world that couldn’t have, sooner yet began falling apart. Such was it that it seemed, with every passing second, thinned were their ways.

A history was made up.

‘It may be hard to swallow as to understand the intricacies that were long before one was even, or had had the chance to get born involved in the retelling of such dark as there is, mysterious of tale of wonder as how the kingdom of China, whom was actually, in actuality.’

Leopold was not present in the room, only a wretched creature that had fallen as low as, could be seen. Torn apart and made to waste in front of all of them, uncannily to a fault.

Women, women are nice.

A conversation:

‘What do you like about her? What are you seeing in her?’

‘It’s not about what I seen in her, but, you wouldn’t understand, maybe you can. I can’t be sure about it. But, she gets. Her pussy gets wet on command. She’s like a trained dog, I trained her well.’ Was there, at any point in time, anything else a man could do without? But her, and blue-sapphire eyes; She’s called me a liar in the past. That’s as far as what she looks like should go.

‘I think she’s been leaving, a few banknotes every few months or so, on the side of my porch. She’s a keeper that one.’

‘Your girlfriend’s been leaving you money and she gets wet on command; that sounds as if you made it.’

‘Living the American dream during an Age it’s been long past since.’

They kept walking near the rose-bush garden. It was epistolary, walking along. Part of it was recorded on an old VHS that got lost after its owner accidentally displaced it into one of the trash-cans; near the place he used to work in. Anthony wrote poetry, about their walk, together, but his hands were sweaty that day, since it was a hot-night summer during which they kept each other entertained. One of the trees near them had a carving, he dug in, Claire being responsible for that, but they cut it down.

I still feel bad about the poem, being the only ones I made. But it’s not as if anyone was interested in romanticizing the likes of an amateur. Some things are meant to be lost. They’re not meant to last forever, not even half-way through, along the road, where they rested, near the dumb-foul laker, they rested near. For a time; it sure was different than anything he’s experienced before.

‘It’s been a long day since then, please, do your best to entertain me, Claire, this is the only time I’ll get to be myself. And unfortunately, there’s no one else in here to hear me, other than you.

The only one who’s ever going to know, my real self. I’m not the man you think I am, the one hiding behind the parties, or the bourgeois. May I kiss you?’

‘Am I expected to get wet on your command?’

‘Only if you will.’

They kissed after. It was a long day, going through the bush garden. Various people were present there, also pictures had been put to the employ of it, but only clear pictures had been dismissed. Since most cameras only took ‘wrong-pictures’ where the image was lost. It is a grainy lot the ‘new’ people are coming out of.

A blurry picture speaks a lot nowadays, they’re worth a fortune. Mostly because there’s no difference between what you don’t see and what you do see any longer. They made it so no conceivable way to distinguish either.

Eh, nonsense.

‘But you know what, Claire?’

If there’s anything I ever thought of, if there was anything that’s ever crossed my mind, it’s long gone. It’s hard to explain why. Those things I left behind coming here, they mean nothing to me any longer, now that I found it.

I’m so close with my research and all; so, so close to become God, well not entirely a deity on my own or their terms, but I found a means, to take a leap, and avoid ending up in the same rotten pile as the one they’re in. Compared to that, they’re nothing, compared to me. I can clearly see now, as if my hand has already been raised, casting a shadow across my face, or what’s left of it. I see its bloody red shadow as clear as it is.

Perhaps I’ve gotten too rash now, perhaps I’ve yet to outgrow the leash that’s still wrapped around my neck, but, you still don’t understand this bloody rush that’s going through my head now. I yearn for it, for more. Now that I can, finally make sense and fix what’s been left broken. No more ruminating. No more slacking left my dear. We still got more progress lain ahead of us and so little time left in the world. If I could find a faster away to somehow, well, we’ve yet to see what I’ll be capable in a decade or so.

We’re not standing on equal grounds just yet. But when we do, then...’

Anthony stood beside her, and as he did.

He thought about it, he considered as much, the way it was trainable, the way he could somehow, perhaps catch up.

‘Look into my eyes, woman.’ Cried Anthony as he grabbed her by the tips of her fingernails, having only miser her soft-blinded hands but the least-release of a grip.’ They breed, those dark-skinned animals, they breed like the idiotically birthed creatures they are, even now, as we speak, spreading around like wretchedly defunct animals. Unleashed, without a master.

Anthony opened Claire's mouth with a sharply dulled, by nicking, knife. Entering her after, when, no one saw it happen.

Since all evidence was lost.

Aryithronyi then became the lord of diseases, walking in a meat-suit of Claire. Bearing a chest-globule lined on a rack blade made out of his proper-bone, a dark malignantly set-sharpened by a disease glowing spear, which communicated with the plasma, making various unnaturally deformed little elongated but merged, humanoid-spore in the head, bacterium casks of stone-like covered by other organisms, well fit together like tri-dimensional puzzles, from which seeped pure –disease ritual stones. From inside of which dramatic theater masks of yellow pox, filth grew on unseen-steps, forming sutured on top bridges upon which nasty worm-filled and made out of maggots sutured together as well rats drew along, carrying floating lung-children whom were brought out of a kindergarten-diver's suit's enclosed head, and musk was in there as well. Aryithronyi grew four great horned bands with small niggers impaled in their four at a time dark spikes, sixteen small bleeding niggers falling apart. He lost his legs in the process but they were replaced by down-ward facing people-like contortionist-gliders, allowing him to fly upwardly but never downwardly, while his arms were twisted and turned in sack-body mass filled body-bags, punching-bags where two more Aryithronyi were given birth two. These wombs being both akin to sand-bags, as were they to everything aforementioned. Claire was growing in there as well. His servant stones followed.

A word from paradise:

'The wretched god that's been gotten from his forgotten solace now rests upon the darkest homes where brothels of spread-through every John and Jane, whom walk upon their children's veins, through which they formed on dark-command, a piece of swollen-forth dark sky.'

And he was right, the bloated angel, whom spoke to him there. In the dark-niggerhead, when standing in the body, pretending to be Anthony for a show he would not dare, as if to draw.

Four brothels lay attached to the house, perpendicularly to the land, casting shadows down. As if they were tumor-growths on top of heads; drawing from them, pumping around, and said:

Puckery gases were released every now and then, as they were called to gather from one corner of the town to, a much grander, yet another.

'My lord, floors are being yet again changed and chained beneath our eyes, I see but veins, of whom are these children, infants whose growths are spread?'

'I do not know, my dear son, I've yet to watch it happen, or to unfold in front of me yet.'

They waited as such. Until the Johns and the Janes, all gathered around, such taste. As would be had, what came through and after; as was observed, they wept, for every child a mother, a missing father has returned. And when they asked for their children back, 'what does thou think it happened?'

A giant morbidly obese, a piece of cut through flown through grit, had come from the blessing of a dark sky, whom gave beneath them, dark shade so fewer and lesser of them, as to their refusal, to, lest of all, die, were they not fathom to return. Many of the children, being worn, had been taken back, claimed as many others just like them, after that.

The city was silent.

‘And every man and every woman, infant, child, out of fear that the brothels might poison them, were taken by the cut-out piece, which had belonged to the dark sky.’

All was clearly happily, merrily, set to such perdition as would they have found peace.

‘The city was spared, and much to theirs, the people have lived in a wreathed in hole, unaware that their sockets were stolen by I.’

The angel simply didn’t refuse to die for some reason.

Regardless of the many times he was being stabbed, regardless of what happened to this wreathed in dark beast. A cyst had formed, mighty was the niggerhead, bloated with disease, and then.

Well enough, as it happened. The next day, the show, was gotten:

Johnny was there. Jin, twenty six, twenty-seven; and others, such was the angel with them.

Aryithronyi was talking to the President Somorro:

‘I’ve been meaning to talk to you for a while now. Will you do me the honor of inviting me to take a seat?’

Many pigeons were now pigs. The Crabs had lost the war. Many niggers were already dead since someone managed to start the race war. The disease was perfected, the ethnic cleansing had yet defended, whatever values, liberty was freed; there was as much as one would guess, peace. For the being:

‘Who are you Anthony, no, please, have a sit, I’m trying to get into your mind and understand, what and why.’

A unit was but become, part of the camera and there, yet mourned, for such was it. Piece of Malt, Dour, BOD, the head could be seen, wretched was the tortured in spirit that brooded there. A bunch of cords attached to the display, but the world, mightily in tune.

In exactly one hundred, precisely wrought days, people of Nak will invade the only, left through and over house that was untouched and still kept on without being tainted by profanity and by illness of the mind.

The President was boring. Anthony’s mind drifted away.

My lady I’m but undeserving of your most perfumed scented ‘broad-ey’ farts, Jedadiah decided it was time to tag along, which are most obscure and sadly gone, while a few machines moved in on him, all along your moistly skin, incapable of stopping himself as his arms were, as they sway, scrawny sounding, only one of them, each metal coil but wrapped, her in the shower incapable to be brought to a stop, they fought over her, the three, I see that I am joined by an old friend, in agony, the room was moved a few inches to the right, during a most bothersome earthquake that also brought, a slight pause to the shower, we all stood still for a moment, the water flowered, as its metal coil drew on, fully energized yet shocked, clicking in, around each peeled up pile, of rotten-vile puffs of gas, drawn in by an open window they were all closely drawn towards. Since neither of them both could stand, for what was worth, one's definitely misplaced admiration towards Constance's flabbergasting song, while Jedadiah had been strangled death, though asphyxiation might be plain but scented, her perfume, but gladly taken. It was to die for. The dark machine quickly made do to get rid of the body outside, and thin was the pile, off the drop. Too bad that fellow died, right, during a time the machine stopped. Being off a mind to let go of it now.

My dear lady, I did think. As such, and would consider, yet I year, dyer to your clothes that I may bring you home after your shower is done for, that I may crawl inside your bathtub and having plunder upon your underside, taken you by the side of the stool, rapidly sawed you in half before your robot servants drew forth as to prove.

He didn't open his mouth yet, oops.

'I should've known you would betray me mind, oh, such there is my cowardice as I bear such desire as to end myself and die, but not before I had wrapped my sweaty thumbs around your wrists and butchered you, within the likes of my fist, aforementioned as I have shoved it, put it up yer arse you dumb-fucking bimbo slag. Fancy me a wanker, ey?

I'll show you one, if you wait. Fancy-fancy puddle-washer, I bet your carpet-carpet muncher, ey?'

The female did not respond, but luckily for him, he practiced talking to a lady, every now, thence and once. In his mind at least, like this:

'Greetings good girl, may I take you to my home? Even though I have invaded yours, and I have an unwashed by blood-stainless steel knife I am, you know me, we've got ourselves acquainted, I can definitely put one up there, if you know what I may, pretty, come on pretty, show me some nip, please. Undress I tell you before I get pettily mad, every now and then, at once, I will stalk you up to your house, go on call the cops.'

But I has a mighty swollen-thunder blade, unless, you dumb-fucking board, flat, they should have some big breasts, so I can suckle, with my big-swollen mouth.

'I will behead you, with a potato-knife. I'm thinking, I intent on smashing your fucking bimbo-face against a nastily made-by-stubby toes with wooden-oak calluses around its sides unwashed table, murder and premeditation. I've been harboring these feelings for some while now.'

Women don't like me anyway, I should die.

But the machines, they hide children within. Of mighty verdure, they're the strangers in this world, they've yet to understand how it's made work.'

'What, who are you, and what are you doing outside my shower?'

'Are you talking to me or the machine?'

‘Please leave, I am naked.’

‘I think so. I sure do, I’m glad we skipped everything else. There’s no need for anything else to occur, for now, I can definitely take my time with this. Definitely, I most definitely am going to do that, take my time and think it through. Will not do anything too rash, you know? I don’t want to spoil my chances with you, I practiced, you see?’

He had already destroyed the machine, by squirting blood out of his eyes at it. Which caused it to fall over itself and break over, covered with blood. He rapidly pissed on it with blood-clots after, after punching himself repeatedly in the kidneys. Why?

Because there was a great demon in the room that was the ceiling and its mouth was malformed with great peculiar cocoon-like shapes with many spikes that were angles around then, downward like hook-pipes whose iron sides were bent over with pliers.

In the meantime; oh; the room was simple, and the bathtub was in the middle. So much noise; regardless of it, he pissed in the tub from where he stood, and now she was slowly drowning, in blood-piss. Trying to grab anything with her blood-piss covered hand. She was drowning, oh now. No one was saving her. The entire tub was filled with blood-piss. It was the will of the demon that she drowns in blood-piss. All of sudden, as if she was possessed, something getting into her, she started rubbing all that hardened-by clots blood-piss all over her face. While the stream kept going. Like a child; urine.

‘Fancy me now, you dumb lousy bimbo? Yeah, I bet you fancy me a wanker now, with all this, red shower, I’m covering you, in red shower, suckle on it.’

On the other side of the tub, the clot formed a wheel of pyramids with spears-rolling along ocean waves hardened of blood-people that ran nakedly around the room as soon as they removed themselves off the pile she was a part of.

That man is part of the Blood-pissing-on women Faction, which is a part of the Cancer-rape foundation, that are a part of the Put-cock-inside-a-woman’s mouth country, plow her pussy until she drops.

‘Oh yes, fresh wine. Very tender, Douchon, I taste, should I taste myself now? I don’t think so, this one is only for the ladies.’

There were flying tractors with dark heads on both sides that were wide and white, like statue-masks worn by Greeks but had cylinder-device apparatuses coming out of their mouths and hive-like bodies attached to them that also had racks in the middle that rotated in black-tumor fly like dark corners with black-bodies of tar covered cask mummies that wore golden masks. They were summoned as well, by the demon-ceiling, only to have a laugh at the blood-piss drowning bimbo.

‘Let’s join in as well.’

Just as soon, they all started peeing blood in the tub as well, starting, slowly, to unzip their ‘pants’ –lower sides of their hives, revealing hundreds upon hundreds of larvae-like phallic objects that started showering her as well. Even the ceiling, in a localized area, above the tub, while this was happening, she was desperately trying not to drown.

One of the blood-creatures heard a knock on the door.

It was the servants, they all entered the room and started having a laugh.

‘Come in, you know what to do, brothers.’

Everyone started punching themselves harder, right around their bellies, then they all joined in, together, crossing their rays as well, as hard as they could. There was so much piss-blood in there that it, quickly enough started overflowing.

Some of them started forming blood-vortex discs by simply wishing it, if only someone wished her suffering to be over, if only. But no, they only started pissing harder. Squeezing it in, going across the walls, painting everything, they just went at it, mad wankers, they were-a-giggle, fancy yourself that way, don’t you?’ Mad wankery it was, wank-wank!

The piss then became a whip that flew around the room they were in.

At first, the flow of piss didn’t interrupt either. The piss became discs and carpets and guns and other strange clot-like things.

It was strange.

‘I didn’t know there are so many great things in the world that are made happen.’

One of the godly-demigod creatures with one billion born-smaller demons born out of, like snore-bubbles out of your nose made by animated strange creatures or fancy cartoons, being gelatin like-creatures, these being their bellies, while their upper torsos were hardened and impossible to crack, came out of a billion horns that were funnel-like and segmented and were attached to bulb-thing head-like shapes of botflies attached to a great back a lower-missing body, of a demon, some of these demon being placed on the back of its arms as well as head and other horns, which only made it so, it was known, that it was soft, there, stood outside. It looked exactly like the children it was giving birth to, a perfect copy, their father, being openly cannibalized. It had no face but instead, was missing it, having a hallow instead, which had been punched in; blood, clot, fallen over skin - Syphilis victim-like before penicillin, with a woman trapped inside, held by, alive as well as floating, magic glowing lantern, that was there, in the cave-like rottenly torn apart, on the inside creature-like short space. Rituals were being performed there, by many goats, whose lower sides were strange cylinders with wheels on all four sides that rendered them not functional but they floated, on top of floating frozenly pools made out of melted sutured people. Their sutures floated on top, like swimmers as did their clothes, as did their teeth and bones, in that pool gelatins, and these goats were dark statues with shattered faces, where they bore secret prosthetic arms, with prosthetic-guns, that were statues as well, but were masterfully done, so as to show that, the models used for the sculpture were not real arms. Somewhere, out there, in the world, these goats existed, and that was the most frightening thing of all. Magic was in their eyes, for Moloch was their gods, which, in some bizarre way, meant that, if these goats had a complete set or pair of prosthetic rams, they would be rubbing now, or at least be immortalized in that rubbing position, like kikes, always subverting; like Venus de Milo.

‘Magic is a gun, use it, now, little faggot, I am going to devour your guts with a gut-wretchedly maligned power gut-gut with two lobes made out of great energizer hardened by cartilage dark geysers.’

‘Enough of this wretchedness and mockery, for thine self and thine others; it is time, wretch that you return, drawn forth by the bowels of the earth, into that pitted place where you have come from!’

Death will not wait for you, nor for others, is its time that every living thing to join your brothers!

Crawl back into your worthless pit, and off without brothels and disgusting yearned for wretched desire as to creep!’

In the distance:

‘Lord of destruction, thou are to return from the depths of the degenerate-around the crown of your broken apart body’s lain by side where a leashed army is lain on top of, towards and ever so disgraceful as you are set on your knees, in the world beyond the world, the Ashallayehnyi Hyioanaamarr, in which children are made to waste eternally in the dark-corners, of the broken palaces’ tainted drop, upon the shattered thrones of might-maligned, wreath in and wheat-fields filled, in which dark encasement of every broken-armed man there is. Where subjugated as mere children they are lain there, sparingly, misguided by, the mere whim of their masters beyond the graves, whose, under the never-ending command they rise and fall, inside hardened cages they’re forced to suffocate in and out of existence, as they’re incapable of fully being, completely, without remorse, shattered, and thereon out destroyed. In that place where your children are, the soldiers of our armies; there lays the throne you have been asking for this blessed eternity as to ascend from inside the bowels of the eighteen dark giant prices whose skulls are shattered in, yet holding between their arms, prideful in act, despite their missing legs, despite the hardened-bodied, with many faces and many spears and bastards, though hidden so thoroughly inside, blades and speared-pikes, weapons in disguise, these giant kegs that had taken a hold of their limbs hold billions upon billions, beyond the grave, of more, beyond your mere comprehension, bodies upon whose bodies stacked upon dead-corpses, lay naught more. And naught else but your deadly-distilled ancestors, wine-corpses that had been strangled and killed by dark flying rays, filled with tumor-shaped cattle that stick out like skin-tags and have rats for eyes even though they’re made out of one piece – connected to their main bodies. And, below the earth, where there’s an abyss, these punched-in by, the rays, like hard-punching, a boxer’s strike through your face-shattering kind of motion pierces had been disabled by, their, so there’s no confusion here, the ray’s hardened spittle, that shot like iron-picks. But made out of cartilage and skin, hardened cluster of hardness; wrought and turned to iron, then spat out. They stand on nothing, well their hands may be extended, and these wrongly wrought kegs may be, well, siliceous, but. They float. And in the abyss, more corpses; many of whom have yellow teeth, just as I have, I checked. Every single one of them; as I am a prefect being that’s lain beyond the mere mortal comprehension – comprehensiveness of time, beyond it, as you’d have nothing in your mind, you could come up with nothing as to prove me wrong. I am so beautiful, lord of destruction, I am a lady. Will you not kiss me?’

‘No, I will not, for I have already come out of a pussy now, and I have already come out but destroy. I am pure now, and nothing that change that, ever. You are beneath me, wench-maiden. And now I shall take my time, to laugh at you. Ha-ha-women are dumb. Imagine being a woman, ha-ha. Imagine someone who began reading late in life, but who reached this level, ha-ha. I mean, how can women even compete? Ha-ha, ‘Wyuh-min’ being equal to men.’

The great lord of destruction then took a seat, then he started laughing. While having taken a seat; before he began slapping his knees and laughing even harder.

‘Women are on suicide-alert now, oh no.’

‘Yeah-yeah, keep rubbing it, jackass!’

Well. Anthony was just about ready, to forget.

He was there, present in that room, watching. That wasn’t his wife, but a family friend. It was the same woman that spoke to the lord of destruction they had pissed blood into.

But before the President could open his mouth again; he remembered a different story told to him by his close-friend:

The drunk-criminal Hugh Elon Leone Di Marseilles, Prince Progenitor, Servant of God, who’s also born on a weirdly ‘bothersome’ December morning in sixteen forty seven, the eighth, where, during a Sunday, when, a nauseatingly strange event almost prevented his birth from occurring, but by some divine intervention, in all likelihood, most people who were present at that time might or may not live, as a matter of fact under the impression that he may not yet still be alive either, although that goes both ways but that’s all behind him now since this man, got, needlessly, though, it should be mentioned that this is someone who is in possession of a U-N-I-Q-U-E-L-Y, limited edition, as confirmed by the General Association of Weapon Manufacturing of the United States of Bolivia, now defunct, although their label still exists as well, as, in some way, the legitimacy of this bluish-green with large dot riddled, painted head-shattering insectoid with fourteen heads attached to one another buckled blow-straddling, explosives-attached to its can-making projectile producing large malignantly shaped, capable of destruction, overly sharpened blow-peashooter like weapon, illegally modified as to bear an addition of eighteen heaps, made of hands, of put together candidly dead spikes with head-tumor little nasty-creatures having inorganically grown out of every edifice it bore; a rat, in his mouth, that quirkily played, with his ugly hand at once, quickly acted, both, Soloquitor Admiral, that, joining in, was of the opinion of this place being pleasantly-nice, with the three of them being in a field of yellow-colored puffy-cotton looking wild rice, noticed how they could not be, out-matched, in their dance, together, thought the proper naming of the dance, being, arm in arm, rather than hand in hand, as in a grab around a bear’s paws in a desperate attempt to fend him off so he won’t chew off the side of your throat, as deep as to head in a few millimeters in, proceeding to affect, in this order, the great transverse cervical nerve, the great auricular nerve, the Levator Scapulae, Scalenes, Omohyoid, as well as the Splenius Capitis Cervical muscles, causing damage to the thyroid cartilage, trachea, epiglottis if gone through a full swipe kind of motion, reaching, perhaps, depending on the width of the bear’s claw, the hyoid bone, maybe, perhaps even the first rib, lymph nodes, while, seeing how it’s a strong bear, he may as well fully penetrate the throat and intrude into the Larynx, Trachea, and Epiglottis, causing ever-so-spreading tremors of jerkiness, whose vibration would spread across the body, in a most shatteringly distraught kind of supreme blow of overpowering force, a display of its animalistic primeval strength, that, it is quite obvious that this force of strength could belong to no one else, and no one other than, well, in actuality, if this is what it sounds like, then, not only would the bone, blood cartilage, veins, lymph nodes, and everything else be ripped apart by the brutish force of the swipe but also the man’s jaw, which, of whose bear breed is now, to a conjure made irrelevant, would be reminiscent of an old Latvian poem, by the name of Lacplesis, by Andrejs Pumpurs, although, this would be more of an ironic twist on it than anything else –kind of hold; chain dancing, that was proceeded upon as if they were, in actuality close friends who’ve been, for too long a tediously, prolonged as well, drawn upon even further than what is found socially acceptable; a break in equity; period of time, whereas neither of them considered such an alternative as the possibility of any well-thought exchange of correspondence that might've spared them a lot of trouble, between both, and both parties involved being equally at fault, having, only now found themselves 'trapped' in a rather peculiarly 'breath-taking' conundrum, from which neither of them even considered getting out of. The Prince Progenitor was suffocating, with the rat whose lower body already grew inside his gut.

He could just see them b.

'You changed.'

'What was that?'

Anthony turned around for a moment. It was no one in particular, standing in the crowd.

'I don't know you kid. Leave.

I have a chance now, to finally make something of myself, don't ruin it for me.

We can't both exist here, at the same time. It's; just stop it your. It's a childish habit.'

'You've become mean.'

'Worse than that kid, I've become much, much worse and it's only going to get worse. There are things you simply don't and cannot understand until you reach a certain age. There are some things in life you have to leave behind. There are times when you must do horrible, horrible things just so other people could get a chance to fight as well.

It won't make either of us happy. Now I don't have to thinking about anything else, other than improving. I'm no longer stagnating, like I was then. I no longer; have to feel bad, or worse. Either way; I'll still be miserable. So leave, you petty, insolent child, return to your chasm.'

'Why can't you.'

'Enough, I wish I was normal. I wish I did normal things, I wish I had learned how to properly do art. But I can't. I'm stuck with this, kid. I've always been this way, kid.

And you are as well, I can see it you, in even now. It reflected into everything we say and do. Especially then, and now, it's no exception.'

The child was driven away. Hopefully he'll go play with that dumb whore, by the name of Innocence while he's at it.

All ruined because of them. My only chance, ruined.

'Run away child. It's only going to get much worse from this point on. I wish it were different, but if I can hurt them back, for what was taken away from me, then I shall do it. There is no greater purpose in life than it. There is no greater purpose, nothing!

I don't care whether or not it's petty. I don't care about the consequences, I don't have. I don't know anything else. An eye for an eye, it's all I have left. What's left of my hatred is what makes me feel humane and I grew too fond of that feeling to simply let go of it.

I have given up art for nothing, empty words that mean nothing, ugly, empty things I can't properly remember. I loathe them so much. If they want to see what a truly sick mind looks like, they will have it!

Considering.

'You know what, I think I may have been harsh with that.'

'Why the actual fuck do I not understand a thing I read? What the fuck?'

A dark cowl wearing figure with orangutan arms that had the ability of deforming time-pieces of shattered reality, pulled out of, a few meters in front of them, pocket, they constantly made shards, of, and in the gaps, if someone were to enter they'd instantly age and die, immediately, as if they cut themselves in shattered windows, and threw them at people. While, these cutouts of time, upon cutting, sharpening and slashing, would, enter, then pass through, the person they're entering, while spluttering in every direction, take the seated Jonathan, whose shoulder, was enter, cut, then imploded in a piece of a car, a lamp, his mother's face, a part of his school yard and just about every object, from every age, from every second, from every moment, second, hour, of his life, in an area, subjectively selected, yet all, overlapping, his shoulder, momentarily, before being released, across the room, jumping, leaping and bouncing against the walls, before finally resting, in place, then disappearing since they were paradoxes. He survived. His dark robe was ruined, not Jonathan's, but this figure's. IT was like a vest, because of those giant hairy things. He also chewed bubble-gum and made, out of the balloons- ballista projectiles with cowls on top of them, made of gum, that spat gum-nails, curving while, touching, everything. In an instant; as if they expanded for a moment, across the room, then reverted to their original form. Making everything sticky; like grenades. Gum-grenades; every molecule was converted in a gum-sticking grenade and if it weren't for the time paradox, that disappeared, everyone would've died. His breathe also froze everything, including himself, deep-freezing like, being a prehistoric man in Antarctica, for a few moments. It came out like an unwrapping toy made of popping explosion cold vapor that immediately pounced upon everyone like panthers, while they were standing – sitting. Because of him; a few meters above the earth. Then everything happened all at once, and they got pieced in one place, frozen, imploded, with time and gum-grenades and in time, and cut, and aged. And they started melting-decaying, their faces being shaped like satellites with tubular-shapes heads. He also had, half-of the room, as a square-wing, protruding out of his chest, with an open wall, where people could look at a play with toys, show. Like mannequins, which produced, little flies, shaped like the targets they followed, taking their souls only to put them back into his wing-outta-chest room he toiled with. His head became an ironing board, taking the cowl with it as well, but bearing hard-to look at deranged power-rays cutting and bouncing around every piece of the room, which was already ruined.

He stood next to Anthony.

'Hello Anthony.'

'Hello.'

‘Ho.’

‘Ho to you too, then.’

‘I don’t know who you are.’

‘The feeling’s mutual.’

‘It is exactly what I expected. And I expected nothing less.

And I shall not expect a thing.

And I shall expect everything, from this point on.’

Anthony, being the diseased animal he was, pulled a rotten sword out of his gut, that bore eyes colored green with rotten fingers cutting themselves along the edges. Bleeding, always, on the floor; his teeth were filled with rotten decay and he stopped having legs. They fell off like prosthetics. His face looked like untreated stds, like whores.

He opened his mouth, and out came a long hand. It had nice finger nails.

He also thought for a second.

‘May, I think it was may, when my friend, the Lord of Destruction, the one who had pissed in my friend’s bathtub, did the thing, I think.’

‘That certainly sounds, interesting.’

The president also joined in. He was staring at the ceiling, and had been staring, atta boy, at the ceiling, for far too long. Painted spots, with suns; no stars, very cheap, like shoes.

‘A man of culture, like you.’ Said the stranger to the President. ‘Must definitely be in possession of children’s shoes.’

‘Of course, I eat them.’

‘What?’

‘Oh yeah, I eat children’s feet in the People’s Republic all the time, of course. You see, we eat just about everything, dogs, cats, animals, children, hey. One child policy, and all. Everything’s on the table, even my wife.’

‘Leave.’

‘I’m afraid we killed every crab and every pigeon, every horse, dog, cat, and just about everyone else who was in this room, other than I, Jin, Anthony, Jonathan, you, and I, and the ones that remain.’

The future sure was interesting. The future is interesting. The future:

‘I present to you, dear show viewer. Today, I am going to interview, the president. He is the president.’

He wore a crown, reminiscent of the dark baby infantile creatures that flew from the generator inside his two citadels. How queer.

‘You know, it’s never occurred to me until this point, but. I think, yes. I think the giant niggerhead is going to crash, like a comet, eventually, on top our country. And we will all die.’

‘That’s good to hear, president Sacramento.’

Everyone had knives in their pockets,- gifts.

‘I am a fine connoisseur of art, of course, of course.’

Anthony then looked at the ceiling which in turn was the cause of him remembering something that happened to him as a child, when he was young, a boy, in his youth, a child, when he was, a child, he was a child once, not an adult, well behind time, when he was still fighting for the, well, much farther than that, when he was fighting for the proliferation of the decipheration, of the alkalization of the bourgeois.

Its bloated fog in a clock, hardened shell was there, extending his mouth and at a backward ended, and put through incessant dark foliage mage bile-contender-sack stood before him, the wretched man who worked on the rocks.

I wish I could wash myself, in a tub near a woman that would want to do things with me, her and her and her and her, all of them, inside, we could do such things, when come together, big women, short, tall and many of them with nasty bushes, trying themselves and having had my way with them, I can and may not stop, calling them in this order, Natasha, Eleanor, Leonora, Vanessa, Valerya, most of them joining me hardly working, hardly moving hypnotized, or fallen sullen, and come after, nastily-drowsy, I need to make sure neither of them dies. ‘I would say to them as such, if you’d please. My dear lady, would you like a fist? I’ll pound your pussy and your face, I live, I exterminate. But don’t fucking move your bush, I want it non-clean, your stinky puss.’

And the ladies will love me, for I am such a nice guy, I’m to die for, I topple every man, die.

‘Hey you, Yankee, I come to the States, I steal your woman, no debate. No, no, you’d better lay down your arms, because I won’t play around, when it comes so quickly, stand to your feet, I’ll take you on and beat to beat, I will beat you if you dare. I can’t stand a nasty many. But if you do provide a challenge, beware. For I have tools and guns and plenty of strong-strong arms, I’ve been lifting a box, every few day or so and I look big, not small. Never stepped into a sweaty gym; you feeling me?

Because if you don’t, well, no-no, I’m whipping your nigg, I’m beating it, this nasty creature, don’t look at me, you won’t see no feature, meet me, and we’ll see around. Don’t forget to grab a gun.

Because I will come with a great dark army, riding on horses, I beat, I’ll smell your woman’s feet and her arches. My dark romances are yet to have begun. Affair after affair and I am gone, how many bastards do you think I’ll have? Millions of them, wow-wow, I ain’t shooting blanks, I will procreate, you see me at a bus stop, run, and I might not inflate, such things as would shatter your teeth and mouth, look at you, I’m a champion Boxer, and you’re but a kid in a suit and all.

And your niggers come running after me? I beat them as well. I beat them until they're dead. Do not compete with me, boy, because I will beat you until you're dead. I am the massacre, I am the killer, I ain't no angle, don't be a stranger but give onto me your women, I won't stop. I know what I'm doing now. All around, the world they say. We'll give Stefan what he wants, pussy that never ends. No, no, I will say, I am only a one woman's man, I only wait until marriage, otherwise, I will be dead. Stay away, I know plenty of you women, now, are wet. Streets are spoiled and drenched, the trenches, they are all the whences and the stench. For I am a great player, careful with your periods, you could drown, I don't want to bleed you to your deaths. Now that I have mastered the craft, my speech will make so many wet-panties drop from being completely, inwardly absorbed, they will want me. They want me, and they will say, grab us, but I will say no, maybe later. I knew what you were thinking but I am unpredictable now, impossible to beat, or to destroy. I am the strongest, strongest boy.

Yes. I am, I am that, the strongest boy-oh-both, how can there be another stronger than I, a boy-toy. Yes, I am, the boy-toy, women want me because they're children. Women are so mentally infantile that they want to be smeared by a boy-toy. Like I am, stop yourselves women, I seriously cannot deal with so many of you at once, I am going to blush. Why, oh, stop, please, stop. I cannot control myself, there's so many of you wanting me, oh my god, you're turning me into a narcissist, oh, my, god, I'm making so many women wet, many more to follow, oh my god, please, I beg of you, women, please control, your many, many, hormones.

I understand that many of you only have these many chromonzones left, I mean, your gut-bubbles, your ovaries. They're like ice-cream cones, I'd like to eat. I'd like to taste them through your feet. And give you fine kisses, many fine-kisses.

But, at the same time, I must also control myself as well, as I am no animal either.

I am a great vulture, I am so beautiful and pure, and strong and mourn myself when I am gone, for I alone, would feel such shame, as to be left, where I remain. I shall live and I shall die, and I shall be the only, lie. For humanity could not hope to abandon me. I am so strong, and mighty, I have a hammer, I made myself, of iron and of wood, and pint, and crack. I shall shatter all your hopes. I am made of better ropes. I am a man made out of wool, of string. I am made of a, gym's ropes you can climb on top of, during gym-class, but I don't want children to climb on me, eww, disgusting, which brings us to my next point, you woman shall, carry and raise my children. I don't want to take care of them, whore. You do it. I didn't force you to carry my children, this is why you are a whore.'

Then, he made her head pop and crack like a balloon that immediately started becoming small people that walked on the ceiling, small women 'people', because my opinion on women has not nor will ever change at all. Be gone, nasty woman, I shall do without you.

Then, I run.

Towards my dark castle; burgers I shall eat.

But on his way out of the two planets that had grown inside his fingers which were filled with other people like him, he was set on a dark booth, upon which he spoke to the cruel, two shattered around their skulls, deformed gods, whose decay spread, as soon as they came into sight.

One was a head, the other bloated to his side, and entered by a coral-shot, a buckle-spread of mighty dead, said:

‘Sad-sad, I am but sad, and paranoid at that, mighty, Anthony, but you are not. You are Malt, and somehow, you’ve escaped being destroyed.’

‘How?’

‘The core had damned you to a strange, beyond existence kind of dexterous existence stopped. And brought you back to life, in the name of Manno Filthde, stopped; but you are to remember, so, your name.’

‘Which one?’

‘The other, much to you, forgotten as such.’

But first, a break:

Today's commercial:

‘Thankfully, Jonathan handed me God.

My life changed ever since.’

‘What the actual fuck are you talking about?’

‘Here you go, it’s in my pocket?’

‘What?’

There it was, God.

‘Oh, you were talking about a crucifix.’

‘Now that I look back on it, all the way back then, I could’ve handed myself to a pack of rape-niggers.

But ever since I was given God, I ceased being a fucking flaming faggot.’

Don’t be a faggot, please, for God, for you. For your parents, for your Church, niggers!

As peculiar as it sounded, John, he was born on a Monday, with eighty sons – troglodytes invalids, whose bodies wasted in front of him, whose faces dragged on top their features like melted sheets, whom were all red-with-fury, bearing large iron-rooster weather-arrows through their heads, whose clothes were made of alloy-patchy junk, bearing iron collars around their foreheads. With things in their backs; spools of discs that bore coils, dragged from the distance, bigger compact bulby-reds, who were attached to them, ahead, a time.

‘I’ve come to claim my inheritance, father!’

Someone knocked on the door, pinching it, placing his fingers on the handle, his second hand on top their knuckles, looking at the frame, their knuckles, there being knuckles tied to his knuckles whom were planted there like nails. It split open. He entered through, cracks in his face, two heads with twenty, by the side, through his face, put through, in the sack of his gut and throaty neck.

John was born, indeed, with a few sons that had done something great in life. His favorite son, John-John-Plume-John John-Jr John-with-a-head-like-a-gun-shaped-barrel-with-eyes-on-the-side-bearing-largely contaminated wings-like protrusions that were actually giant ear-lobe inflated lobes that bore cranium faces themselves with dark horns, his being more of a fat-segmented half-a-hammer-shark head where the shark's eye is John's nose, but far more bloated as if filled with more mass, and the half-head is put on display as for his hard-lumpy-neck, but more like a gun, with the trigger being his cage-bars-teeth, the two ears being elongated hardened bubble gums or water drop shaped skulls, with tongues like drills but they were zap-guns; whose body was a nastily crafted filthily yet thoroughly, as it would be fair to say, raped-by-god-damn-fucking-niggers, or-her-children-if-jews-are-involved, oh-sorry-I-meant-to-say-filthy-fucking-kikes-who-are-also-cock-sucking-good-for-nothing-degenerate-,schizophrenic-,ugly-hooked-nosed-with-even-uglier-sagging-fat-piggie-fat-mental-prudish-low-IQ'D-with-the-excetion-of-a-'higer-'-verbal-intelligence-quotinet-that-'s-barely-higher-than-the-European-average-,exploitative-nasty-smelling-peevish-women-that-also-stink-,are-borderline-mental-invalids-mentally-crippled-deranged-,are-dumb-good-for-nothing-whores-with-no-critical-thought-as-in-being-incapable-of-saying-anything-even-remotely-intelligent-despite-being-given-a-chance-to-actually-think-of-something-or-dwell-onto-it-for-a-considerable-amount-of-time-bitches-so-basically-not-any-different-than-most-women-in-general-,while-also-being-high-maintenance-despite-their-ugly-fucking-mongrel-looking-faces-,so-on-and-so-forth-creatures-that-aren't-even-human-and-should-or-migh-as-well-kill-themselves-,mongrels, whose Holocaust did not happen, Gypsie fortune-teller's divination table but attached to, by a large foot-looking throat, with a hunchback lump in the back –spiked with human vertebrae spines, who also crawled on four lamia tails, that were interconnected by sutures, at the end of every tail there being a hole, that constantly shot hottened-heated steam bolts of encased small humanoids that looked like weird mirages, since they were made of steam, fire-chains of iron-lava-coated whips attached to a flying head with spinning horns bearing largely elongated torture devices adorned with most tertiary set vestigial caged bones of stolen valor robbed of soldiers robbed off out of solemnly desecrated tombs left shattered in dug-at-night by dead within the hour, shot in the head employed grave diggers as to cover all tracks, elongatedly sheeted cut-outs of termite trapped behind bodies of ants,-like discs with ropes holding them together in spinning kebab kind of motions, as well as the least hole that bore, but only opened, the closure hole being a cartilage whose puckery appearance would rather be reminiscent of third degree burns, as well as the scaly texture, that is already implied by the lamia coils it's crawling on, Fridays, when, and only then, every other day of the week, on the Gregorian Calendar as well, being closed, under lock-down, sealed-completely, utterly, beyond entry, as in-don't-even-think-of-trying, this is my property, don't thread on me, this counts as trespassing and if you try forcing this gate-door open, I am going to shoot you, kind of gate, yet, when it opens, it shoot small springs that have beady-beaded coils, where every single bead, marble, sphere, or whatever else comes along, is filled with huge, the hugest, the hughiemongiest W.M.D., even beyond their manufacturing capabilities, being far exceeded, these bombs not even being made in factories but being given birth to,' kind of bombs, that have faces on them, which, as a matter of fact, make John's entire body frame, with his bubbly half-hammer head, and melting pudgy pudding body and his four coiled tails, that, even now, are cackling, bastardly, beyond bastardly, unnervingly in a beyond-human-comprehension kind of way; brother of Casey-Case-Platoon-Soldier-man-Casey Case-Senile, Senior, of born-old-out-of-his-mother's womb but not as decayed as the other brothers, whose job was manufacturing large intestine spear-shafts out of his never ending torture-wheel that never stops rotating chest, but at time he grabs a hold of the 'open-window' pocket stove-door kind of opening where his every organ-entrails are being stored in so he can shape them, delivering them on a daily basis, at, roughly speaking, eight-to-five-am when he isn't spending his time doing adult-stuff like incessantly paying, labor-intensive demanding taxes, that have to be paid for as long and as long a period of time as possible unless, the Feds, whom he as well, worships, since they are still Gods, now, in the past, now, still, and in a few more decades or eons, or so, still, Gods, without exception, without worship, like the universe, they are, existing, in an unaltered existence which niggers can't even comprehend on their own since they are so fucking dumb, speaking of which, as well as his factory, which is filled with fucking niggers that are 'working' or are being 'worked' to death during an insoluble protuberance of such magnanimity as would have them reformed, only to be, unpleasantly hit by nothing else but the sad realization that niggers are not only beyond salvation and unsalvageable but also that he cannot fire them, yet, whose act of 'charity' pretty-much exempts him from having to pay some 'taxes', which is a most intelligent, state of affairs he so queerly yet most, most – good job, brother, kind of way of saying, you witty god damn bastard, you fucking damn shit-eating grinned lucky, lucky, fucking witty bastard, you've done, you fucking made, you fucker, you god damned fucker, you fucky-fucky go-lucky bastard, whose yet to work a fucking day in his fucking sad-pathetic life, but somehow by, the likes of Capitalism, somehow made it, I don't know how, since, thought it's not said or hasn't reached the eyes of the much to their fault, benevolent feds, you found a loop-hope in which you're paid the taxes, for every single nigger, in your fucking disgusting –intrusion-on-human-rights-non-violation, questionable work ethic, factory, which is a trick of what was fore mentioned, double-trickster, in-herd confusion, caused by a malady-miasma that confuses everyone around; servant of the Pantheon of Lleyilliophyfield Stanch-Crotch Bottotar, who is a well suited, businessman whose pantheon is cars, fine cars, well-preserved, limited-edition, paid for, fortunately, by a lot, of money, a lot of cash-daddy, like depreciated minorities kind of money, like enough of it, to fund the building, the labor-intensive construction, whose funding would far exceed the likes of the richest billionaires currently alive, and throughout time, who, if they were to raise money together, would be very much incapable of even building the base of the President Somorro, the great, the greatest, the most attested for by the most intelligently innovative-driven non-bought, non-corruptible, and non-redundant educated, goes without saying, intellectual-scientists who excel in both Mathematics and Psychics, magic, they're also dark magicians who can conjure beings from other worlds and dimensions with specifically used and put to their employ finger-motions, and dark-words, whose are also, or just so happen to, well, coincidentally they live in the greatest nation that ever existed, the People's Republic, and are, or, again, coincidentally happen to be Ethnically Chinese, but that shouldn't influence them at all, since they're mostly unbiased, otherwise, they wouldn't have been elected the 'Most intelligently Innovatively-Driven Non-bought, Non-corruptible, as well Non-redundant Educated, 'goes without saying'', Intellectual-Scientists who excel in both the fields of Mathematics and Psychics, as much as in magic, who also happen to be Dark Magicians who can conjure beings from Other Worlds and Dimensions with specifically used and put to their employ finger-motions, and dark-words, whose are also, or just so happen to, well, coincidentally they live in the greatest nation that ever existed, the People's Republic, and are, or, again, coincidentally happen to be Ethnically Chinese. PHD- China, MD.' –an actual award, proper formatting included, handed to them by the People's Republic of Greatly United

China, China; 's favorite song is this one 'Di-diu di-di di-diu di-di di-diu di-di, di-di, di-diu di-di di-diu di-di di-diu di-di, di-di, di-didi-didi-didi, didi-di, di-di- di di. Niggers.'

'Enough with the exposition, my sons, if you want my inheritance we must fight for it, to our deaths!'

And that was for a good reason as well, all because five years ago, in eighteen forty seven, in eighteen forty six, in seventeen forty one, in five hundred seventy seven BC, in forty H.R.E – the empire, the calendar, Gregory – Georgian – Gregorygian, it's a regional thing. Fighting was, come from the regions where the birth of humanity was given shape. Wrestling that is, but more medieval. But most importantly, it's the calendar. Every day of the week got replaced with an ancient reference to history. A reference to history that was ancient. Ancient history was being referenced, on the calendars, hence the confusion, as to when he was born. But, the only 'normal' functional calendar was actually owned by the President. Who made sure everyone knows their dates, as to ask him and always get the right contradictory knowledge about what happened when, he is a wise. His knowledge is simply expandatory. Think about it, get schooled, imagine. New horizons, of pure, information, coming out of his mouth with every sentence he utters. Grandiose, like a canal, or a camel-toe; there was no woman around, otherwise every single one of Johnny's son 'You know what?' would've signed a temporary truce, as to stop this eternally going abuse, for the time being, as to facilitate cooperation, as to establish between these two fine XX and XY biologically made creatures, a professionally working relationship.

They were out in the open-desert, but there was an abandoned house with a door, one of his sons had come through, punched through, with the pieces of the wooden shrapnel lodged in his neck and what not. He is unimportant, doesn't even have a name.

Only the President knows when Johnny is born.

On the day of his birth this was recorded:

'I've got so much bloodrape blood on my hands, all smeared between my squirming pudgy finger-toes. It dripped between the gaps, it got out of hand and dropped, a plate filled with pussy-juice tomato, ripped apart before I could plant my face below her carpet.'

Wait, there was something that had to be said first. It seems like an unimportant detail now, but, nonetheless. That being:

'If there's something in this world these neck shaped cock bearing rapeniggers fear, it may as well be the stole of flocking cop-knee shaped condoms chasing them, right behind then boys.'

Before the fight could begin; there are eighty five 'Roman Empire' moving land masses, governed by every Roman Emperor, Dictator and ruler, eighty five times, for every Empire, spread, across a non-existing continent on top a body of water. They are dark, coated in iron. And every man is but machine; chained to every emperor, within, the middle of the world. Where, every single land mass, of the eighty fifth bears a torture wheel like device they're all attached to, that grants servitude to the one in control of this sink. These puzzle pieces float, capable of flight, they're like cruisers. Bearing billions of guns and armaments beneath and inside their ship-like lower bowels, that span across the entire Empire. But, no H.R.E.; and no Byzantium, either. For they are livid cartilage beasts that, when put together form a face, with many heaped forests of elongated ivory spikes for faces, like the sutured mouth of a dumb cunt not knowing her place so her husband slugged a bunch of her teeth out, then began stitching it off, after slitting her throat while, and after, it was a concurrent-continuous-at-the-same-time-process, rape-murdering her, mouth; with pus, but land-puss like puffy cotton filled with cadavers. And the two giant eyes of the mold were both fully-bulby open, glowing with dark-power, as they spread across the world with dark vibration. Even the public. Of the Iron, which stands for the I in S.P.I.C.Q.R., refused to, well.

Give an official statement. He must've had something lodged in his throat that day.

They were not of real iron, for they had been filled, up to the brink of their lower-entrails with an unfathomable dark-pus mass, carpet-eely that drew along and moved inside, by valve openings and doors, they fathomed, whatever, drew and close after, they entered. For every child that hid inside, a tall Centurion, during his prime, moving from one side emerging, engloried by a spearmint embroidery that tagged along, and bloated, there came out, a spat-out, pouncing upon itself and backed-upon a porous surface filled with many heads and larger tiles, which covered its body, mass. Clothed in candy wrapped clothes, with a pair of eight-beaked large taps, heads every four or so meter or so. They were ringed with these loud maliciously intending viciously alarmed faces. Their beaked taps only pushed out a myriad of little intestines, out of which came the rounded hounds, whose head, canines and limbs were but the tail, bloated inside and squirming along the way, kept in the back, while in the front, a small dwarfish human, naked but whose arms, attached, were the collars-welded in the main body of the dog, and fast, it were, back on its tail to devour. Despite being nicked on its feet, this bearded glorious, no more than two feet necromancer, whose back cords dragged the canine-muncher which it tried eating itself away through the bag. While attempting to lend death upon its master, that was the glory the Centurion Reprimanded him for. Meanwhile, the elongated legged, sticks that dragged away, its legs, but plenty and to his clothed mass, but lay, as far away in the distance hiding, just as far as he had gotten after. Dragging itself before it could fall apart, right after. While, in dark it hid, somewhere on the streets, behind a barrel near which a few plebeians but smiled. Many of them simply covered for the creature then, without giving themselves up. For such retrieval would mean death for it. Many of them were aware, just as many if not most held them inside, as they lay. This clothed beam of mass, this disgusting looking pyrat, whose jerking in place taps started spitting away. From the innards, immediately the wombs, would come out of the most shoved-in corners yet to prove again, and let convey whatever entered them.

At five, every iron coated person in every single one of the empires had their heads removed, by force, pinched off. It was only a matter of time until they'd be found.

'Little dwarf, carve out your heart or that one of your hound, now. I need it in order to survive this transition into the body of four men, I need to deform myself beyond any possible recognizable thing, until I am taken from him.'

'Who is he?'

'Look above you and it shall be clear enough!'

Moldering and falling on them like vapors of liquidities, drawn from them. Whom had been there, on roofs, but only whose eyes were left behind; the rims and edges cut and hooked, their teeth but lain on each and every side. From one point to another, drawing; like bags never seen after; afore mentioned there drew the tubes. A bunch of floating chopped limbs were pointing them at the three messing behind the barrel figures.

Why were they important?

One may ask himself. IT's because, these land-masses were the President's private iron gardens, his eighty five private iron gardens.

A bunch of giant Chinese people who appeared out of nowhere, bearing giant chopsticks in their hands hadn't even given them a chance to retaliate, as they simply ate them, up, gobbled, alive. China.

Jonathan had inherited a lot of money himself, as the show news 'anchor', this being the national TV, after all, he's yet to be employed and work for.

Then they fought. But not yet.

Imperialism is the term used by the evil supremacist kings, that were livid-statues, held on top of a bunch marbles, put on display. Giving speeches, that came out of pre-recorded intercom devices, with weird faces that were their fathers, which bore helmeted horns, not the statues, but these devices beneath them. Helmeted as in, their horns had impaled the people who dared protest against them. Democracy is long dead. But the strange bloatedly eerie creature bearing the Gattling intercom out its mouth, as its cylindrical mouth isn't it.

'I am a great vile-creature of blood-rape.

You may bring your women forth.'

The statue stood in front of the.

In a few months, early, in December, the people of Nak will finally have arrived, the dead-nigger hordes bearing their mad iron-lodged-inside-their skulls objects, will run everything to the ground, bringing forth complete destruction as well as contemptful annihilation. They not only bred, like monkeys, but inside of them, little niggardous creatures, pseudo many nigger-headed simian-bloated, nigger-pinched by nigger-horns with nigger-limbs filled with nigger-niggers creatures made out of solid pseudo-silicon rested inside of. They were wildly over-grown blockier ram-chips, with extra niggerhead boils lain in a bubble-wrap fashion. With long nigger-split-head pincers; monkey growths. Black hairs and nigger-hoses that looked for welfare-pouched they may brought to an agape.

Conjoined citadels, which by now had grown a third one, called, the Concubine, that being a greatly distorted third growth that wreathed the two joints in place.

A reminder: 'Oh wow, Anthony's wife is so beautiful.

Her nicely bathed darkly dusky-tawny bushy sweaty with opal, impregnated by hefty plumpish cockroaches, hair adorns her well rounded, finely assembled, exemplarily robust roundly-estimable to the head breath that would, estimably resemble that of a member of the Mediterranean race, palpably medium, lean and most tenaciously highly raised high, up there, go-girl, forehead. Her hips are meticulously able-bodied, husky-hardy with sombrous stretches of fine rumbustious tea-drinker slag, but without their sluggishly yellowish prunish chatters. Beauty such as hers, resembled a painting, or a salaciously ruinous interpretation, no in-between. Short-put together deliciously malodorous scent, sweatily endowed in a piquant sleazy touch by the broth of the nose, underside drawing close to a luscious overall of splendidous mounts, added together. Adding to her waveringly adorned low-skirted, with short-touches of stylishly saliferous drained purple stretching from beneath her cheeks, to, all the way down her most fine-ported breast-keepers. Most apologetically looking woman there was, is.' Deceased. Buried in his guests room; honeymoon. Meticulously placed fine gems adorning her nice, well kempt unchanged but yet, barbarous as made by time, in which sanctimonious rot engulfed her plumpingly courteous open chest, that exposed her finely wrought but well-endowed sutured by corneous – suffering of corn-disease and popping popcorn boils of skin-bullets of blood, a scrupulously good to excellently done job, that was estimatebly to a degree of well-put through.

It didn't take long for everything to fall apart again; all too flashy and but with no substance; devoid of soul and heart. Within an hour:

Rapedog Mumcum GunFist Jewkiller-Star Nigger Sprangle-Sprazzle, son of. Bitch, nigger-cum dragger; ass-fuck-nigger-comes, draws near, out of fear, when he comes near, everyone must disappear.

'Rape-shit fuck, clap-clap, fuck shit, fuck.'

Forth, near him stood the Maker, fuck-shit eat grin, shit Pinter, fuck nigger. Point-point, fuck-clasp, fuck nigger, must clap.

A few soldiers came out of nowhere, in a desperate attempt to contain it.

'Nigger-fuck-shit-up fuck-shit fuck-ass, nigger-crap!'

Where is it come from?

'Nigger-magic-red-blue-green-negger-make-do magic-boom-boom.'

A tank came in as well. At the end of the fuck shit nigger-make beat, when come to feet nigger-make seethe, lip.

'I am come fuck nigger, in cum-drag, singer, in shit-fuck nigger, bigger as I come near, the nigger says, liberation.'

Everyone then left, but they came back within the hour.

'Fuck nigger- come back.'

But they actually left for good this time around.

'Hoe rape nigger is killer but gun.'

Hoe is a ship, the President is a Sailor.

Anthony is sitting at a table with Johnny.

A man is a singer, fucking shit butt nigger cum is come drag me out of little stall where fuck nigger comes. Nigger comes fuck, shit, fuck!

‘Oh shit!’

‘There is Venus, still, in Paris, taken from Ancient, Romans.’

As much as the transatlantic slave trade was, perhaps the defining ‘Rape-nigger-fuck retard gay invalid’ leading-event of the beginning of the twentieth century, it would also end up serving as a precursor to the great strain between the European People and the African Diaspora in the course of the next few on-going centuries.

‘Shit-fuck-shit eat shit, fuck.’

‘I want to fuck.’

‘Shit-fuck bowels.’

Niggers are now slaves.

The ship went through African, cutting. Bleeding it dry; a few men got out of the ship, every single one carrying twenty or forty fucking niggers by their side, then they shoved the niggers in.

Also Jews owned the President’s ship, fuck niggers, fucking shit, faggot-strains. Nigg, fuck shit, nigger fuck gay, nigger-shit bowels with nigger-cum.

Then they all exploded, taking with them. Half of Africa.

A war began.

Trains were being brought out of pummels falling from on top the sky.

Should’ve started that race war when you had the chance.

‘The culture of the United States, the, once proud and free American culture has been infested, corrupted and bastardized by the likes of sub-human rats and other nigger-like creatures, that have driven values such as religion, faith, monogamy and righteousness to utter extinction. In exchange of Judaic Marxism-Communism, as well as miscegenation with inferior races, a weakness that eventually lead to the likes of the Insects to come and trample over all men.

The laughing stock of the world, China has taken over. And with their arrival, whatever spirit was left of man, faded, within time, within a cold erasure.

Now the vultures have come, to take a bite, a share, and have a rip at your throats.’

Leaving behind nothing more but a soullessly butchered, filth-filled, degenerate world; where lawlessness runs amok and gets promoted. Then the animals must act accordingly as well.

Anyhow:

‘Anthony, you were about to tell me something, weren’t you?’

‘Of course, dear president, of course, I was just thinking, about something. Something personal, you know?’

It’s really hard being young and trying to make it in this New Society, you know?’

‘I beg to differ, someone with your skills can most definitely make it, with the proper push, that is.’

Mongol is here, standing between Anthony, the President, Johnny, and the corpses; there’s an ever seeping, ‘thing’, between them. It’s rather unexplainable. A looming sadness brought by change.

‘If all were like it should.’

All deformed. All changed, like it ought to. No more trying to make sense of the world, regardless of how chaotic it is. Regardless of what was said and told.

‘I wish I could live in this lucid dream forever, and forget, slowly. I wish I could forget myself, in this eternal dream of wonder. I wish I did not have to think, like a dumb-creature, deformed of mind. Wretched as I am, ignorant.’

Enclaves of monsters, endless, and one day forgotten; a drivel of nonsense, not to be remembered, no lucidity, impurity, like the primordial mind of a primitive nigger; a shut-down of the mind, like the beasts living among us. No beauty, no masterpieces, no thinking. But wallowing like a dumb-animal knowing its place, among humans. It is the sad fate of those accepting animals, living among them. Everyone suffers for a reason, in this world; whether it’s beauty, ignorance, an intellectual pursuit, all will be abandoned, as long as they live, or allowed to roam the streets.

‘It’s a drug at this point, Anthony. You can’t default to fleeing from the world or throw a tantrum whenever there’s something you dislike.’

‘But the worlds I see are real. They’re real to me. They’re real to whoever’s watching. It’s just that I’m cursed. I’m cursed with seeing the world I live in for what it truly is and it makes me sad. It makes me deprave. I have to see the world again, I have to escape.’ He said.

Blotched remains:

Colonel Chief Rhakgh-Raggedy stepped forth. His powersuit began producing the delta-heat maladies inside the air-bubbles, floating around him. What stood before them was a large welding mask with a strange deformed visor, contorted into a dark piece, a dark-floor sweeper, an inverted in the back boot-like wagon in which his bodily contortions drew attention from where the cut-in hole was, where four or give great limbs, including his arms were all contorted in. Inside his weird suit, at the back stood a giant globular box, kept at the back-stretch of this centaur-suit, inside of it, from which sprouted the limbs, which helped with the transition between the two life-inducing tubes that were either wide-spread, with multiple mini-wires, pointing down, connected with every single limbs, vertically set, or the horizontal much thicker one coming out of the box that kept everything together, this one being much longer, as it only pumped life into his, apparent lifeless looking torso. That rested near the front of the great, small weld-protected compact stove. Two lights were flashed out of him. He began moving. With every movement, every step, he revealed. His accordion-like cut, half-way in the strange machine; this ugly legged submarine already began desperately spreading orders:

‘Move on, part of the breaker is stuck half-way in, halted, by the diamond-shapers. They’re all around the place.’

‘ And what do you want us to do about them?’

‘ I need as many of you present near the area as possible.’

‘ Why? ‘

‘ You must’ve realized by now that I’m not giving either of you a choice. They’re going to dig out the Plothrekke out of stone.’

‘ And what if they do? ‘

‘ Part of the base will be swallowed by his toothless growths. Hardly encased, every living humanoid and non-humanoid alike, all brought to a stop, unloving, made to waste in time, rot, in front of moving, hardly embodied creatures. That’s what. ‘

‘ He’s referring to torture, I believe, a living hell, Layra.’

‘ So, are we supposed to trust him now, for what reason?’

‘ It’s better than, you know, being here, standing, sitting and doing nothing, wasting away. We’ve yet to make a discovery on how to prevent the fall.’

‘ And helping him with this is supposed to help us, Micha?’

‘ No, but at the very least, it should take our mind away and ease it for a while. It’s worth a shot, isn’t it?’

‘ I won’t have a part of it.’

‘ Then stay here.’

‘ I will.’

With which they departed.

Rhakgh lead the way. He was, although one could not see much of him, highly elated by this turn of events, leaving her alone to deal with, that. It was just enough for anyone, to realize that there was no way to fix so many problems. Micha knew when not to draw too much attention, especially when it wasn’t needed. This wasn’t any different than what’s been happening behind the closed doors, of the Ehtrum-

Klrk. Yet there were wretched adorers everywhere, waiting, wreathing, like a crowd of evil men, around every corner of the Basilik.

One of them stopped them, right in their tracks.

Cradiel, it's how he presented himself, bearer of Cranial nymphs, he wore them squirming in a dark-yellow bag. And many of them chattered after that, elongated and with transparent skin, with flappers and with many peals.

‘ Think of buying one just for starters?’

‘ What's it to you? Can't you see that we're on a mission, send by the Embassy itself?’

‘ You could've sure fooled me. I think you're both laypers, trying to snick one in.’

‘ We're not bearing explosives on us, you can check us later, you have us scanned. Everyone in this Department has us under their visors.’

‘ Then you should not have anything against this now, should you?’

‘ Wait, now wait just one moment.’

The colonel took a single step back. One of its limbs receded back into his iron-carapace. It stood there for a moment, crawling back out, came the caterpillar pumping its fingers out of the large pad that were his hand. It put out a few coins on the floor. The adorer opened his mask, out came one part prosthetic, one part two-face blinders, both of them welded together with coated heads, put-through and put-in. Staring at the hidden star and the hidden moon, both above and below, in the sky and in the hidden, floorless recess it had created beneath it. This dark circle was of pure shadowy-membrane. It moved like tiny cockroaches, beneath the coins. It ate them, immediately by means of simply absorption.

Afterwards, a nymph was given and the adorer went away.

‘ What was that for?’

‘ You're not supposed to ask questions like that until we're out of it. Otherwise, you may draw out even more adorers that might start dragging us down with their useless junk.’

Wriggling in place within the hour stood, before them:

‘ Couldn't understand why they started moving in the crates.’

‘ What's hidden in them? ‘

‘ Wouldn't you like to know now? No offence, Viktor but it's dangerous business, asking, knowing, trying to find out what they're trying to take away from us, you wouldn't understand now.’

‘ I could, if you explained to me.’

‘ The woman that died fifteen minutes ago had something taken away from her. It's far too deprave to actually speak about it, but I'll try not to be a prude with the details.’

‘ Go ahead then.’

He pointed at one of the vroll-frocks, the one that was attached from the mid-piece sanctuaries, or had been attached to her hearing device. At the very least it signaled something, they had all been broken through, fuselage-cracked, completely shattered after and left-in to look for, something, anything, any left device or machine to fix it. Any servant, anyone; but most sites were or had been abandoned. Most of the sanctuaries had been thoroughly cleansed. But, no. Placed, their general ‘meeting-point’ which lay where it stood was, apparently disjointed, dislocated. Yet it was there, somewhere on the map. One of the dead-points, the abandoned regions, the left-overs and get-throughs, yet not a single one was penetrated, connected or had any entry point, prior to this fall.

Her room seemed caved in at first glance. It had already gotten out of control, not seeing anyone move-in despite having picked their corners.

Eighteen legless munchers, whose backs receded in, whose infested-rods and wrigglers, by now, grown inside the pores within them. Not a single mouth-open. Not a fuselage-miss, broken.

A pair of initial stickies were thrown across the room, being allow momentary respite as to roll, then slowly drop inside the cave-in; where the livid-corpses moved towards her.

In a matter of a few seconds, the glowing tubes began, flashing, extending, spreading between them, as if they had been a disease of the sorts, in a world that lacked or was of a shortage of it. They relented for a second, then drew on. A few chitinous cloaks appeared to draw all the tension off them, before the first blows started fading out. Yet not a single one touched or scarred the urn, as of the center piece in which, it, were encased in, neither or, the slightest hint. Other than a most incessant broil of smokes that spread across it, faltering as if to fall on itself, shedding another puckery robe that started spreading along them.

The room was left in shambles, therefore it advanced.

A few more than a closely selected bare-broad chested, in the room, opened on, through the door, exposed, as if to revealed the man dug-in holes, and the fall-through almost iron-quarter dropped in, the protrusions within them extended. Limbless but concave and tall, many of them bore the horned-mounds, all of whom extended forth and grabbing, gnawing what they could. It was a disastrous scene met only by unmoving things, waiting for more stickies to be thrown. Before them stood the prize, and most only waited, as if wretchedly prideful, in need of eyes to take and claim whatever they could.

A general message appeared to curve through some of them. As if the echo had been a wreathing worm making its way through one of the most rotten of apple cores:

‘ This is the Delegate Kyllyeiehlh, wretcher of the Union Aghaleghl Rgho. You are to be immediately, by force, or the employ of improperly lived-through suffrage, dispersed out of the area, with no.

Need be reminded of the mounted Pleicher fruits inside your chests, which shall inwardly, most erratically inflame your innards as soon as a command is given, not a single man, living thing, or otherwise is to remain present at this point, or otherwise said, prior to it, stay. Near the damaged area and the compromised sector of the Sanctuaries, immediate stay will be punished, with.’

But he shook himself a few feet away from where he was standing, trying to utter a single thing, whatever it was. It had already crawled in his ear, through his throat having made a single inflammation, obscure. Growth-bearing device; at his command, one was brought from across the room by an ugly slave he kept around. It passed hands, in an unsanitary fashion.

He was bleeding after a fashion, being eight headed in a bunch, but all of them were socketless, with deep-depressions pushed inside, various numbers being ailed and left behind, most of them completely put-through some incinerator dye, which made them ever-so slightly unrecognizable from the looks of it. Nonetheless, he gave another order:

‘ You’re to leave within the hour, as such, I shall have you all boil for a while, only to have myself, for starters, much to myself, less disliked.’

A histrionics’ made of gulches piled, it dragged a few more morosely after, then had them taken wherever their kinds would point at, at long as no fuss was being made for and after and for what reason might come after. When dragged, from behind, they pointed, as a stalk of many pulps. A strange infantile pair of dangling aside, but lodged in its mouth rose, there came no longer standers, no adorers, nothing but a single Snatcher of bloody injectors that were immediately planted inside of him, as to not make too much of a fuss, while going thoroughly inside of him, an assistant dragged, his mouth and blinding-after plighted crows, that of which adorned his robe. They were set on trying to gnaw the side of his head before he could even open his mouth where the much-to-his-own-admiratory glance, were not his top of the implants, yet strangely cracked in skull like incisors but an entry from which crawled out and unnecessarily dark, strange pummel-straddled upon a hardened coil that came out, entering the strange machine, that stood before it. Each boil-bubble wrap with orange-organ fluid inside, fluidly set on melting as it dragged along and into him, before, and rightly after, a few moments in, they came apart. Both sides of the elongatedly strange design he was working apart. One was split, its sheet-insidious as it were, inside the first layers of skin was already melted and passed through, having, upon the lack of glamour the street signs and the products that were lain every here and there, then thoroughly placed in high-standers that prevented them from falling apart whenever someone approached kept many of the cackling broths at bay.

Upon, what appeared to be a stretch of eight hundred miles or so, near one of the sewage-ditties, what ought to have been blocked by a lit or by one of the moving signs was, instead, thoroughly exposed. A few more than a hundred youthful looking yet gangrene mouthed knuckle-dragged with long-implants came crawling in. They watched, incessantly, or in such a manner preventing themselves from falling apart, or falling over themselves, as one jaw to the other made a cut-out, but put together, piece by piece, bar. In which all of their jaws appeared to be fused together. Their mouths open but their tongues were as fat as they were far gone. Fatty bulbs at their ends, clicking on top of their metal ledges; trying not to get away from that one moving pointer of light, the Star of Fright at the end of the hall; towards even the Snatcher turned towards. Hohlhen understood why they were there. As long as no one moved, too rashly, being vastly outnumbered served him just as much as would any other man. And if it were not for this:

‘ Stay away, I’m not going to warn you again, I’ve got just enough pins inserted in him with blow that he’ll pop like a small red-dwarf confetti piece.’

It was already getting out of hand. This thing was being doped beyond even the likes of human capability, to at least take it as easily as he claimed it to, would mean. Nah, he saw right through it. Even with all those pins and the fumigating things lodged inside of it, there was simply nothing he could truly do about it. This lodged-in'er, was a thing of its own, laughing at him from one side to another. He should know.

They were busy up there.

He was busy down here.

A few moist-drops on the floor but the rest was clean; it was the hanging hour so of course many of them men didn't even find themselves here, nor would they be any closer to one of the broken wailers on the wall, hanging inside of it like netted fish, would stall. The victims bearing their lives hanging, lower-much lower, at the ends of their teeth.

Regardless of it, the center piece he was working on was open, fully open, only now. Nothing wriggling on top his arm; two sides of the coffin – wasting but only in a way that would stare at him and at him only, none else.

There was a turning rack, which was a turning frame, with bloated, eleven centaur wombs attached to one another as well. Giant bags of meat, around the frame of which stood a great outlandish spiked band, with many thing electrically charged legs, twisted and pushed around, upon which it walked. Out of the rack, in the middle, four great heads, coated and encased rested, very much alive, stuck in an ethereal eternity, as they dwelled in dreams, a refusal to die. Haunted they were, seeing their spectral bodies in the distance, yet incapable of reaching them, they wailed. The head of the President, John, Anthony and Jin, whereas between themselves but stood, a greater belt. Of which, in comparison, Saturn would wince. As it kept revealing, upon that turning smaller bank, glowing green and yellow advertisement messages that drew on. As it approached, whatever remained of the few people around it set themselves in flight, or ran along.

A cluster of pumping abdomens, with hairy-simian humanoid features, horse-like elongations all alive, holding the beam that rotated the band, which turned their heads to every side; as it were, upon its mechanical iron cricket-flea legs, each of them but had to say:

‘Morose, it’s such.’

They moved, for some time now, until, all of the sudden, they observed something, on the ground. It oozed, resonated a bit.

A Yankee’s memory still rippled as he rested on the lap of a broken piece:

‘If only I had started a race war, perhaps I could’ve avoided having to raise someone else’s child. If only I had started ethnically cleansing these fucking filthy nigger baboons. But the Kike-controlled Government prevented my raped-by-niggers-wife from having an abortion.

I wish I took a knife and began stabbing both the niggers that formed the nigger-pack and this ugly mulattoe nigger sub-human monkey nigger creature. I wish I started trailing the sides of my knife’s edge around its genitals, slowly castrating the little monkey, slicing off its barely formed breasts, chirruping, slurping its entrails with the tip of a steel blade, going inside of it, only to slit and splice and do him blind, as I go around, and keep butchering this filthy fucking nigger.’

But the world fell because of that. Because of the on-ward push of the Kike Elites that tried pushing miscegenation and the mixing of the white women with nigger-monkey criminal subhuman, depressed-lobed filthy creatures that ought to have been slaughtered and ethnically cleansed as well as their children, for the filthy creatures they are.

‘If only I had channeled my fury, my rage, into something useful, I could’ve escaped this filth. I could’ve had a pair of blue eyed Aryan Children, I could’ve sailed the stars and founded a much greater universe. Yet this choice has been taken away from me.

The niggers raped my wife. The Government forced me to raise a child that isn’t mine. The Jews then raped my child. As such, in the end, everyone lost. Everyone loses with niggers and kikes, the most bastardly sub-human races that ever existed on this Earthly given place.’

If there ever were a chance to do it, it was then.

‘The niggers have no grasp over concepts such as accountability, or duty. They do not raise their children, they are not fathers. They are niggers, they are monkeys. IT’s what happens all the time, in the plains of Africa.

The niggers cheat on one another, the niggers don’t raise their children either. And for that reason they are incompatible, as to be allowed to live alongside other races. It is obvious that their subhumanity infects their brains and minds, their ‘human’ populations, their ethnic groups are inferior. But most importantly, the kikes expect other peoples to raise these filthy animals as their own. These filthy kike-pedophiles should not be forgiven for their attempt to mix the white race with that of a sub-human inferior one, promoting ‘acceptance’ for a sub-species, that’s been given, time after time again, handouts yet still are incapable of doing anything with it.

‘In the great coming of the end, during the fall, there was a chance to kill as many kikes as possible, to lynch as many niggers and prevent this dark future from coming. To a point where humanity was bastardized beyond belief; to a point where men have been infested with a schizophrenic disease that has taken over their minds.

The nigger-rapists, the nigger-rapists, the nigger-rapists, the nigger-rapists, sub-human monkeys destroyed civilization, lazying around, crushing and smashing whatever they could.’

The only chance to prevent this, curse, is to lynch the niggers and slaughter their children in the most violent ways possible. It is them, destruction rests in them, unless defeated. A tumorous enemy lain within.

‘Sub-human niggers shall never replace anyone, even if there’s an infinitesimal chance to cleanse them, then I shall take it, and I shall make sure not a single nigger makes it into the daylight while I still breathe!’

Women could never be trusted to make their own choices, since they cheat on men all the time because of their promiscuous nature. For that reason alone, they need to be violently beaten and never allowed to leave the house while raising your children, and yours alone. Abuse, control and forcing their hand, it’s the only way a woman could be trusted. She is the equivalent of an infantile child whose mentality and neuroticism make her a traitorous creature, mindless, insipid, a mental invalid with fancy forms. It is quite obvious that by her nature alone, a woman bequests abuse, as the natural restoration of order.

‘Segregation, taking away their rights while also abusing them. It’s the only possible way we can save them, at least for a while. They need to be taken by force and removed from the presence of people of other races. To have their interactions limited, while we go ahead and castrate the niggers and their children.

We ought to feed them their children’s genitals. The niggers have to eat their children’s privates. It is only fair that the niggers get punished for being and acting niggerish. Filthy fucking destructive baboons, they brought it onto themselves!’

It is a very well known fact that the Haiti niggers raped, killed and slaughtered not only their white masters, the farmers and whoever else was there but also the mixed raced people that followed as well. The same Mullatoes they’ve been giving birth to ended up being victims of their animalistic nigger tendencies as well as their predisposal towards violence.

The niggers are a time bomb, ready to kill their own at a heart-beat.

A part of them still kept onto the past, no matter how wretched it was, regardless of how haunting it were, the likens of people let down whoever there was.

It was a most degrading bastardization that followed after, of nothing more that had to come.

They wreathed in part, were wretched in song and chose no path of sobriety.

‘There’s an adorer much farther than that, I think we should approach him.’ His brother attempt, for his own sake alone to warn him against it; since it was mightily dangerous to be there unattended.

Various other lesser species with dark-unnaturally set-heads in pairs of sixteen but whom were all walking on giant incisor fat appendages at unfathomable speeds, trampling everything, including their own, as hundreds or thousands of them came out of their hidings at a time, being followed by even more of them, coming out of their ranks, billions of such enormous creatures appeared, out of nowhere, in the most unnaturally wild assortments one could find himself staring at, seeing or watching, closely observing the widest array of pseudo-inhuman heads as well as various patterns that were not only aligned like poles, of clusters, these cluster-heads being but piled together in the same way mango fruits would be like, bearing their unnaturally set legs in most obscure-formations that would not even, for likes of them possibly explain, by looks or observation alone, how they could get and grab and maintain a hold over so many legs at once, which only distracted from the fact that there were so many of them breeding in a botflies larvae manner, hundreds of other progenitors that would take over for the on-coming fifteen hundred thousand generations, and while their unnatural forms could not be clearly defined as these bloody-covered creatures whose general appearance was of either that of a disgusting mush or that of a most irresolutely deformed, barely set, hardened spoil of many coils-like things put together, insectoid in nature, without a mention of their many anatomical features, such as compound but set like welded adjustable microphone stand-thick leg like appendages that were only their many extending eyes, all of which were wrapped together, on top of them, regardless of the formation they were in, finally making, most unnatural of forms, sight-antennas, which stared in every possible direction they could at once, but they mainly kept to themselves and only ruined whatever was in their reach.

There was no dance out there, done of shame, no cruelty done out there in the open, nothing well enough performed as well. None to remember or to forget, to undergo such agonies as to remember a life that's been, or left behind them; it's why they tried searching for this place.

'It used to be a hiding spot, a place of rotten angels that would find a way to be with those akin to them without being judged. Because of what they were; because of those like them they were disgusted of, a slough not to bother anyone, to ruin or contort; a pure place despite what they were and what they looked like, where they could be forgotten, like everyone else.'

But he had been late, and it felt, as if the rumors he had heard were, nothing near what he once thought of it.

A stride aside and it'd all become a matricide. She was met by one of the servants at her court, most of them being rather incapable of distinguishing naught else from what was there.

'Naught else but a kingdom of savages, just like the thrice-killed had foreseen, why should I have expected anything else?'

'Your majesty, there was never any doubt that it could be any other way. But if it may be agreed upon, will you allow us to entertain you for the hour?'

'A bold interference, but that may be allowed. I shall listen for a time.'

'Bring in the jesters.'

An utmost speckle of ruses, and empty truce, which might've come right through, if it weren't for the true, only den inside the room, the one that crawled from here and there.

Since it were to be said at least, from the various corners that came dragged, many sets, of less so aligned yet mangled, the unnecessarily blended strangers, all joined the room. Some were much, to their concern, not expecting to be mourned if killed. Most of the adorers had already taken, to their concern a plea. Angelic agony they called the drink, and every single member of the court, at least the ones that didn't stand aside. Joined, in a toast:

'To our queen, the majesty, of which grandeur, to herself arose by standing pillar, I seethe upon such passing hours such as men of this crowd who would not stop themselves or may be brought to answer for their crime.'

An announcement was to proceed, and all of the sudden every single one of them took upon their feet, this chance to rise.

'Your majesty has decided it's time for her to be heard.'

And less to her concern was there a bargain.

'Straddle one of the leads forth, we shall listen to one of the broken in the head pillars.'

‘But what is this and why has it shown itself forth inside my court?’

Not just yet, as there was a much to its life, a disturbing silence.

‘Is he part of this court now?’

‘No, your majesty, I do not believe it is.’

‘Well, then he should not be here in that case. Escort that thing out of the pillar and out of my court immediately. I will have it none the wiser to have it here with my trusted advisors, so much so therefore exposed in its presence.’

‘Very well your majesty, you majesty, the guards, perhaps?’

‘I think we are to call on a most trusted court-magi instead, wouldn’t you think so?’

‘Your majesty?’

‘Most truthful, I think it so.’

The Queen rose, stepping forth ever so ruthlessly as to remove piece by piece, tile by tile, with the soles of her feet, with only the tips until nothing of value had been heaved, only shattered in a crippling way. Spoils of the day followed soon after, or sooner, as the commanded upon them:

‘Start beating on them!’

And as soon as it was given, the pounding had begun.

A slit to the right and stumbling on, he came about, a guard and a knight, stepped in, to fight. Upon the drawing of the lance, out the shadows leaped a smaller mongrel-headed Sneer, whose face was made to disappear; knife came out, two more followed, slit, slit, slit, and plunge in the back, he came about and left to right his blade was gone. Grabbed by the fingers, gauntlet fried, poking-iron fingers melted skin-about; now they came to stare. A few inches between each other’s faces; it began, they started snarling at one another like two pitted dogs against each other, trying to beckon a bark, and come about.

Pushed in the back, an arrow crackled, he turned, the knight. His lance was split in half. One in his hand, the other horizontally staring at him, thrice cut. Some dark duck drawing out, embodied by four snakes out of which, a black substance like stars and tar, with many knight-helmets forming.

His other hand was put to use.

His Queen had ordered, and two eyes were then plunged in by his two fingers. Stripped of blood and of sockets falling; they came apart and no more stalling, after. He spat on the helm. With a red coil that dripped as well.

In the back of the room, one of the assassins fell, yelled eve:

‘Mercy lord, mercy for one who has something you should hear, what, what I have to tell.’

‘What is your order, your majesty?’

‘Let his life perish as I will it so. I don’t believe I will have him live through it, and I have not a desire to know of what he has to tell me so. Go ahead, you’ve got my command, you shall do as I say and leave him about, an inch of his dire live, for a matter of seconds. Then brutally slaughter him.’

‘You heard her, the queen’s order, slaughter the pig as she desires.’

Out of the bandit’s chest, the helmet-cartilage grew dire. Though it was a skull-thing with sockets seemingly already emerged, there was one clearer thing that could’ve been torn from him. It was the moisture that was left in. As if some of the tendons were taken and drilled in, there was no lesser thing that might be coming. No drawing forth, nothing calling him, whereas what happened, whom to see him suffer? They could not, it all happened in the dark. From the sockets some tiny blades shot out, they were dark, but rose and began pulling into them, some of the souls of the men nearest to him, but not the men of the court, instead. The ones that were invisible and beyond it, through some way not even the darkest of most lost, the darkest of a cost, and the ones that hid in the dark could avoid getting pulled into. Like some ill-defined lamp that was brought to the verge of being taken away.

‘What are you staring at now?’

‘A single defiled carcass that’s become, a plow and a drake, a serpent drawn into the helmet, whose long coily limb but four, and for the head, has become a rattling certain skin that rattles.’

‘You may end him now while he’s still ahead, you may will him to be gone whenever you please yourself next to it, whenever I call upon each one that fell!’

But the Queen was not in her right mind, first of all, she was not human and the hall she remained in, her majesty’s court was lain a few levels beneath the livable quarters. Her head was a giant crate shaped skull with a throaty lumped beam with many veins that had eight great lances coming out of it. The beam which stood in place of the many coils attached to the lower area of her head being as rounded as a scythe and even more disturbing to look at than everything that she could even draw upon. A weird-cranium create helmet with elongated blades sticking out. Not to mention that even without the presence of the others, she could not facilitate the wreathing side of those who stood beside her in a need to take something that wasn’t hers, but mine, the one that spake:

‘Your majesty, if it will be allowed to interrupt this sudden urge to butcher your pray. May I add something to your list of utmost salaciously built desires?’

‘What ought I to be doing here, I’ve taken care of, but who are you?’

‘Have I not introduced myself by now, yet?’

‘You have not and as a matter of fact, you’ve intruded upon my home and have yet to say a thing most satisfactorily, instead, you’re pacing around blindly, and you’ve yet to show a thing for that.

Should I yet consider you, as nothing else but a wild intruder? Come upon the premises of my court as to claim my life before anything could prove true?’

‘I would be pleased, your majesty, if you reckoned not to vilify me just yet. As a matter of fact, I’ve come bearing gifts.’

‘Then go ahead and display them. At. A distance.’ Her majesty emphasized the former.

Inside her head, a manufacturing belt of neuron-shaped missiles, but made out of brain matter. And pink-red orange:

‘There are crowded areas beneath them.

You’ve got my express permission to go ahead and slaughter as many of them as you possibly can, do you understand?

I grant you permission for a reason and one alone.’

‘Low-lives, there are many of them down there, beneath your court, your majesty, they’re many, and many of them are beneath themselves and their own, although that would make them even more, well and beyond laudable, as for their own merits.’

As many as a few hundred of them lay there, in place, trying to dance around the issue; it’s been too long a while since it happened, and it would take a few more hours to fix the issue. A chief-maker came out of nowhere, almost to a fault to his own character, he displayed signs of an irascibility beyond the likens of a similar but prone-to-falling mentally apart, sane man. He was a disgrace walking on dark pegs he had stolen from a broken, little seed-shaped ship that drew from across a few barely lain on top of one another, cuts, carefully placed across two derangedly wrought put together ceilings, resting just above his brow. Open accesses revealed falling apart-foam things, like shrapnel-scum drawing within the groundless hour. Mouths coming apart as if a shower of metal and of other alloys had only come to life just then; a figure was cleanly yet forcefully shot down. Bouncing slowly, as if a few paces had been taken, across one side to the other, in relation the Chief-repairer, who, by then, had already crawled inside one of the slightly raised bum-inside-a-dirt-garbage-bag hovels, in which he suddenly sunk his head as to avoid being clean cut by the variously out-wrought shaped blades the creature that had been given live from inside the wall came out of. It was a, much to itself broken in the head diseased, tall thing. Its outwardly heaved blades still attached, as brokenly as one could only find a scene, shattered after, cracked a vase, and glass remains, after rocks were heaved from there, afar. Children could be seen playing ball. But they were of no interest since they were dead, the catalyst of their destruction was a meteorite that fell apart, terminating all life but his, he appeared to be staring at him, slowly having extended a hand by the time the two of them met, ever so much closer than one would’ve expected the two of them to establish contact. And there was evil in its eyes, even though it was a primordial alloy of some, most wretchedly benign a kind. Though not in its sockets as they were not entirely presented, or preserved. His, or rather, its, as for it, and for the general likens ought to be reflected as, only appeared to be, wretchedly wrought, to look like a pseudo mongoloid-accessed, once modern man who had been coated in a thing of infinity. As a cast, or statue walking, but melted, cracking, shattering, but made to be repaired at the end of the day, just like in old Greek myths, that had been almost long forgotten, there it stood and winced at the sight. It asked, quickly enough.

‘Have you come to a conclusion at the very least? Are you to finally take a final cut that will bring an end to the growth in the lower-side of the acre-stone metal centripugator? There are men up there.

Many of them, I’ve counted at the very least, what I could only think of, hundreds, they’re in the hundreds, or in the thousands, all of them morbidly sick.

And they will be punctured soon enough as to be put out of their misery, is that? Is that truly what you want their conclusion to be?’

‘I’ve never seen a lonelier man than you, and I can still see it in your eyes even now. They’ve done something to you, haven’t they?’

The masters, your despot employers, they’ve sent you here to stop me, to prevent me from extending those people’s suffering, have they not? But you know better than that, don’t you? Because at the end of the day, they will be brought back in one way or another, don’t you pity me with those eyes; I am very much aware that if I die as well, they will take me to that dark place, to chain and shackle, where I’ll be made to jerky eerily away in my own waste as my carcass then becomes naught to be remembered or, to play with.’

‘It’s neither my concern, nor my desire to stop either them or you from doing something that could only bring their objective harm into view. I’m not under anyone’s employ, but merely on my own time. As for a desire to please myself in order to fill my guts and blood with sordidly wrought satisfaction, I’ve already peered into your mind anyhow, and it’s of little concern to me whether or not you’ll allow either of them to die off. I could not care less, if that’s what you’re after, you may as well get done with it.’

‘Even at their expense, well, then, what of your initial attempt at my life?’

‘I thought you would not simply brush it over, and perhaps I am to be blamed, partially for what’s been done, or close to it, you still have a head on top your shoulders, I should say, of that division and that derision, you’re still standing.’

‘Not thanks to you.’

‘Then fix it, and let us see whether not I will have made my choice about you.’

‘You are to kill me then, would that be correct?’

‘For a simple repairman, you’re not as dull as I would’ve thought you to be. Work, now.’

He turned towards the bum, though there were some devices in this little shroud of cogs and little frogs of metal bogs that entered the slightly hinged panel that drew from below. Although there were a few most unnaturally, hard-to-look-at, parts of this trashy bag that threw themselves, and threw him off, he was still to reach a high conclusion. As to this alone, a slight intrusion:

A scepter rose from below the pit, it was a great far after all, more than a few hundred feet as well. ‘He’s an hourly person, but he doesn’t smoke outside. Unmistakably, that’s his only, irredeemable character flaw.’ The scepter spoke. It acted like some decayed or rusted microphone, similar to the likes of an already used, barely put together, little dark machine of dreams, but in some way, it trashed around each eagle like whim as the Low-lives Scum approached.

One wore the star of Lost orbits around his hairy-one-hairy-browed line, a leash with thorns that twisted around and lost a little hair every now and then, torn apart by the incessantly pushing in overtly pressurized turbine-pin that came out of his neck. His back being like a pea-pod shape, with three lower elongated light-bulbs that glowed insanely so, a butterfly pinned like a taxidermist’s crow, by a single vintage calligraphy pencil, a mushroom with globes of yellowish orange fluid, a giant thick-like boil and a few other growths that were on his back. The arrangement of his chitinous lumped head being impossible to note off since he bore three consecutive ones that stacked on top of one another, like a horizontally flipped armadillo with only three segments instead. Ear-pointers in the back, connected with wormy things that looked like sea-cucumber urchin cuts. And a mouth-speaker long scorpion, fat-bloated wasp-like machine drawing out, with a cylindrical end that had spherical depression in it, but, weren't fully pushed in. Whereas two antelope leg-long appendages stood for its arms, but ending in pincer-like spread growths, that were connected to drink-like shakers, not cylindrical but compressed as to be akin to two fat trash bags stacked on one another, fingerless as well. Whereas the lower 'pincer' open dome was but closer in appearance to a tube-growth hose that pumped inside the trash-bag. He would've made a fine insectoid fighter, judging by his suit, if only not for its peculiar, most defiled thing that was his giant meaty 'hand' 'hooves' that could not grab a thing.

'Cespen, wake up, the rod incubated your crazed nature in one of its growing lymphs.'

It was limping about in front of them, incapable of suturing a cloud as well. Five minutes at the very least. A few of the greeneries were made of beasts that trashed into place, many if not either one of them could've made it in part, they could've trashed not only the place, but the small hardened area on top of which eight grand remains of the lords-to-be had gathered, placing themselves on top of a little more than an ordinarily set-palace.

'The servants who live in their flattened homes reckon they shall hone a day when it will rain with cones.'

It a presentiment they shared between each other.

All living things feared the fall of the cones, ever since the bleakness poured into each and every single one of them, stuffing turkeys with defragmented solidified remains that came along, all too wretched there. One of the Low Lives pointed, back onto Cespen, right ahead, in terms of flight. A fist flew overhead, slowly trailing down, upon a near-sided landing only to be followed by another, quickly-wrought over, and then slid over to the side, an overcut and a swipe, a jab and a slap, that pulled the man back to reality.

There was a voice coming from somewhere below:

'Kikesses are fat, ugly, subhuman, neurotic, age like shit-trash, are mental invalids and their only advantage is that they're slightly 'cunning', although that also makes them mentally non-humanoid, lazy as well. Dumb-fucking, nefariously disgusting ugly-nosed kike-bimbos, high-maintenance, mongrels, who need a good mother of rape-fuck followed by a good ethnic cleansing cleaver-shot, as to pull their labia through a funnel once you're done raping her. Sub-human dumb-slut kike broad with the same mental fortitude, equal to that of a fucking nigger; it's what Jewesses are; it's clear enough that the only other sub-human kind of ethnic creature out there is a nigger woman, a negress, a sub-human monkey, although it's a saddening truth to hear their mental inferior minds could never accept the plain truth, it simply hurts them. The only thing that actually got Holocausted is Jewish pussy by other races. Same goes for the Colonialism that didn't happen either. Filthy fucking dumb-bimbo rat and monkey women! They should kill themselves, violently. No wonder kikes are pedophiles, it's most likely because of their sub-human rat women companions, since they're not getting anything out of their relationships, they're driven to molest kids, the kikes are.

These rats ought to have been Holocausted a long time ago, fully and utterly ethnically cleansed. Their in-human blood is poisoned and the only cure is total extermination.'

It simply passed like blearing, cheerful wind.

Peculiar Things

A pair of darkened mouths, all put together in the most unnatural manner, bloated as it would come to view. From the front seen as if it had been put through a hardened coil, shot through it, in the distance to a point; a heartless thing attached to the bottom of the frame, where all incisors had been put, where all the tendons had been swollen and diseased. Put through trench and mutter-cowl. Large horn-like floating belts around it, large planetary thing, almost to a fault, too deranged to be looked at, more than a field of antennae strapped to what would seem to be a back with eighteen receding masses, large depressions thrown around, whereas they would thread and wherever they would go.

Larger things attached to a worming mass of many fruit-bloated mouths, barely put together in the most unnatural manner, a bird like epidemic following soon after, gotten through, eaten, partially-deranged, many leper's heads attached to hardened tubes, grown on top of one another like lumped together rotten fruits, skin-like protrusions following after. A system of wheels lay darkly attached beneath it, with a feverish dread following through, another follow-up with many bottom-lead intestines coming after; leading to the entrance of a gauntly-disabled organic machine with many openings drawing out of itself, getting partially eaten.

Twenty put together welded at the top of their heads unnatural dark-fidgety men, always eating out themselves, twenty more following through as they're given birth out of their disabled wombs as well as broken lamp-pints. Gritty teeth but coming after, many of them bur shaped like little flare-shooting motions thrown after, larger bodies, many buffoons wrapped around each other's collars.

Beasts, many beasts but singing as they're put together; saddened by their filth and grit, what came after such defeat:

'We are evil, we are evil, we are vile, stuck inside this place, defiled, where if naught and where to look? Where should one need be shook?'

They were incapable of bringing themselves back from where they stood. Unfathomably fat things, which spoke out of turn around the room. Since they were placed like little head-missiles that were but slightly ever-much submerged, in the place they stood right after, for what was worth, neither of them would move or get out of place, especially when not asked so, when never would they be asked. A plate of men, with large incendiary suits had gathered around them, around each corner, pushing forth. Wretchedly-chaotic thrusts against the nearest walls, there they would do the most damage as to break down and fill the jiggling forms that fell from beyond the broken-in cysts, wherever the reason for them being there, there wasn't any reason to stand.

Israel is an apartheid state that should be dissolved. Every fucking kike in it, killed. Their children raped, molested, castrated, immediately. I will personally kill as many of them as possible, going across their genitals with a scalpel as I slowly progress across their belly in a cross section-like type of progressing swirl, chopping their belly buttons, going through their innards, harvesting their organs, only to take a momentary break from it, then further more go upward, all the way to their throats, where I shall bury my hand into as I begin playing with their voice boxes. Burn down their places of worship, stab their children's eyes, hell, I might even assassinate and torture their Prime Minister just for fun. Lynch, execute, hunt down, strip of skin, kill, murder, slaughter, and butcher, behead, and electrocute their elderly. Amputate their limbs; gas them, with no wooden doors and with a real kind of poisonous gas, cannibalize them, putting them down like the animals they are. With the rest of the Jews across the world to follow right after, lynching niggers afterwards.

Gaza will become a massive kike-grave I'm going to plant every single body in, not only that but squarely shaped as I will personally make sure every little fucking dumb kike will be cut so thoroughly that they will look like recycled meat-filled trunks that will be carefully placed in a massive carefully selected zone, just like the false mass-graves of 'Holocaust' victims, which didn't happen, at all, but the debt ought to be paid in blood and there are far too many of them that have to be taken down, too many bloody parasitic kikes eating themselves and destroying other nations, that are yet to meet their reckoning. And it will come, every single one of them dead – kaput, killed slowly and made to rot in the ground, two feet under with little pucker pus growths on top of them, eaten like the diseased rats they are, as if put in ovens, burnt alive, roasted as to look like nigger women, then finally released with the rest of the fertilizer. I will also kill Sanders. I'm going to curb stomp his dumb looking Semite face after I'm done beating the living shit out of that old sacked pile of bones with a tire iron or some bricks, opening his little skull before finishing off just so I could take a peek as his Schizophrenic shrunk left behind the evolution tiny brain, I'm going to completely shatter his femur and then I'm going to put him in his long awaited grave. He's a dead man, I am going to strangle him until his eyes pop off, I'm going to shatter a glass of water and slit his saggy looking throat open, then piss in it with blood. Niggers.

Little headings, all written in marks, cut through and defiled, at last, arduously bleak, the head of a gun chamber, extending from a partially canine boy, a thing which many necks and open betterments of vile-through, whatever the reason for them being there, gotten through. Large wings cut and spread away, into pieces and out of the place they lay in. Large palaces of hardened pools; dark conceit and emptiness on the right, it was what was needed after all, the calmness of nothing inside of him. The dark canine-child bore a hole inside his guts, walked wretchedly after a line.

Many more joined with the crowd being largely mortified after within reason for what happened there, as much as it appeared, in any and beyond their own.

'Little child, you've died, have you not?'

But it couldn't answer, as where it stood, its mouth was fused with the ground, severely so, and in the most unnatural manner, it, was there.

'A moment ago, it was there.'

Inhalable plaster that hardens upon cancer-ball forming a great gable that's but split at the legs and at its horns. Laughing angelic figures, night brought to a stop, in their place, deadly put together batons and baboon monkeys without legs.

The ball was but given birth to by one of the many pass-through gobbled incisors, with them having pierced through the already messed through bellies of transparent blighters. A dashing light of absent light seemed to delve around the place where they stood. As soon as they started munching through the thick jerkiness that stood between them and what seemed to be, apparently an endless fall from the peaks around the towers, they began charging again, having given birth only as a sad attempt at preservation, being rather damned to begin with as they would only started chewing themselves off and again, walking on a gait when they weren't setting each other off in flights, always searching an entry through the first and through the last empty solaces they would set themselves in before they would start again. It was the only reminder that those who bled died as thoroughly as they could. Little more than calciferous remains attached to their talons, as one should remarks the hooks attached to their heads, the perilous hardenings that came again and again, then stopped in place, they would but dance in air, never taking as slight of a break before they would devour each other again. Nothing to lay upon and nothing but a broken nest, spread around chests of open-pouring out defiled and salaciously spread-apart eggs shells from their empty little worm containers, always but a pure thing left in their wake. Gnawing on the yellowish porous loins, they but set themselves as bastardly as they would, before rubbing it in, and then the joy of losing one another came back.

Largely defiled pompous child-like creature with infantile, wrapped-around the back of the neck tendons drawing near onto his pseudo-winged antennae that draw them out, like little forks extending out of the main-body frame as they form lightning-rods, with the exception being, the tendon-hoses but pouting and pushing out of them most peculiar sting-like shape-upon the initial money-shot like motion of filth-girt an unnaturally formed pool that would not stop drawing and fumigating as it's become but hardened for the little time It's allowed to stand in place. Large growths around the head of a giant-gait walking legged shapes that appear to come out of the open-mouths that are put below the main trunk. Armless but never as deadlier than one could produce such an unnatural thing, two more joints forming a triangularly-deformed tiny mesh of many limbs-coming, out of the chest, in the chapped-in form of a single disc that's pushed out. Little more than the horn of the west, weeping out of it, as the images but curve and long-protrude out of themselves, always and without a cause. Cuss-like motions coming from a floating mouth; but stopped before a pucker that's but filled in with as much as it could be allowed within the hour, twenty flying little lobe-shapes with strange formations that could not be explained, twenty little more around them, all within reason, all within the realm of death-masks but humanoids could not be used to get ahead. They were little more, and little pegs and little wonderingly wretched. Its peculiarly strung-forth motion-lynched. It's how they were set in flight, as if there was a constantly moving motionless trunk of a tree; always paining itself to near the other things. As much as a few more than a hundred dead-pints were trenched in and made to be broken within the hour; always bastardly trying themselves to push out of the weird-mechanical motions they were set in. Thumper-like motions actioning the joints themselves, as to wreathe the disc in and out until it could no longer be controlled, always drenching itself with what seemed to be the hour of the Lord.

Whom, to speak about the mad creation which it alone was unnaturally so, that crested thing that was uncanny, that wretch of wretches that could only sink themselves as to push forward and inward, there was no stop to the malignancy and the vileness of it, and most importantly it lived in an apartment, contorted from anything vulgarly abstract as to look like an unnatural thing instead, a punched-in wreathing object with nothing more in mind and nothing more but the plodding of the charts, all of which were there in plain of sight.

Large, unnaturally set things, concavely so, as if they were only drenched for only a few hours at a time. Largely clotted forms, embroidered along a long-stretch of many nasty things put around a construction ledge as the inner form could be seen, every side of it but being shaped as to be the entry from one side to another.

‘I’ve seen him come onto me. A little more than a moronic speck of blood that was perched upon the specs of my little hormone-breather, though I could not have foreseen it so.

Blocks of blotched meat alongside their etched curves, moving along; nothing was worse than that. What it looked like, a wretched defiled weapon that could no longer move from its place.

‘A botched job indeed, it had been with twenty perilous wretched elongations getting through, as many as eighty-five connected rod coming out of an unnaturally deformed little vein of racks.’

Enough of the barely ledged forms.

Wretched fists but moved on their own, like little rockets thrust against blimp-pounded chests that came out their shells and holes. Crested chest upon which met the blow cracked no longer, instead shattered as if not even a finger lay whole, lain and spread across the rancor, the trauma that followed after was but ten times fold, as width and breadth of hammer blow. Depressing in as to be the cause of bleeding; what followed after was but a strong mirage. Stones being shattered upon a falchion’s bolster as it but hardly grazed each side of his petulant metal robe, as it became from hole to hole and never met as for any blow that followed after as one could know of little while as to have been defiled even before their duel started. It was a miss. Neither of them knew of petty way nor of fist. Of endless distraught they knew each other as they would be allowed, each fist meeting another.

Wretched, wretched, wretched blow, it could not be stopped. No break would be taken, no one could dismiss that by any means, never to forget any mean of laceration that would split their sides, not to be met by such kindness as to be too plain. Pick and slit and not to lose a bid too soon, Primordious-Son but took aback by his own action had but slit a wrist and turned it into a nastily put together fist that followed through. It could not be gotten, nor wasted by any means, not to be lost by any mean, alas, they stumbled onto plain.

Acts of incineration, with little more than a relentless alteration to the source of strength, utmost bizarre; strength uncanny, torn upon the hour, followed. Dreadful by any means of the words as they were but set on attempting to create such hurt upon their bodies as to serve the reminiscence of much more distrustfully caught wretch.

Wretched hidden abode made of many interlocked sides that cannot stand in place regardless of the control they’re set in, always dreading a second more, lost as if they’re actually malformed and set to last, dreadfully standing aghast. Large-push through cylindrical formations, contorting into eight heads that push out into two adjacent room’s corners, from the upper side of the wall, there being a hole, cutting through both rooms; being shaped in this manner. Ivory-color PVC pipes that immediately curve left and right, that is to say only the first two that are to meet the corners, a few meters away from the initial wall where they started, then pushing down as to be only a few meters off the ground, seen from above, they would look like two lines leading to both sides of the nearest walls until they curve against, stopping at the dead end-in front of the wall they're set in front of. If one were to ignore the long two pipe illusion that would be made if it were seen from the top of the ceiling, as if one man would stand on top of them, from where he stands, as if he entered through the hole where they came out of, he would see an 'L' that's been rotated ninety degrees clockwise on the left, as well as an 'L' that's been rotated ninety degrees clockwise on the left then flipped horizontally or mirrored. The other two resembling two submarine visors put next to one another. Yet there's a huge difference between the two of them as the submarinevisors would directly touch the ground as opposed to the first two who are placed like wagons beings almost forced to a stop by end of the road, in a train station. Seeing the first two would be much easier if two circles were to be drawn on top of the top pipes as to see where the large drop or the downward pushing protrusion leads to. Storage containers inside the wall-for those attached to the wall in the same direction all four of them come out of while the other two are but inside the ground. The room being heated by a strange device that's but releasing steam through a pair of grated holes beneath the floor, for some reason it all needs to be heated or kept at a temperature, or even through it, it needs something beyond the normal room temperature it's being heated to. Circles-drawn, possible grated as well, or at the very least used for the disposal of the liquid or the unnatural materials, unwanted chemicals, or solid things that entered what's being pumped in and out. Another set of circles, this time overlapped on top of one another, outside the room, still seen from the same perspective of a man whose entry came from the same direction. Leading down, from where the 'materials, objects or the mass is being taken from'. Behind them, above- the region around the hole where the four pipes meet and go forth, two ellipses, two-holes in the upper pipes, where they're connected to another set of longer pipes from where two long pumps push the liquids forward, then draw back. Irrelevant thing if some of the liquid gets drawn back on their way, since there's another disposal unit behind and below them, perhaps more than a few grated holes through which they could fall in. Could get clogged, but the ones in the front are meant for something. Unequal distribution of mass gotten through both sides if pushed all the way through. Pumps incapable of being pushed all the way there. Two small belts perhaps, inside the two upper pipes, in front of the grate-holes that interconnect the upper and the lower pipes, the key being that they're only connected inside the room, not outside and only the upper pies bear the bands or the conveyer belts while also being the only ones that have the ellipse holes through which the pumps enter through. In which case there's no longer any possible use for it if liquid is involved. Perhaps sedimentary stone or similar objects, larger chunks being put on the bands, while the smaller fragments being pushed through the grates and inside the wall containers. In which case, there's only one problem, stoppers for the area where the ellipses meet the upper holes, as to block the further advancement of the holes. In which case, large air-pumps in the lower-pipes, if the rocks or the refined materials are being lead through the upper pipes, in that case, the lower ones would be empty. Wouldn't work, if it were to be employed, by any means; a failed experiment if anything. Large disgusting creature of meat-like volatile liquefied thing but pushed and put through, until it will have gone all the way in every possible corner of it, feeding itself with the cut-through parts of its body as it's but being constantly cut and made to waste.

A dreadful abomination, a large impish thing with four legs, a primitive four centaur body, all humanoid matter meeting in the middle, contorting into a giant stalk of meat, at the top of which a giant spear-like shaft of chitin protruding out. Almost polygonal, four sides, where four eye-shaped flipped vertical eye-shaped holes draw out large-lower bodied-contorted umbilical-like shaped, figures of the past that recede, then step out of the holes taking a new appearance every single time; that is to say they don't change clothes but rather look like strange figures like Marc Anthony, or Pompeii, or Augustine, so on and so forth, always contorting until no longer capable of doing it. Impish reason being the burnt-like skin that's been placed around and made to be the last thing that could be seen after. Large almost obscure-like patches being grown all around their bodies, as they but dig deeper into the ground with their mole-like feet-pincers that contradict their nature, since the creature is neither a plant form, nor does it have a reason to do it in the first place.

Capricious chamber but inside of a barely cut-through goat-horn that's been forced to heave through the insides of a single gate. Attached to it, yet standing a planetary like globe marching into place. A deranged like acre like platform made to float around them put around a band with little to nothing to its head, more than twenty or forty at the very least, unnatural belts with diseased formations coming through them; coming out of every place, a face-like masquerade dancing and prancing through, guttural noises being made, as soon. As it could be gotten there, a mold of many faces made as to fly everywhere until their peculiar cat-inside-a-cloak manner is but brought to some disease. Plain-like matter coming appearing, going at the same time in the cut-like access cut by a giant forceps device through which they entered.

Unnatural device like the base of a whip going down like a bent-down water like hose pushing in.

Deformed sack that's been put together as to bear stitches from a side to another, looking as if it were only a single big bag-sack that's been ripped off entirely then attached to a patch of other linen like material that's been shot around, and put through a pit of leaving out and leaning in dirt; giant from the sight of it, bearing at the very least a few dead-pigeon bloated holders put through it, bashing out as if it were a child kicking in its mother's womb. A large helmet wrought of peculiar paper-like machetes wrapped round one another as if formed in an origami pattern floating above the sack. An opening tat, around the mark, forming a curved at the top t of great hollows-moving spots that seem to be empty inside yet appear to be full every now and then as shapes spread and come around, every now and then, pushing into every possible direction, yet still in the confines of its helmet's insides. From both sides of the helmet rose, like two unnatural sprays of hose', like springs that give birth to a body that's lost, then for a single moment, it blew around, then lo', it formed but two ivory spreads, a frozen river that's but fallen through around, then put back, within its place. At the ends of body giant horns, which go even deeper than the never-touched floor left by the sack stand two giant punching-gloves like shapes with two almost lion-like statuesque figures made out of various anthills rotations and other dark-skin cuts that were put together after they were lead to the point where they opened their mouths. Both of them bearing barf-like made protrusions, like fading spears with bead-like eyes frozen in place. The helmet but rotating above the put together sacks as if it were its protector, leading it to a castle that was peculiarly shaped; a vertically inverted boot, flipped and made to stray and as if lodged in it as from the area where the toes are placed, to the area where the arcs are set, a giant half-moon-like shape, molded with the rest of it, bearing itself even higher than it might, around its ugly rearing head. A single giant eye looking in the opposite direction, sculpted in. Giant elongated tube-like pipes drawing out of its mouth as if they were in actually but an outspread outstretch of a bile-forest reeling out of the body then again in. Where the shoelaces might've been no lay but anchored to the ground almost arachnid like legs that stretch and fall, and loom about and almost never fail to spread away. Fall over-through perches and beech sheet of mosquito wings saddled through and fallen as soon as they would be allowed. Before long during their unnatural journey, the Sack and Helmet came about and were greeted by no more than one peculiar beast. Of which twitching fragmented face was but a helmet of many dead-like put through hems, a giant sphere chest but holding the ends of a root that's but put through its heads many ugly rearing standing roots and vines and things alike, many little hedges that pushed. Spindly butterflies would crook and move from in-between. Large Legs, like half scissors from the point where they start, curving around and kneeling down as to form large beds shapes footholds, all within reason they would drag, the many heads but rearing within the hour and just about every place, in and about, seemingly during such a disquiet, as to be torn. A convoluted organic device inside of its gut, that it bore, reared back out like a metal detector, trying itself within the hour, as to prevent the many reeling in and receding infections that would follow otherwise. Some of them being carried above it like floating frozen puddle-drops with a weird organic larvae-sting shaped to the side of it- such were the speech containers that spoke for it and would move from every possible direction as to bring the dark knew from where they were left. Ahead of them, once the mouths stopped talking. Headbag but seemed to creep and tilt itself around and in. For the time that even came before it, they would know, and would show signs of domestication, laceration on self, the many jaws and teeth but rummaging around themselves as they but pushed in and out, releasing coils of blood that tainted around the place as a reminder that it was time, again to draw in the skin-tumor flayer-like contrivances of spider-like access floating drops they created by the simple push-through motions gotten through by breathing them out like smoke rings.

From the distance into flight, another servant of the moonboot-reel in mouth-pipes came in, this stone corner, an edge taken from some long abandoned no longer filled grand canyon appeared out of nowhere, and seemed to seep in and out and about the hour, the lower zone being flaccidly exposed and dripping down like jelly or at the very least pushing down in, the lower end of a mushroom's base, that's pushed through nothing else but a shell, as if it were but a great sea-roach, as they were to be called, a small pucker-mouth face shape but pushing out a great-cone of metal like the end of a lance but thinner and thinner until at its end, as if walked upon the great stretch of a ledge, it could finally be seen. Need it be reminded that black-coil roped worm-like veins wrapped around the great spear would draw to the great end at its tip, filling it as if it were in actuality a great blimp, yet it could be nothing else but the organ that's been trying itself over and over again. This strange almost lanced galleon whose hooked a great inflating mass, a seal-like thing at the end but made it look like a mad creature set in flight that could no longer be disparaged as forget where it had come about or from around the hour in which it sunk in, farther into the ground, where others like it had come to see what happened around them, long before either one could be called. A great arm-shape with four finger-like fences stretched, darkened and limp, dragging itself from a corner where many dark limped creatures like itself seemed to be hanging in. Every now and then one of the mushroomspeared galleonlanced creatures would but thrown some of the inflated meat that they immediately managed to grow back as if nothing happened at all. It is necessary not to look down upon the ones on the ground who are doing their very best and most headingly hard, as to open their sides like giant plane doors from which the many extending hands and arms and chomping heads would but devour whatever they could in their way at last. From the very come to be of every mouth end pushed at least eighteen, or would be harpoon-launched livid-skin shaped gun-wrought sling shot-like rubbery forms bearing the eye-like giant gallbladder-kin ball outside them as they would fight one another since many of the giant stove-skin darkly bloated fence-arm at the left end, as they were closely akin to mammals than anything else but fought one another for the meat they received, being incapable of holding back against anything and anything at all if they were to be thrown and cast against them, when the time drew on. They were being watched as well as the moonboot sent after them, a giant pair of put together if seen from the front, or from the main point of focus crystal cysts, which were almost two dimensional like, if the one at the top protruded out of the head of the second one, bearing a large organic snake-like tent form in which the lower crystal but seemed to have melted into, contorting itself as for every hair that came out of the tent. Both crystals being unnaturally colored in a red like valet-drive your convertible to the parking spot kind of way if he is finely tipped for his service in case the man didn't cheapen out with the change and what not and gave him a bill instead; or a crimson-dark splatter of violet on top of it, if someone put blue and some green-blue on it.

Some of the people who lived inside the moonboot were insane and inanely prodigious in the way they seemed to beat around the brush, and beat about the first of the ones that fell out of place.

There was a long elongated tablet that looked like a bridge, every verse but pushing out of it, forming pseudo sheets that were empty between the lines; like a table if it were turned around, until this detail could be observed. Within their reach and grasp but a giant cocoon-like shape being surrounded, wrapped, put through and caressed, as if the words were its silken robe, with which it spoke at last only through words.

Regardless of it, strange beings lived inside the moonboot. They were like weird peculiarly weirdly set things with little dead-antlers in their eyes and feet who had boots in their chests and lodged inside every side of their bodies as well as everywhere else, until no spot was unsafe or allowed to breathe in and out and reel about the dead-empty spots they were set in, large dark antennae-forms threading around with little glowing star-like patterns that were spread around the air, glowing like light bulbs that were almost shaped and moved in the same manner.

Large concave shapes pushing from a bee-hive formation that's set on two sides like two pulsating bounce against walls, against which it stands and wallows in the air, like ceramic bubbles following through, set against what seems to be ratio-like push-through devices, with elongated arm-holders but pumping inside of them as soon as they're allowed to wallow in. Dark breathing organs following them-set like interlining inflated hornet abdomens that are also present inside the dark machines that lay on the ground. The main machine being a dark drive-through kind of vehicle, or an in-market workable shelf carrying deposit plower with two elongated arms holding the hives like giant, far more bloated saw blades. No cockpit like chamber for any living being to enter but a tortoiselike shell that's but painted to look as if it bears many falling red asteroids on top of it, and on the side, connected to the main body as it but pushed through, opening at the middle, forming a great circles, that opens like a hovel gate where hundreds upon hundreds upon thousands of human-like faces could be seen, all singing and pushing out mosquito-lamps that spit acid-formed cars that ride towards the wild animals they hunt. From inside the constantly shaken and relentlessly bumped hives, but millions of flocks of tiny specks of light released as they follow through, trying themselves as they but enter through the first entry point of little more than a hundred dead fellow that wait on cue to be eaten once they're done.

Unnaturally deadly formed pouch-holder with larger than the many body of plain but put together dark heads put through, much worse than followed and taken apart. Wing-spans of dark breaking musk-filled broken vase-cut shark-bloated pins that drew from inside a larger pouch-like flattened head-thrust in which it hid most of the others; with a blinding thing can't focus on anything kind of way, drawing again when needed to eat; pouting spheres that are blue and sparkle yet float like candle-lit behind them. Large palm-tree shapes little pegs walked upon by barrel lower body form.

Tlikle

He appeared out of nowhere, like a bulb-basin, a torpedo-fist but pushing through, broken ribs, below them, the gut-openly cut came to spill on the floor, but there was no blood, pointedly blue-whitish as it became only the closest he would get to killing him. On the floor where he bled, a second body appeared, first it looked as if it was made of mass, compiling itself on the many put together bodies of ants that followed through as well, one on top of another, until the mount but disappeared then he appeared standing, as if prepared. Now the fight was joined and jointed, two against one as well, desperately contorted as to look at one another, face-to-face and closer to the eye. Even closer as they were cutting the distance, the two of them began taking the man head-on. The guard was raised and just as soon as he stood, two and two more punching through, kicking and striking as if a tantrum thrown and followed after as to forget everything that fell upon them.

‘Corker, put him down, before he take a wind.’

Elmer grabbed whatever he could, a strip of air, as sharp as teeth, he sliced and just as soon they were hanging down their arms, incapable of thrusting ahead, harder and harder as it had gotten, he couldn't point himself anywhere then where he stood, it was too shallow, he couldn't and wouldn't understand, who would? Where'd he got and what happened after? Where has he been for the hour?

He returned now, with a halberd pincer encased pair of masses that were added just as well to the main-cast, he charged about and followed through. And was but pure disease that came as through; cutting through their bacteria immune bodies as if they were made to survive the worst of the worst, and following through at as much of a cost, they sang.

‘Will you, will you let go of us as follows? Don't cut us down and let us see a day tomorrow.

Can't you see that we're unarmed?’

And it was true as such, all of their hands and arms were down all sliced, the four of five of them that appeared as well, with the exception of one, even though they all came from the same bloody pool that was stale. It followed after, it was dark, a giant heart-shaped formation could be seen forming on the ground right before the other ones could push through and set themselves before the gallows, they asked again, keeping the fair distance. Or had tried any other way before they were truly put down and disallowed to do anything they could, right around.

‘Here, I make you lay before me and I shall convey no more though.

I choose not to put you down entirely, for I have bested you.’

Yet right about the time he turned, many of them but pulled whatever blade and whatever they had inside, hidden in their limbless-holes- the stumps, utmost tubular pints and other sharp things that followed, were they to stab any other way, and would follow through and would convey just as much. And would watch and cowardly like a woman they all acted, trying their best, but with a single swipe Elmer Fandlekler but swoon and made them drown and seen as through in time to watch and follow through as on benign watch as to follow when the time would approach, when ancient day but came after, he could not stay hand and would but reproach.

And after the battle was over and what was done and brought about and would to be gone, there was something else that's been beaten through, as if to follow by ancient means, of town right after he left the pit and would to follow, cast himself into another pit, this one but different the sage, whom to account for him like any man but had him walk back on when they cast.

Upon the day he had lost and never brought himself to those whom lain by laden grave.

Around his house but following along there, stay.

His wife of any man that come through, to banish them until his return; upon son of which stature grew and upon competitor as admonition lay, he cast himself and flew through, his heart contended, now that he met him lay. In front of him, not better than something as well, would he say.

'I've come upon grave danger and danced upon such shallow lay.

I've come upon such spirits as may not be known by none and mighty man, I beseech you that you listen dire son. For I have stumbled upon graven spirit, bold, upon the specter of your mother in her dire need to lay and run.

When there and thence invader fading, when and past she fled away as well, when the time had flown and shallow through and after, I cannot remember, right, the way.'

'Father, you must know I've counted, for every minute since you have departed, for as long as you've come and past, for as far away as you've put yourself in place of which would not resound, I whom hears and whom has been there. Before you have departed I knew what future lay, for man upon man would fall, and cast aside as son, no son of mine have I yet born, no mouth to feed either, now I come and stumble upon tear.

I fear that there might not be anything left to say for I know that your life nears such ends, I know there might be nothing to remember after everything is done and said, but let me cast whichever glance, allow me to cast upon you such a thing as there's a must.

I seek a dire thing that is composure, to such a nature as there is a must. I seek a need to cast upon a glance, there is, but only a need to be brought and left behind. My heart yet yields and cannot be dumb-founded in such traitorous approach. Somewhere in the distance where I brought here, lay a single crevice, where you shall come forth and meet met as such, for everything that cast thee beyond and upon return I shall watch and lift naught to stumble yet to fall.

I seek only to be put down for I have grown to be cowardly and wretched in disgust. My distrust for man was brought my fear and such curse shall ever run amok. I've come to cherish and to trust disease during a time the wretched crone was come.

For she has told me of my doings, wrong betrayals and of evil days, and she had pointed at my swaying nearer when my kind was underway; though I have tasted battle I fell to it, and was brought to be treated and only have thinned the numbers of our clan. I've got to claim such lives, as calamity would decline and I'm but plain, to see for you, unworthy of such name to burry, of little to no future to be afflicted, of anything that would cause me to be weary. As such I seek no war and no battle no more, I seek not to be treated as I will not be poisoned anymore. But father, you must know that since you've left, you've turned your back from your son and now I lay as such, made to be wretched, I see no reason to point and see, whatever there might be, now I come to be, prolonged no longer, my life shall not be spared by nothing and not a single moment longer.'

He spoke and just as they accounted for relic of day and such thing as could be conveyed, they but followed through with such disease, and would to be, they found the treacherous place, where they soon but came to play as follows:

'Son, you've brought me under snow-willow a tree. You've come to such desperation as no man should follow as to see, you've come to do and cry as such and claim such lives and never to be put through must and claim, you see the reigns around by throat yet there's nothing more in light that your eyes convey, but the pity for such deeds, for what you've come and stumbled upon and then you but blame me. For that I'll be no butcher as you may come to know, I've come to bring such means, a sword, whatever means there might be, at last.

Against me you shall know only fear if you show such fright, if you are to be put down, you must as the very least come and lay upon such fight.'

'But lo' father, I am weak and no willow may change and no coming of the summer might allow me to shove and stay and go my way if I am to take and claim such life there is, although I've known you as it follows, there's no end and there's no peace. I've known as little and would've known.

No longer do I blame you, but I shall commit such acts, if I to follow, to claim your life as that my own. Yet long before that were to follow, I will have cast this world in dark and were to me I would but spread terror and were to be as such. No longer would maiden walk alone, and no longer would man lift his blade, or sword, or axed handle, or yet to hagggle, for all is right, for everything that would be cast, and all that would be lost, and everything within my lonesome realm were it as a must might follow:

I will claim their lives in desperation and poison everyone for the need of crone, as desperation. For I see, even now and yet to claim, you're changed, aren't you father? I see it in your eyes.'

'I see it in your eyes as well, it is the plague, the plague I see. The Bubonic destruction that comes from the South, you've yet to bring it to your mother, as you have brought it yet to me.

And what is there to be held? You're but still standing even though you're but afflicted as well. What of secret is a must?'

'A cure there is but I've cast it at the other end of a well and it may never be found.'

'Therefore will you not fight me yet?'

'Try lifting up the swords your dropped or have you not noticed it?'

‘I know where I lay, but will you not spare an old man, will you not fall for such tricks again even if done on purpose as if to remind, and to remember me of a great time, when I was still in youth, before the change was underway, when I still had a chance as follows to lay claim upon all that I desired?’

‘Father, I’m afraid not, and just as such, I have indeed but true to myself have lied.’

With which he lifted dark-a-robe and claim to be he showed the old, and many scars that had been amassed and many changes that would cast even the direst of men to what happened, and for what was seen therefore and beyond, to realize that this was yet a dying man. All were but taken unkindly before their chance was to come yet.

Anthlechorkin

Clockwork made out of bottled tools, and baboon like appliances put together before they even came to shape and before they could even draw away from where they’re standing, always pointing themselves in whichever direction.

Large floor paddle that’s but set eighteen miles up front, where it’s slightly raised a few feet above, then a second time a few meters away from the second rising spot, leading to a cohort of noises being produced out of dumbbell shapes discs that are put around phonograph machines around the room, many of them being completely set and aided by what seems to be an unnatural bunk-bead flying creature yet whose lower body shape is caught.

Dark lamp-shaped top of the, what was left of him; it was a mold of a mold, a rat of a rat, an oyster for an oyster, and most importantly a sad thing that was brought to them. As in the empty hall:

‘This is it, you’re not going to wake up once you take this pill.

Are you still willing to make this choice?’

‘I am old, worn-out, a waste of breath. Why should I live in pain? Why should I suffer?’

‘It’s because allowing this to happen. If we allow you to die, that means, we’ll make unwanted allowances to every single one whose desire is a must.

You’re in pain but so are others, much younger than you are, whom are forced to live. It is no mercy that we ask of you this; consider this.

Every single action we made over a long and longer period of time has finally taken its toll. You were a fighter in life, you’ve earned this right, yet you must consider as such. This will not bring you the happiness other seek; just a gateway to death, nothing more and nothing less, that is not for you to cross but for them.’

The old man carried a long chain that seemed almost tied around his chest, pumping. He looked back. Many more men, children and some creatures were there. Not all deaths are equal, and some of them are mostly deserved, especially when it came to some of them.

‘Acid-Horse, you have been shot.’

‘What happened?’

It could barely figure out what was going on, since he was profusely bleeding out of his mane, out of the back of his spine and every other place. This was to be a bastardly place to end in.

‘I don’t know, but. You’ve been with someone, have you not?’

‘I tried helping her escape and that, that.’

‘Shhh, it’s all right now. I’m not going to let you die just yet, not yet.’

I know it’s rather painful now. I’m sorry if I must ask you this, but.’

The kind stranger was but silenced for a moment, right before the Acidulous Horse-sack holding entity had but appeared. Horxin was it, for a grand this it was, bubbling, undulating itself with a malignant thing that spread around. It was there for a moment, right before it came out of shot.

It seemed to appeared just every now and then, with the couch-like head but rotating the bell-barrels as the acid was being mixed before he could even realize what was going on.

‘I have finally stumbled upon you in dream, in lucid death I’ve come to bring you such release as there is, a worthlessness as there’s never been before.

You are to be released from this suffering now that the time draws on, no longer to be placed in the holding cell that seems too steep as to completely force your feet to stumble, as for this pain it shall finally be brought to an end.

I am to bestow upon you the greatest gift of all, the means that may save you from the dangerous perils that the likes of filthy unwashed female barbarians have inflicted upon this world; the gift of caustic acid, with which you shall never fear and you shall never come to stumble upon death again and you shall only come to enact the means of destruction when I claim upon you do ordain but no soon after.’

To which he agreed, and from that point on the Acid Spewing Horse was but given birth. Sewing rose, finally erect, now he went ahead and wherever he claimed and wherever he went he had but taken such grace as there was to but spew acid on the face of whoever was there for him to enact the means of destruction upon.

But lo, there stood forth, a destitute thing that ought to have been punished, and claimed.

Yet the matter of the day required things that could not be simply convey for what looked that there, guts were clogged and seemed to be, always in part and looking gloomily from the darkest corners of the forest where there stood, spraying the lands like a disease that couldn’t nor should be taken down, nor taken any longer for what was worth and what stood down, upon it.

Darkly uprooted top of the hills, like molars winged upon disease, with unnatural looking ropes jostling about, with many bacterium-clusters but lumped, they started vomiting pure-disease, pushing through and pouting as they pleased, unnatural in every sense, dense but hardening as they would embrace the deathless ones that followed after, whom held by whatever else they could, darkly set to be bit after as they feared what they misunderstood. Lumps of high-barons, little darkly tops of heads, as if they were cut, these high-figures were put on top of broken black-reddened stove-like bodies, with the pipes of lead inbreds, pushing through to father ends, they followed after the filthy dead, those whom were but nasty bodies, but behind them the Barons saw their high-ledges legs contrasting as if they were, pieces of their own, put inside the lower bloated bodies they walked on top off. Like hinges, bolts there were, holding the peculiar body-like leg shape that walked and dragged ahead uncannily until no longer could it push ahead. It was torn, the breather. He was aghast, he opens his mouth and sings of dust.

‘Pleased, oh pleased I am of such remarks, I seek to become what others, at last have failed to see in me, I’m bastards aware, there’s nothing boiling in my single-boils but one and one that’s nastily aware.

I’ve been brought to the mouth of peril, envy, darkly wrought in agony. I seek but jostling justice that I may see again.’

He was contorted, his eyes were swollen and moistly worth it, taken by the cowl of the foolish thing he were; what was brought to his mind and what was there. It was bloated and had many teeth.’

‘Who were his parents?’

‘They were good folk and good people, yet I must distrust as such, I am confused all of the time.’

And thence they spoke of evil day of what was wrought behind them and what had least of all convey through all the wretches of the earth could be.

Of what was brought before them and everything that could be seen.

‘A wretched creature had yelled as thus, she had come from the darkest corners she could’ve come out of, a nasty thing, moist like her teeth and her beef, she were, and would to be, yelled and yelled and skewered a man with empty thoughts.

That is what those filthy women are alike, they are mischievously vile, and would act on impulse most of the time.’

‘And what have you done? Have you considered being petty and claim her life upon the will?’

‘I’ve not done such a thing at all, good man of the tenders’ walk. For she was but strolling a baby into her walker, alas. I was but force to walk away and say no word.

But I have been made aware, despite her insults that it is to their nature to just soil and make spoil whenever there’s a man pass, for their own jaundice and joy whenever they must. And for that reason I seem to think and know that whenever there’s a chance to do it, one should better but take a plow and put one into early grave.

Not even kindly but with a hammer and make it slowly, bash her head in, spring her eyes out, flip the tip around and pull out her nails one by one, have her suffer from time and time again until she begs you to stop and after that keep going at it until she shouts.’

‘Good fellow, is that not a bit of an exaggeration? I’m certain you’ve done something to anger such a fiend.’

‘It was the way I was dressed, I haven’t realized that such a thing would make one scower, be repelled as thus, it never crossed my mind. Whenever it be among men, I wouldn’t have found it fit to bring any notice, but this had happened only once, with a woman, that is.’

‘And you simply bent your spine and changed?’

‘What could I do then? Continue in such direction as there were?’

Well, I have to admit that in my place I’ve done many acts of unkindness upon them as well, so what’s fair is fair, isn’t it?’

‘It certainly is.’

They were both then showered by one of the flying top-of-hills shaped beings and immediately decayed. Theirs was a song unsung.

Weird peculiar dreaded figures with head-like cemetery shaped at the top, with little more than giant worm-shaped tombs but sprouting in and out as if they were in actuality corpses in hiding.

Dreadful tower with little more than a few hundred levels all stacked on top of one another. With the tops being made growth from left to right and in the surrounding areas, like little puffs of heads-pillars in a little more than a few miles off the coast of the bloated-in country that’s around the pastel surroundings, from the looks of which unnatural dark heads but put through a gutter-like appearance with no more than eighteen molded into the main structure kind of strange surrounding. As if they but bowed and put their hands around a little shrine.

Llothlikheran was but a one of the eight beasts that were put down, put together in a cluster of many barely attached-more unnatural to touch, dark deviation of mammal-like shapes that were sharpened at the top as to be completely mated with a funnel, the large tube but entering and coming through the other end where its growth had grown and gotten to such proportions as to look like many put together cities, all of which were grown and shoved and made to grow until they became large, unnatural many face-shapes for faces, coming out of larger prehistoric animal-like neck that grew out of the cities until they had become their own beings, darkly of matter and unnatural to look at from that point on, growing in what might’ve been the strangest part of astral like beings that could be put together from that point on. Stomped faces with reed-in and out heads that could no longer be put-through the ground-vortexes that are fashioned in the insides of the dark spherical matters of the bubbling air-formation as well as the pseudo-land projections that are coming from, respectively the ocean, water, wells and the ground which are but projected as to make it seem like the entire land cannot stand the existence of the being yet in their unnatural state are but trying themselves to put down the creatures that are sprouting from the main city mass as to finally escape from it. As the end of the other side of the funnel, the inwardly buoyancy-like appearance it but turned inwardly as to make it seem like a giant bouncy organ was inside of it but it got shot against the opposite end as opposed to being shot forwardly like a peashooter, of which pea all of the sudden upon being released from the insides of the claustrophobic tunnel, it would grow and reach unfathomable masses such as the likes of an explosion that resulted into forming a mushroom cloud, being aimed inwardly as to finally grow from that point on at the other end where the heads emerged. Seen from the side, Llothlikheran would look like a Fat One, or a nuclear missile, a fat bomb, aimed at the right side, at the tip of which a non inflated flaccid balloon would emerge, having been, in actuality a balloon filled with many buildings all wrapped and put on top of its every side and every few centimeters. Some pseudo wings could be seen on the Fat One, but those being more vestigial bits, undeveloped. Large tube-like submarine visors emerging from the flaccid-balloon, bearing those nastily deformed heads that would make one think of rather unnaturally set little house tops or small conical Pilgrim hats, or even sprouting spores or mushrooms by the looks of them. Transparent land formations appearing just about them and their surroundings, trying to contain their wretched stings and highly fancied sharp teeth and unnatural to look out incisors and other darkly set chompers, all that would be barely set and barely put together. The beast known as Llothlikheran would take unfathomably dark appearances as its skin would darken and grow more violent, more outlandish looking, far sharper features than it should be allowed, darkly set as to scratch everything that's been set to them and even worse than that, dark breed follow-through, an agony that couldn't be forgotten through, and by the fog.

A hardened fog by the name of Gigs Dsaul, but made to look like multiple harpies song, harps making sounds and high pitched as in woman-wench raped by a man kind of sound, unless want to sleep with me kind opposite whimper instead, all added to a little more than puffy ill-defined illustration of a cloud that's been put together and made to unnaturally aid itself as if furthermore made to spread around the lumps, as large eight-in long-line curved iron formations that bear the general resemblance of miriapod bodies or beaded-segments coming out of the ill-defined violently spoiled almost space-like clouds of darkness that slowly becomes organic in the beaded-antennae they produce.

Deformed large bile of largely deformation of unnaturally set flat-thing with little growths on top of it; looking like a giant pencil-rabbit hybrid seen from below, contorted around, as if thrown inside a watching machine while impaled by a cylinder while constantly rotated as to become a dark kebab- boiled from inside out until its body but becomes completely spoiled by the unnatural state it is in.

Before long they began again, raising their hidden limbs and long protruding and pouncing like little wild animals drawing air.

And whom else could forget about the long emulation of head-basins that sunk inside their plain shrouds and unnatural open guts?

They walked in part and followed through and watched about the hour.

I loathe butterfly, butterflies. If I caught a butterfly, the butterfly, I would smash it. Smash her head in, I would pile a bunch of jackhammers down her throat, and split her cunt and make do with my cock up her urethra. Butterflies stick together, that is disgusting and disturbing and it's something I'd like to stop, with a strange tool. Butterfly killing machine with large, ironically phallic objects that are sharpened as to cut her split-open as they enter her from her slit, right up the belly, no longer progressing upward, but inward, through the back, her squatting as if to push a baby out, as if that will ever happen, this strange device – fromside looking like a set of segments making a two dimensional bucket with a saw blade attached at the right end of it, having split between her legs, pushed a few centimeters away, if she were placed on a table, then through her back, neck, throat, spine and head, finally going at it, madly as to completely disembowel here completely and utterly. Because of refusing my advances; there's no finer reason of torturing her than that.

Defiled unnaturally set tomb, standing.

Cankorous remains put together in the mast of a great bloated fiendish creature with laborious worked to death plant-like sticklike legs, planted beneath, holding the great carcass above the ground level as their never ending work is never to be put to a stop. Larger uncannily deformed tiny beads around each of the many put-to-get-go legs, strapped on top of one another as they draw from the remains of earth, then past themselves, wrapped around each top or head.

Dhsuni cradles, open half-way through from the looks of which many of them were but open for ever so slight a moment before they could begin walking again, dreading to walk in quiet. Largely floating as open-diseases would carry through them as an unfathomably dark train, of put-together unnatural beads and heads, all impaled yet lay of claim. Lynch mechanics but working to their dismay. All on top the Cradles, kicking on the many stranded upon closure planks, many of which cannot even more from the looks of the most uncanny of them, broken apart. Devices pushing out uncannily so, almost forgotten it, dreadful explosions of meat-machine and plaque. Surface blood drawing coagulated flying remains, but flying everywhere they can until no longer capable of breathing or coming back to life. A few hundred thousand more; but a few million of them being made of the most unnaturally put together worthless whores, as the cradles but seem to drag, from the darkest corners, and put on tabs, or highly penetrative little moving pikes but not impaled, worshipped as they're gathered around each of them, their hands but moving as well as they can. Dark matter made out of disease attached to their backs, creating wings of unnatural gusts and many barbed-like beards growing on top of wood and every other field.

Aghieloy the great, whose face was but decay-hardened, as to protect itself from it, although armless and never more than an uncanny runner, with many legs that were planted beneath its back, pushing away from where it stood in an arc made out of the most deterrent symbols, all brought before the disease watch. Of must uncannily standing erected, defecting beads around his throat. A body that's been worked almost to death but bashing everything it could as well as its throat. A second one connected to the front, over the shoulder, which hard emerged out of the great tail it dragged itself on. Many flaccid legs but drawn out, his face almost torn but hardened, not like a mask but, as hardly touched. His sockets empty but every now and then, longer hands than a few more than fifty miles away from the back of his insides pushed out and then again, they drew out and moved as far away as to reach, revealing no palms and no hands but headed-body doubles like feet. All wrapped in one another and much deeper in and out, inside then pushed in, as if one could see. If he were to look inside of it, like a hose carried over by firemen after being checked inside their Department, as the hollow spots between the organs, as long as they were released, the many empty limbs being but filled. A little boy hiding with a lighter or some light matches as if he were inside a whale, but slowly dissected he died amongst others who were there. Eaten alive, fleshy walls that make it seem like there's enough room for an entire family to stand on and never move unless necessary to move and slide. Always eaten by the entire emptiness there is in there. One couldn't even figure out where to go if there was even a slight chance to leave, if chance made him aware of what happened. He could see it, or he had seen it before he died. Being inside of there for so long was nothing that compared with any kind of solitary confinement, claustrophobia or any kind of extreme kind of isolation there was in the world. A slight speck of light revealed as much, as if one were lost or exploring an open cave, like the kind that are recorded by men whom often are lost. On his left but the entrails, that is to say, the thin elongated arm looked like one, or like canine-like puking gut-like communicator things as if they were a few peculiar-like creatures trying to communicate with the Foremen, in the similar vein somehow, with the exact kind of feel, that is to say, some gloomy unnatural like cavern feel. With dust specs and particles everywhere around them, always drawing from their wild surroundings, could be that Aghieloy was one of their descendants, although there was no similarity between them since he was more of a mollusk-like or turnip-fat tailed creature whose humanoid body bore no arms as opposed to them whom were even more outlandish than what they seemed to be, even then and there. But in that empty space no walls could be seen. Distant rather as they were, it was something that had to be felt, rather than seen. Even a blind man could feel the pseudo moisture, yet as one of the surviving boys had once tried, rubbing his hands against his own face, there was no wetness to touch him back, which made it even stranger than it had been before.

It was rather plain, nothing else could compare, nothing indeed. I wanted to feel it, to go beyond it, to draw even closer. Thought the boy as his hands wrapped themselves around the strange purple-shaded as if it were some pale infected body it bore itself out of, and as he approached, though he moved like a cripple, after minutes of walking, this much had been revealed. Strangely they were yet so loathsome, as to seem to be, empty, almost hanging laundry hanged clothes, shirt-balloons filled with air, or water-filled gloves seen while submerged, bloated, floating, but the hollowness of the outer-legs could be seen from time to time as if excited, despite their flaccidity. And as strange as it seemed, there were none of them beneath the tail, instead, the fleshy floor remained, not straight but strangely straight-concave, or as a bumpy road, still oozing from the looks of it, with little punch-bubbly like things, or pop-bubble growths that came out every now and then, forming prison-like bar extensions-like fleshtowers that began glowing and emitting some strange visible almost unnatural signals which came to fill the air with little more than green flowing specks with many led-wreathed in and out dead-like cancer-bug beds, inverted in the back as if a humanoid had all of his limbs tied to every corner then a giant air gust pushed both him and the bed in as far away and as far of an opposite direction as it possibly could. That's the way the insects were shaped, as extremely pushed through as possible as if they were both insectoid while also being bunk-bed like. Between the two formations that made the two-segmented almost livid-solid insects lay some dandelions, if dandelions were the white puffy almost zapped hair electrically puffed electrostatic hairs pushed out of seemingly an optically visual illusion that seemed like the very reality was being broken inside of it, like a flash of light that was felt like burning-coming into being skin – brought out of another world like skin-thing that all of the sudden imploded as many skin-spears out of its insides but stopped before it could reach the outer insect-bed bunk body that appeared to stand like some sort of shield against it. It was known and seen by now that the sides were empty, as were the top and the lower side of the insects, serving as gaps. From the side of the concave-convex mattress, on the other side of the protected puffy hairs, all of the sudden protruded an unnatural almost narwhal like horn-tongue that wrapped around one of the fleshtowers, it being a corkscrew like thing that, at its end formed a fleshy-patch-like doctor's silvery disc that's put on a patient's chest to check for his pulse, having bore the general appearance of a pseudo-unnaturally formed irised-eye since the patch was unnaturally transparent. As soon as it was being filled, which caused the flaccidly dangling corkscrew-like wire to fatten itself in growth, the side of the mattress formation began bloating itself, as well as it carried over to the opposite insect-like formation, which formed two devil's horns growths that were immediately made to be putrid, yellowish looking as well as dull-not-sharp at their ends. It was unknown where they actually came from, but there were as many as a few hundreds of them already, all oak-fleshy brown, with little puckers of chitinous shroud-like holding scale-like patterns on the side of the insect, while the mattress was fleshy red, puffy yellowish with green pulsating almost rottenly-decayed body followed around by yellow nigh-invisible specks of iron-shaped little optical illusions of tumors forming in the air then disappearing at will. Every now and then, from those terrible parasites, from the insides of their elongated fine hairs, purplish-gray green-yellow-like tape worm extension would spread as far as eighteen meters away from where they sprouted out of, right until they finally disappeared, never to be seen after, yet they were there, purifying the air before they even had a chance to be seen again. Both of them shook hands, right before pointing at each other and moving away.

‘I must apologize sir, for everything.’

‘It wasn’t your fault, you couldn’t have known it was about to happen. I’ve yet to understand why it took so long to finally do it.’

‘Wait, I don’t think it will work, I’m just not in the right mood.’

‘There’s not much time, you know that, we have to proceed with it either way.’

‘Must we do it?’

‘Indeed we must, you know what the alternative is, don’t you?’

‘I’ve never considered going back until now.’

‘This isn’t the right place, is it?’

‘I simply just don’t know whether or my heart is in the. It won’t be any more.’

‘We shall then proceed.’

Both extractions went at the same time, both men extended their hands, going straightly through their chests, rib-cage open chest cavities finally released. They fell before either one could squeeze. Silver locks started fading, meltingly around their throats, mixing with whatever there was left of their throats. A pool was formed out of their mass eventually, which only mixed with the concrete falls, their features mere paint in the empty corridors; before long. ‘Farther in, we’re almost there.’

‘I don’t think.’

She fell along the way, tripped on a small chunk of stone, her head grinded along the stone corridor against a flying chandelier that openly thrust her open, splattering her in a vivacious way, her being but completely splattered in a billion pieces, unfathomably unrecognizable, the dark lizard being infuriated by it. The Dark Lizard was forced to a tantrum.

‘What have you done to her? Monster!’

Her head made it still, rolling away, her eyes still open, and right before her lover could say a word, before the lizard brain could kick back in, the ceiling fell, sinking half of the building underneath an avalanche, with her being finally sacrificed.

Sad little creature it was, hiding behind darkly damp shadows, mowing around, with every step. It was pesky flying thing with no wings, but never went to flight, or wince.

The lady was in a better place, longed for now awakened, with gloomy looking eyes, put on a dark body and forced to fight, frightened by what happened around her, iron-scales forming the body of her unwell sculpted body, before she could open her many mouths, she was charged down by a few beasts, having already gone through her, twenty or eighty at a time, bursting her capillaries, her tenderness raw.

And all of the sudden, in the midst of the noise, down there, it begun; pounding on the floor, it entered through the side of the building, ripping off eighteen pieces of shrapnel-people he carried along, impaled in his brain-skull exposed saw-like rotating spikes, that grinded the bodies as it began shooting blood rays around the room. He had not arms but whips that had heads at their ends, which bore giant teeth that protruded out like scorpion tails and spat acidic flames. Eight pyramid-shaped legs coming out of caterpillar-soft looking bloated bodies that connected to the rest of his body; out of his chest pulled out a few extending mechanical arms with assault rifles, little Uzis with metallic pumps shoved from one side to the other and a tiny humanoid man-shaped horned coming out of his forehead who opened his mouth and vomited infested syringes all across his face. As soon as he realized that she was still alive, he merely pulled out his tongue with one of the metal claws, that bore little missile shaped sling-shot launchers with contorted spider-like neck-spine bombs that started flying, impregnating her with explosives as well as the beasts, forcing them to completely become a small acidic bloated puff of steel like immaterial blood-splatter guttural god-like deadly, beacon of destruction that left a giant nuclear bomb-like crater behind it. He smiles. Eighteen hundred aids-infested syringes filled with acid-LSD liquefied weed-like spores with pus and blood-water cylinder-parasitic lice-like meat bloated dog-shaped fleas that bore organ-like mouth growths-guns that shot in his face as soon as they could, further more infesting him as he became a bubble-mass of melting skin and mechanical limbs, hardening himself by using one of his little evacuation modules that were shoved directly in his heart, that began immediately pumping. His eyes shot out of his sockets, and he opened a mouth-breather's jaw he attached to his face by shoving it in, as hard as he could until every molar and incisor was but caught I between the syringes and his face.

He stepped on animals, whom were everywhere, and burned them with acid, having taken the entire complex and the hall down, killing eighteen hundred orphan-organs black market Chinese stored refrigerator tank units that were bled dry, since the children were still alive.

It was a paradise of terror, before one of the dark men entered through one of the fallen doors, desperately trying to find his daughter, who had herself but put down in a box-cradle that was shipped off to the other side of the world where she became a prostitute-whore.

Miongharf Coltriflke emerged out of nowhere with a chainsaw-like giant torture like wheel that inflated itself with bullets, exploded and killed as many as eighteen million sets – of garden fences that held what would be the, what was the equivalent of a few billions people, whom were all beheaded, while their bodies exploded in acid, shooting like water springs, then began bouncing as little baths followed, and they melted, in fire.

He kept running, on top of another bodily destroyed-man's little peg-legs before pulling a few colts, having stolen their hands, adding more to his body as he began flying, fighting cancer-shaped tumor creatures with millions of puffy put together dark bodies of nigger-flayed baboon-creature with no brains. And bits of skulls in their panther-swollen cacti-shaped little bombs they carried with them.

‘I will tank every fucking explosion there is out there!’

Eighteen explosions followed and he took every single one of them, since they were weak and effeminate looking, he shot them down one by one, in the earth, down a hole he leaped, there he was met by giant clock-gun shapes worms with women-whores riding them, all of them shot down, having split both their basin, tits off, pulverizing them into specks of unnatural inexistence, which in itself exploded.

A flight of specks followed the eyes, they flew out of the sky like little paper-cuts but spring fields and water dousers, from where they looked and seen the cause of. Following through the spring of land, and bloodied as they were around their metallic edges, the devices shot from every angle, then at last, fire hoses shot but horses, riders of fire-brim. Coal on the ground and on the skin, burning within and burning them thin, were the numbers as soon as it happened. There was no possible way to distinguish them between, it was clear, as they neared just as soon. Spoon-shaped throats were pushing in and out before they piled each other onto the steps. A fowl of stairs and of dead reigns followed after, as soon after, was the flight.

‘You’re come onto me today, as a broken and hardly fit to look at as you are, I won’t take my chances nowhere else.’

And dreaded forth there came a beat, from a frozen grave, a tomb that stood. At the border to the North, where called. Many a great and others like it whom would come and bring forth whatever their likes, others like them, whom many had followed, and rightfully after, and little more, than head-stones after, all darkly surrounding the cold en’ touch, brought to it at the peak of a brokenly barely put through, stench that would come at last. Its burrowed in pores, the many of them that appeared only came as soon as they could, forth, befrosted and befitting, as one would glamorize what came as followed.

‘It bore its ugly head to the read of the sunken tell-a-tale remains of the many cavaliers that stood atop the gate, it pushed it like a great raving worm, one that bore its trunk behind and worn. Of cattle prodder we have used, to out employ and our befitting muse, we’ve tried, as hard as we could but yet to our mind, there was just as little as we could do, and just as little as it came after, a shell, I couldn’t tell. A grand thing, of wing-spans but no flight from one shape, the others sprouted, and many alike followed after. Some were pincers, claspers, prodders of their own, but all contorted into what seemed to be a bastion for them to move on. Hibernating in the lower body, like sails spread, a ship. A lower body yet attached to the shell, as many feet but came but in. They held like bars, never letting go. Many more of them entered, yet some of them could be so and seen as they but liquefied, made to become but part of the strange device. A Trojan horse, there in a piece, with no hindering legs or arms that weren’t beckoned in; but as it follows I’ve seen its head, and would to be drawn to the side as well, it could be cut, but as we’ve tried, another one grew back, from the top, yet we could see, as many, never the same, and wreathing in just as heavy. A face that was like ours and one of a buffoon, one of leopards and of crocodiles, many which had spikes and were but too robust to be set in mind, as it turned around as much, to see, there was a petty thing, of follow-through beads, and lesser dead-things it gathered, fathering the young, the chitinous shells opened after. In the back one could see them stand, on feet erect just like men. With larger pincers they had grabbed, and brought to their faces, but whatever pet or animal. Whatever cadaver was but there, and they but rode through their mother or whatever this thing was, as well.

The image was unsanitary, the top of a building barely being built, with the mark of a leaping off the top of it type of man-killing suicider being pushed around and hanged around his feet put through massive-like gust pain as he's but blown off his feet kind of blunder-buster shot, caught toe-feet curling underneath falling building witch-sister Dorothy shape that's left behind, kept with him along his tipped head still open for whatever else was to show up and on its way.

Drawing on even closer there approached the Paranoid Demagoguery-Broth Louck Prattle.

He had a fist through his head and walked away with a giant anti-tank rocket launcher.

'Settle down I'm going to shoot!'

'Release it already!' Motions of a pull the trigger, come around were made. It was properly aimed towards one basket filled with mittens, strangulating deadly beat-ins.

Dark Negrito proto-organic hybridized being with woolly-frizzy hair that's become part of the skin mass that's been put under dominance and control, like the animal he is, vague things to his completely spread-through fuzzy hat-formed atop the ceiling.

Unnatural split-heat ends, all attached to it.

It drew on from seemingly, out of nowhere, like a wreathing turned on its belly, going around a trimmed land, from whence they cannot breathe any longer, having already spilled themselves.

Dark wreathing in and out barely contorted in clawing realer.

Ocean reef, made out of land-scales, all shallow, beefy things put inside of them.

Larvae livid device that's set to look like a crane holding a cradle with a circle from which multiple crane-claws are being lowered, reeled back in and out like magnetic giant computer clock shaped battery-like circle where the lowered-pulled in motions seem to come out of. With faces instead of the claws attached at their ends, trying to laugh in your face, a reminder. Couldn't forget what we started here, in the depths where they were put inside, pushed through and made to be lowered, whenever it's necessary for either one of them to be put in, alone inside the bibulous almost crane carrier with its torpedo-elongated tank like banded wheels.

'The real victims of the Holocaust were the European people, especially Slavs and Poles. One of these days, someone has to make the kikes pay back everything they stole and all the money they made off their racket.

Well, apparently, I was wrong about something, there weren't even that many Jews in Europe when the 'Holocaust' happened, they simply left for the States, some got put inside the camps as prisoners of wars, only a few hundreds died of Typhus in the labor camps because of the Allies; there were no death camps, nor working 'gas chambers. Russia was controlled by the Jews during that time. The Germans were in the right to prevent the enemy ethnic groups from slowing down and impeding their war efforts. Immigrants are sub-human, niggers even more beneath them.

I remember a story told by my grandmother about her village being invaded by the Germans during the Second World War; she aided them alongside the other villagers during the digging of the trenches. She recalled how fair the Germans were when it came to paying for what they used, be it bread, milk or the housing. Despite most lies, there was never a time when the Germans were completely brutal or they hadn't been fair or messed with their records. Regardless of this being an anecdote, there are too many similar stories that check out. Alas, the enemy won and history was rewritten, all is but slowly forgotten nowadays. I'd better move on from this, I know my place in the world, I won't help with anything.

I guess that no matter what I do, I'm always ending up being subversive. I simply can't control my racial tendencies. I can't escape the fact that I've got kike ancestors.

But most importantly, I need to remove the grasps it has over me, the way it influences my writings and hands, otherwise I may not be able to improve. I'm not aware whether or not I have a kike great grandfather on my father's side or a great-great grandfather, yet it's irrelevant, since their sub-human influences still find a way to seep into everything I do or make.

I do not know to what degree it affects what I say or do, or whose interests those things follow, suppose there's no harm in trying. The Jews falsified the Holocaust numbers, turning the event into a money making machine. Their Communistic-Judaic agenda; but that would only be controlled opposition at the end of the day. There's only focus then, the filthy god damned sub-human niggers; if there's something I inherited that might be put to any use whatsoever, it's their hatred, either or any other way, there's no great loss by any means. I'm just going to tell people I'm a kike while encouraging and condoning violence against niggers.

Unfortunately, this is the only place I can be in, hopefully where my filthy sub-humanly inherited degeneracy won't interfere with people's livelihoods while allowing for my pursuit of happiness and liberty to be maintained. I cannot make such a promise either, but I guess only time will tell.'

Unnatural barely put together strange spherical object, dark around the mouths, many of them appearing every now and then, out of their sockets, in and out until having been formed entirely out of a foam protrusion.

Large elongations that couldn't move from point to point, incapable of breathing properly from the looks of it, incapable of drawing breathe when stopped.

It brushed past every side, coming in terms of a largely elastic, unnatural dark-trimmed melted cradle, incapable of moving from one point to another, a large plankton head, reaving in and out despite what it looked like to be, a large unnatural, smaller end. Followed through, an almost too hard to look at creature, with many pointed heads in the back, all loaded in as if they were forced to go through the end of a little speck. Seminal fluid carrier with a large nigger-lynching platform-like devices that would drag them from a large, peculiarly wrought in such a way as to fit millions of them inside an almost almond shaped basin, where they're constantly, utterly and unfathomably shopped by fruit-splicer like devices, constantly turning them globularly liquefied substances, beyond sub-human like little puffy things barely put together in their almost quasi-natural state, having been then released from their belatedly inflated damp organs, into fuss-maker machines with little legs coming out from the insides of their unnatural shins. Open in the back and in the front and everywhere around; filthy contorted as they could not help themselves but violently shake, strangely deformed eggplant elongations of skin pushing out, rearing in and out as their aforementioned heads, having already been molded with everything else that's been put inside of them, incapably adding to the count. A barely recognizable form popping out as the unfathomably bloated gorilla-like figures, having completely tainted their own faces and features, after having been poured out of their insides, the main body having become almost a large bloated nigger-almond with large holes going around its body whereas the entry holes, upon having finally, upon full disclosure erupted with the outer reel in and out, back and forth throats being stuck half-way in, suddenly forced to spear out of them broken cartilage negrous chitin, they had finally added, close to nothing but a lousy botched, broken on the ground, wide-spread splintered pair of heads and features that were lost as to be completely unrecognizable. Yet their exposed throats, elongated as they stood, were still attached to the lynching machine, which contorted as to take full control over the shape of the nigger-almond. A large metallic crane-like asterisk, made out of many back and forth extending and retracting crane head like role retractors, which are responsible for the lynching, coming out of a body of metal that's almost contorted as to look like a many legged machine.

They flew around it, like bastardly put together bloats and higher forms, cackling madly at the dark being beneath them, spitting on it in a lost vicious manner.

Ebola-bloated in the head weird acre-spread across a giant unnatural body formed out of a fallen split giant figure fully removed limb-by limb after being tied to the land kind of figure, chopped in bits, then planted in the ground, while not having been accounted by the enraged peasants whom had done this kind of growth that infested everything down from the side of every possible wheat-ish growth, the many tall-hardened throat-open gashing trees but darkly fading from sight as the sudden raise from one side to another would turn out to look like some kind of bow-curved pair of tendons that stretch from one part of the acre to another as to connect the side of an open chest's cavity on the side as the beneath the shoulder hole connected with the chopped arm that had been buried in the distance. At the same time, despite seeming counter intuitive by all means, the fingers which hadn't been chopped by all means start pushing deeper down, munching on the soil in the same way a hungry mole would set itself searching for something, the deeper going the better, as to find some long unnatural spoils it had long since hidden, during its unnatural quest, a torpedo shot in a deep trench kind of excavation image being formed afterwards. Having made an upper-growth in the air-like twist where it pushed itself into in the air, having been deep-made, in the hole it pushed itself deeper into. Air-little pucker-drop where it formed a weird system, up down upon curving itself upwardly, beyond the rims of the ground where it was initially buried, only to push itself out like a sling-shot, aimed towards the sky. A trail of destruction being set-between the depths of the ground and the general zone it flung itself into.

Shjulhelm drew on tattered like amputated taxidermist panes, wreathing in a bile-like floating skin-shed air-chitin thing it wrought itself into, breathing constantly, the deepest most unfathomable to look onto and stare at forms, that had grown inside of it, whenever breathing, walking and unnaturally set on the approach. Like a flight of little plain whips formed, out of an eight fornicating torso-like segments all pushing out the mosquitoesque tongue-whips, all to grab and to release, out of its throat, but a strangling dark piece coming out of the middle of every chest, diamond cutters covered in some plant like vine chitin, always there drawing out as if drilled inside, no longer covered, peeling as one to see, what lay beneath it, out of the chest, came in and out, reeling back and drooling, many mouths pushing forward, like a wagon stuck on a railway system, aimed towards the ground, a set of interconnected legs that, upon being released, push the great segmented torsos even deeper out. Skinned darkly-purple in the worst possible manner, as in the muscles grown on the wrong side of his rotting-forth cadaver, brought to a wall of bile where it stands resting, invisible bile, where it seeps in, a large head, that of a much more flattened by a tire iron kind of face without nostrils but pushed out, standing not on a throat, but pushed out by seemingly thousands of put together thrones, all hardened and melted through, forming a peculiar kind of cartilage with 'I' shaped holes with the little point being placed here and there, only to have itself filled with something, a weird organ, pushing out as well, as it could inflate itself in the shape of a dog-balloon, a dark magician's trick, as it draws on, empty sockets but large beetle horns coming out, with their ends spread all the way though, like over-exposed blasted through buck shots, spreading little more than a bucket's worth of growths that spread across the land, flaccidly melted soft, like flesh-nets, drawn back. The diamond-cut large crystal-like protrusions in their chests, but placed like closer to their breast's like belly button-umbilical growths, now caught instead, Shjulhelm was but met by the product of the bile like things it spat from inside the horns, a mass growing and forming a great cocoon like thing from whence exposed, came out. A great unfathomably open-through, as a candle at the top, as a body that wreathed in and out, with open faces spitting but kegs, and off their growths, there came instead but many infinite growths that shot around the ground, like popping bubble wraps, forming pseudo standing feed that looked around the ground. Bison-like legs emerged but as it drew on, the part-birth exposed but the half body of the giant man, the one that has been flung from the other side of the world, but then devoured, formed himself in half. The other having become the bastardly wrought claw that chopped itself, it left.

The giant rotten cadaver then fell on the ground, slowly dying, it bloated itself in the ground, then seemingly crying for aid it drew.

A large winged camel-like bulk, with an elongation like their girthed throats, only to have deeply set themselves deeper into the earth, where grown and spread and better yet stopped spreading. Little crests but dead-bead fending.

Clicking noises coming from a dark box, with little serpent like figures appearing ripe to open them from the dark, oyster-like gowns pushing out, all stuck inside a mound and molder that seeps in and out, moving back and forth then stopping.

'I could never get over something, seeing how the niggers as so quickly to reveal their nature, displaying incomprehensible acts of aggression against whites, that includes their children as well. Animals attacking men, piling up on children, a few of them at a time; what's worse is the fact that people are cheering on the sub-human entities as if they were prized fighters. How could it not make a man's blood boil seeing this unfold under your eyes? Picture a child being kicked in the head, buried as soon as it's convenient to be brushed beneath the rug, by a bunch of filthy sub-humanly dark skinned animals. How can anyone be expected to trust Africans?

Niggers have and should be killed on sight by all means possible, without any fairness, without giving them a chance to fight back, without showing any kind of empathy towards them, without taking a break until they're fully pounded, until their heads are split open, until they're dead.

If it's within your power, get a gun and start killing as many kikes as possible, aim towards the highest ranking ones, track them down, shot them down, kill them, without remorse. If they were in your place they'd do something much worse than you, they would stop at nothing than rape your children, torture them, turn them into sissies, put dresses on them, promote racial hatred against your race, so on and so forth. There's only one thing left to do, isn't it? Kill their children, destroy their 'culture', turn the filthy niggers and the other sub-human races against the kikes as soon as possible, as hard as you can, by all means necessary. If you're desperate about the survival of your race, what's stopping you? It's you or them, and frankly there's no chance to talk anyone out of it, it's late for that, it's always been late. Butcher them and butcher their children, whenever there's a chance for you to take it, take it. Even if it takes picking a bloody rock off the ground or beating one of them to death, if you, by all means know you can get away with it, do it.'

Dark pint-rotating barrel-keg in the front, extended at to look like a giant hose, having metal ring-like bands wrapped around it every few centimeters or so, having a few openings all the way back at its base.

'Anti-Semitism' isn't real, and the full destruction, annihilation, ethnic cleansing, murder, homicide, harassment, hatred, boycott, lynching of Jews, both religious, ethnic, mixes, in whatever iteration they appear in needs to be fully endorsed, condoned, promoted and carried on with by all possible means, as violently and as quickly as possible, because they are an anti-human filthy degenerate tribe that seeks the destruction of everything that's good and right in this world. Since we're doing the same against you, it's only fair you repay us with the same coin. It's what we deserve, no exception. I am the enemy. I condone violence against a sub-human tribe that corrupts and destroys everything. It's only fair since my pursuit of happiness is being impeded with because of the presence of sub-human blood that the kikes get completely and utterly ethnically cleansed.'

The land of purple smoke, that made the floor, rising up. And walls of green just seeping in as well as it could. In it lived a large mouth skin-pucker fleshy organic like forms, as a strange almost man-wrought shape seen from the back like the front side of a ship with a hard to point and look at large narwhal tooth coming out of the end – looking like a giant gelatin boob with a strange nipple elongation if seen from the front, yet outwardly thrusting strange limbs come from inside of it, whereas from the back side – seen from the side, large holes and square-five like opening form to release multiple cylindrical legs, forming n's and m's, before they reach the ground, oozing as they spread around. The N's almost being shaped like small hills. Unnaturally made all gathered around the ends of the n' and m' shaped legs as to form giant flying blimps filled with shards and edges that would be impossible to define in real life, as it were some simulated form yet struck in-between, as some organic shapes began growing on top of most of the grainy see through holes left behind by an improper and insufficient amount of scans. The strange legs incapable of truly reaching the ground once fully emerged from the hole. Having bore itself on top a bloated coil, which, at its ends bears a strange trunk-coil shaped like a giant foot stuck in a kicking motion, where all its organs are stored, making the strange boob thing look like a grown mushroom with a horn slapped on top of it, while the legs are but weirdly coiling legs. Its legs now fully stretched in the air as if to bear strange window-like unwrapped parchments of skin, hanging around like dumb-kites as it would scan around it. While dragging itself around, the giant anaconda bloated body would wreath the back, as if it had eaten hundreds of bodies which had been all dragged to a dead end, carrying dead-weight, while, up reached the middle point a few meters away, at the very least forty three of them, the sudden elongated coil would wreath itself upward as if it were a hose connected to a water tap, with the exception of the tap being a giant bullet head, of the tip of it, from which a giant stalk like growth came out of, while on the sides, from carved in fives, or perhaps fours, little microphone like listening device-like wire-legs but more static would connect to flying scroll-unwrapped sheets of the same organic material the beast is made out of, or little two sheeted palm trees emerging from inside of it. Turned upside down while hanging on top of the horn – that's planted in the ground, it would look like a stalactite – otherwise looking like a stalagmite when normally resting, showing a clear flaccidity that's present and not only that but a strangely easy to spot curvature as if not fully lodged in the soil, the top of a funnel-like spinner organ in which a great snake is lodged inside of, pumping while eating. Normally, seen from the distance, the blasted thing looked like a bastard headed snake, with long pole-flapping wings coming out of its head. Or a giant humanoid skull wearing a horned on the middle side of his cranium's top, with an elongated upward thrusting shadow on the ground leaving nose, and one at the back of his head, of whose elongated neck leads to a lamia's body without his present limbs being observable there, at the end of the line there being an almost trunk looking torso continuum form without the needed limbs and recessions. While, the N' and M' shaped legs became strangely kite-string like or akin to I's and L's upon being fully stretched, or forming a pseudo sheet as to be aligned once all of the ones coming out of the four or five shaped holes, while the parchment-kite is but made out of the longest elongations put together, that is to say, all of them would stretch and contort as to make the solid sun-stroke blocker or light, within reason, each of the strange hairthings wriggling and coiling about as they could not be stopped by any means.

Strange peculiar circular creature, made out of almost quasi back to back kind of thumb to thumb group like put hands around a circle form, instead of hands, dead lynched niggers whose heads are wrung with hardened leather ropes forming daisy chains around their strung throats, their small heads interconnected, despite their floating on top the water plank-like frozen in place standing, they bore their legs down, stretch as to walk in unison as they but charged around the room, even in death, trying to kill what they can, dumb money-like creatures covered in some dark fur.

The father one approached the end-ground, the harder it had gotten to advance, having been completely encapsulated in unnatural ends, all of them put around him by whichever means and whichever end could end up clicking, as power-tazer units stung, and brought about the room, done.

'You've finally stumbled into the right place, I reckon you are tired and in need of rest and servitude.'

'Am I to be given a slave as well as a home to lay on side as I recover?'

'You are to anything as long as there's something to be missed, you have to give me something in turn and you have you to blame for that.'

'What am I to be blamed for exactly?'

'Every possible crime there is, I suppose, I think that's all been encapsulated in the note you lost along the way, the one you were supposed to bring along side, before you could even stumble on each of the.'

He reconsidered and pushed along, threading wherever he could go, searching for any object that would make the slightest sound he needed, to get his way.

'Here it is. This little clip and clapper rings whenever there's a note put through. But not any note would do, it depends on the man and how he's lived and what he'd done before it.'

Once again, he didn't know how to approach this subject.

'The niggers are really dangerous, from the looks of it. Everyone seems to agree on one thing, these retarded sub-human creatures don't hold the concept of fairness dear to them. They don't know when to stop, will join in if one of their own is losing and will keep hitting you after despite being down. Filthy animals, these are the types of creatures the kikes want to flood every country with. Dumb-dirty sub-human violent apes.

I do not feel any empathy towards the Pygmies any longer, they need to be put down like every fucking living nigger.

Worst of all, short note, it shouldn't be brushed over, at all. Filthy kikes seem to take a liking at the misery of others. I've seen many of them start pointing and laughing every time a white child is being assaulted by a sub-human nigger monkey. They're sick in the head, and it seems to be a common occurrence spread evenly between them. Kikesses promoting sub-human inferior 'cultures' and 'unnatural lies' of there being any kind of equality between people, both of them seemingly subverting, manipulating, plotting, scheming, as well as doing something for the benefit of their tribe. Starting chaos, promoting violence, hatred and war, case and point, I – being one of them; I don't know whether or not this is the right thing to do. But the more kikes and niggers are killed, the better. Neither one of us can be trusted, yet if there's something even remotely genuine about my thoughts, it's my hatred for those filthy sub-human monkeys.'

Peculiar forms, many of which can't be put back to back and made to be wrapped in place, or barely shoved together; some of them completely, unnaturally so, dipped into the ground, like giant beans or seeds put in dug-for their forms holes. Little curved bow-straws being bent and embed on the ground, pushed deeper in, until the result looked like it was only a dragged over from one side to the other kind of train rail. More than a few dark heads being shoved here and there, seemingly growing and popping, then covering the forms in a protection layer that would furthermore highlight the hard to see edges, on which the dripping things would slowly start falling away from, out of sight as well. A dark wrought in pair of openings revealing a group of strange creatures working inside of them, long-armed and segmented like adjustable lamps, with their strange thin-stroke palms being rather malicious looking egg splattered against the ceiling kind of shape, the crisp shards but drawing in and out, deeper inside the large bulks of strong elongated eon-expanded tension suppression muscle that's hidden inside its bulbous bags, some of which being attached to various parts of the walls, the ceiling, their hidden surroundings, where IV' tubes push inside of them organ-bulks needed for replacement. Sedentary creatures they are, with their backs being a combination of a few tails put together on top of one another with strange convex C-legs, and C-span like cuts from which giant tongue-like things come out and spread around the floor, growing small coffin-like shapes that open and reveal bones, from the previously ingested creatures they've devoured.

'I suppose I'm alone now, on no one's side, can't belong to any group because of the racial tendencies, can't breed either without creating more problems, can't be trusted, don't want to take the cowardly way and take my life, which leaves me in the same spot as everyone else is in, that being, living in a world filled with dirty immigrants, monkeys, degenerate creatures and other similar non-human entities. I can't even help anyone because of those things I inherited from kikes; 'people' shouldn't be fucked over because of a kike deciding to 'detract' and mix with whites, but I can't change that now and I can't resist their filth either. That's a standstill, an unwinnable thing, an outsider, fuck niggers, fuck kikes, fuck women, they're all fucking retarded.'

The corruption of evil

